THE ADVENT REVIEW.

EXTRA.

AN APPEAL TO THE LAODICEAN CHURCH.

That there is to be a call to the Laodicean Church, and that the time for that call to be made is at hand, is evident. But who constitute the Laodicean Church? An array of argument on this point seems unnecessary. All Advent believers know perfectly well that the Philadelphia Church, the Church of Brotherly Love, was made up of those who came out of the Sardis, or nominal Church in 1844, under the cry "Babylon is fallen, is fallen." They know, also, that the Laodicean Church is the next in order, and is the seventh and last stage of the Church, as brought to view in Rev. chapters ii, and iii. This church is made up of such as have become "luke-warm," and have left the Philadelphia Church, of brotherly love, and are saying "I am rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing;" and know not that they are "wretched and miserable, and poor and blind, and naked."

Oh! that you but knew and felt this to be your true condition, and had an "ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Then could I hope that you would set about buying "gold tried in the fire, (present truth) that you might be rich, and white raiment, (righteousness of saints,) that you might be clothed, and that the shame of your nakedness may not appear, and anoint your eyes with eye-salve, that you may see." The "Amen, the faithful and true Witness," is now saying to you—"As many as I love I rebuke and chasten: BE ZEALOUS THEREFORE AND REPENT." Oh! that you but knew the things that now "belong unto your peace," in this time of your visitation. But unless you speedily awake to this subject, and buy gold, white raiment and eye-salve, it will be eternally too late, and it will be said of you, "but now they are hid from thine eyes."

Your saying "I am rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing," does not at all refer to worldly riches or goods. This is clear from the context, viz: "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich," &c. God counsels no one to buy of him worldly riches; but your riches and increase of goods, referred to in the text, has direct reference to your boasted increase in the knowledge of the truth of the bible. Having learned so much bible truth in your Advent experience, and being so far in advance of the nominal churches of the present day, you have become exalted and your soul has become "lifted up," and "is not upright in" you. If you were not destitute of this tried gold, white raiment and eye-salve, the "true Witness" would not counsel you to buy it of him. Let me repeat His testimony again—"thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked," and "knowest" it "not."—Awful delusion!—Your poverty, nakedness and blindness consists in your being destitute of the present saving truth.—

Here I will give extracts from an article written by JOSEPH MARSH, VOICE OF TRUTH, for August 13, 1845:

"LAODICEAN CHURCH.

"To what period of the church does John's letter to the Laodicean church apply? Evidently to the last. This appears clear from the address in v. 14. "Saith the Amen."

V. 15. "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot."—Like the Israelites in the days of Elijah, (1st Kings xviii; 21.)—"Halting between two opinions;" undecided whether to serve God or Baal, so the Laodiceans are neither cold nor hot in their work. The two cases are similar; timidity, doubt, lack of faith, confidence and decision, characterize both. Well, what body of professed Christians, in our day, answers this character? Not the nominal church or churches, for they are grounded and settled in their faith, cannot be moved from their position, and acknowledge themselves "dead twice dead." This surely, is far from being neither cold nor hot. No body of religiousists answer this description as well as many of the believers in the second coming of Christ. And since the "tenth day," but few, if any of this faith, but that have at times, in a greater or a less degree, borne this character. Certainly many do now. They are wavering on the great question of the immediate coming of the Lord. They have their fears that they are wrong; but the evidences of the near coming of the Lord are so overwhelming, that they dare not abandon the cause altogether. Thus they stand, between hope and fear, doubting and believing, undecided, halting between two opinions, or do not hold fast the profession of their faith without wavering; and their works, of course, correspond with their faith, they are neither cold nor hot, or their engagedness is lost.

"I would that thou wert cold or hot." Decided on a question of this magnitude. The evidences by which you may decide are abundant, clear and weighty. What more could reasonably have been done to convince an understanding mind that it is the truth in which you have professed, than what has already been done? You are without excuse for your doubts, fears and unbelief; God has been lavish in giving the most overwhelming evidences to ground and settle you in this faith, but still you distrust him, slacken your labors in his cause, and turn back, at times, in your heart, to a fallen church, or a perishing world. Many have already turned back, and we fear to their everlasting ruin.

God is long suffering towards his erring children, but still, he will not forever bear with their unbelief, back-slidings and luke-warmness; heaven and earth shall pass away, yet his word will never fail. And you who are neither cold nor hot, hear his warning to you; and when you hear, tremble before him, at your certain doom, unless you speedily repent of your luke-warmness. "I will spue thee out of my mouth," is his unchangeable decree: Reject and cast you off forever. The Lord now knocks at your door—O, hear his voice and live, v. 20.

V. 17. "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased in goods, and have need of nothing, and knowest that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor and blind, and naked." Here are other striking traits of the Laodicean church presented. The goods which they supposed they possess, and made them rich, must be the same that are mentioned in the next verse, which the Lord counsels them to buy of him, that they may be rich, which, evidently, is the durable riches of his word; or which his word imparts to all who believe and obey it. He counsels no one to become rich only in faith, knowledge, grace, and every good work. The Laodiceans thought they were rich in these things, but were not.

Humiliating and painful as it is to say it, we believe we as a people, are the subjects of this prophecy. If we are not, most certainly we bear the description which the pen of inspiration has here given. There may, as in the other churches, be some few exceptions, but they are few. Look at which of the different divisions among us you please, and you find each talking, and some boasting of their spiritual riches, but when weighed in the scale of truth and righteousness, they are found greatly wanting. We desire to deal plainly with ourself and with others; the case demands it; and the word of the Lord requires it at our hand.

"Let no one murmur at the chastenings of the Lord; they are designed for our good; "for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." Great have been our chastisements for a few months past—and we have been worthy—for as a people, we have departed from the faith, confidence, hope, zeal and lovely spirit of that gospel in which we at first stood.—Our Lord knew we would do it, and made provision for our backslidings in his instructions to the Laodicean church. Rend his counsel in verse 18, and I hear what he says in verse 19. "As many as I love." Blessed be his name, he loves his honest yet deceived and erring children still.

"I rebuke and chasten" He has done it, and is doing it, as we all well know; for which we should love him more fervently, and for which, as he commands us we should "be zealous, therefore, and repent." "Zealous" yes, burning hot in repenting of all our backslidings—there is no time to lose. The last offers of mercy are now tendered to you—you are the last church in the seven, and doubtless you are the last that will ever exist before the coming of the Lord. He stands at the door and will soon come and if not ready to meet him you will be lost. But if you are zealous in repenting—obey his counsel—buy of him gold, that you may be rich—white raiment, that you may be clothed—and eye-salve, that you may see, and overcome: then you may claim with confidence and joyful hope the following exceeding great and precious promise: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." v. 21.

Mr. Marsh, in giving the language of one portion of Advent believers, says—

"We are satisfied with our position; and as a general thing we have the truth—are much better off than the surrounding churches which have rejected the doctrine of the coming of Christ and his kingdom. In short, they suppose they are "increased in goods, and have need of nothing." And what renders their case alarming in the extreme, is, they cannot be made to see and feel their poverty. Or as the Word says, "knowest not that thou art wretched and miserable," as every one must be who wavers, or does not hold fast the profession of their faith; "and poor," not rich in faith, "and blind." * * * Much of the past has become darkness to them! "And naked;" faith, an important part of their armor, is lost, or is merely nominal. They are not strong in the faith, giving glory to God. That this is the condition of not a few among us cannot be denied."

Do you inquire "what is the present truth—the gold tried in the fire, the eye-salve," &c.? I answer, "the commandments of God, and the testimony of Jesus Christ." Said John, "The dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." Rev. xii, 17.

"Bind up the testimony, seal the law (the ten commandments) among my disciples." Isa. viii; 16. A part of the third angel's message is—"Here is the patience of the saints, here are they that keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." The commandments here referred to, are those which were engraved in two tables of stone, "written with the finger of God." Nine of them are universally admitted to be binding on mankind. But the fourth, the Holy Sabbath commandment, is trodden under foot and must be restored, and this breach be made up before the third angel finishes his message and before it can be truly said, "here are they that keep the commandments of God." It is highly necessary that we also "remember," and confess "all the way" the Lord our God has led us in our Advent experience, which brings us to the keeping of his commandments under the voice of the third angel.

He has humbled us to prove us, to know what was in our heart, whether we would keep his commandments or no. And he has humbled us, that he might make us know that man doth not live by bread only, but by EVERY WORD that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord, doth man live. Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways and to fear him. See Deut. viii. 2-6. But perhaps you are ready to say that this all belonged to the Jews and has nothing to do with us. We will look at this point directly, and try to show you your mistake; and that your position is without foundation in the word of God.

Then I repeat it, let us "remember ALL the way the Lord" our God "led" us, through the proclamation of the hour (or time) of his judgment, the fall of Babylon, and the midnight cry. These messages brought us to the shut door, and an open door, which brought the commandments of God to our view.

"And the temple of God [the most holy place within the second vail] was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament," or ten commandments.

But you say "I do not believe the door is shut, for I believe there has been true conversions since 1844; we are now in the gleanings time after the great harvest has been reaped." To this I answer, after the harvest is reaped, then there must be a time for the threshing, and then the fanning, and the gathering the wheat into the garner. See Isa. xxi, 10; Matt. iii, 12.

But I, with you, want all the standing heads of WHEAT gleaned out of the field, and let them be threshed and winnowed and the wheat be gathered into the garner but remember that when the wheat and the tares were ripe, and the harvest reaped, it was then too late to convert ripe tares into wheat.

We may glean all the standing heads of wheat, and believe in the shut door too; but let us take good care that we leave the tares in the field, for they are of no value to us.

It is not my design here to enter into the proof of the shut door, but barely state what door is shut, and what door is opened.

The Lord told Moses to make him a Sanctuary, and to make all things according to the pattern showed to him in the Mount. And we learn from Paul that these were patterns of things in the heavens; the figures of the true, into which Christ has entered, and is a minister of the Sanctuary, and of the true Tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man.

In the typical Sanctuary were two apartments; the holy and the most holy places separated by the second vail. The first vail was the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the second vail was the door into the most holy place. When this second door was opened, the first thing that was seen was the ARK, which stood right at the entrance of the door; and in that ark were the two tables of stone, tables of the covenant, the ten commandments. And upon the ark was the mercy-seat, shadowed by the cherubims of glory. "Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always [daily] into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God: But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, ["on the tenth of the seventh month,"] not without blood," &c. Again Paul says, these priests "served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Now let us follow the example and shadow a little farther.—The high priest on the tenth day of the seventh month was arrayed in the holy linen garments, the mitre and the holy crown upon his head, the onyx stones upon his shoulders; on them were graven the names of the children of Israel, and the breast plate of judgment, in which was the Urim and Thummim, and twelve precious stones in four rows, in which was graven the names of the children of Israel. See Ex. xxviii.

Thus all Israel that were within the reach of salvation were embraced in the twelve tribes, and were borne by the high priest into the most holy place, on the breast plate of judgment, when he went in to make atonement for the blotting out of their sins. See Heb. xii, 24; Acts iii, 19, and cleansing the Sanctuary from the sins of Israel, and removing them from it, putting them upon the head of the scape-goat. See Lev. xvi. They were to afflict their souls in the day of atonement, and "whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people." See Lev. xxiii, 27-32. There was to be "no man in the tabernacle of the congregation," when the high priest entered the most holy place. See Lev. xvi, 17. The DOOR of the tabernacle of the congregation was shut on that day, and the DOOR into the most holy place WAS OPENED.

Now let us hear what Jesus, our high priest says to the Philadelphia Church. "And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write; These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that OPENETH and NO MAN SHUTTETH; and SHUTTETH, and NO MAN OPENETH: I know thy works: behold, I have set before thee an OPEN DOOR, and NO MAN CAN SHUT it." See Rev. iii, 7-13. Here we have a shut door and an open door to the Philadelphia Church. The shut door is the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and no man can open it, or find admittance in through that door. The open door is the door into the most holy place, within the second vail, called in Rev. xi, 19, "the temple of God; and there was seen in his temple the ARK of his TESTAMENT," the ten commandments.

Let it be remembered that in the pattern, the most holy place within the second vail, was the only place where the ark of the ten commandments was kept, and could not be opened or entered only on the tenth day of the seventh month, on pain of death. So also, on the tenth day of the seventh month, 1844, at the termination of the 2,300 days, the time appointed to cleanse the Sanctuary, the most holy place of the Sanctuary, or true Temple in Heaven, was opened under the sounding of the seventh angel, and there was seen (by faith, by the little flock,) the ark of His testament," the ten commandments. See Rev. xi, 19. At that time we came to the "blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel." See Heb. xii, 24; and to the blotting out of the sins of the whole house of Israel. See Acts iii, 19-21.

Christ has not entered the holiest of all, of the heavenly Sanctuary, yearly, since the ascension, to blot out sins, and cleanse the Sanctuary, "for then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world." "But now ONCE in the end of the world," [at the end of the 2,300 days,] hath he appeared [in the holiest of all] to PUT AWAY sin, by virtue of the sacrifice of himself, [on Calvary.] See Heb. ix, 22-28.—Jesus, our High Priest, PUTS "AWAY SIN" by blotting it out, and removing it from the Sanctuary, to the land of separation on the scape-goat. At the end of the 2,300 days, our high priest bore into the most holy, on the breast plate of judgment; all who were within the reach of salvation.

And among those that were borne in, I believe, were some that had not had the light on the second advent doctrine, and had not rejected it, but were living according to the best light they had. And I believe also, that there were others who had a sacred reverence for God and his word, and had his fear before their eyes, yet they made no profession of religion, or of conversion, but in the sight of God who sees not as man sees, they were much nearer a state of justification before God, than very many who made a great profession of religion. Again, children who had not arrived to years of accountability were borne in on the breast plate of judgment. These three classes are the standing heads of wheat to be gleaned, and gathered in from the field. The Lord will see that the present truth is given to all these, and if they receive and obey the truth their sins will be blotted out and "put away." But if they reject the present truth, their names will be blotted out, and they will be cut off from the house of Israel forever. Many of the above named will be raised up to take the garments and the crowns of those who have backslidden and become luke-warm. Said Jesus, to the Philadelphia Church, "Behold I come quickly: hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." Again, "Behold I come as a thief; blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his shame."

Oh that you would be entreated to buy gold tried in the fire, and white raiment that the shame of your nakedness do not appear, and anoint your eyes with eye salve, that you may see; and be rebuked and chastened, and be zealous and repent, lest you be spued out of his mouth, and be disinherited, as those were who rebelled in the wilderness of Paran. Those were examples of the Laodicean Church. But Caleb and Joshua, who wholly followed the Lord, were the example of the Philadelphia Church, which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. Read with care Num. xiv; 11, 12, 22-24, 37, 38.

God's purpose was to take them, at once, into the promised land, but for their rebellion they had to learn and know his breach of promise, (margin, altering of his purpose,) by being disinherited. So also now those who have not kept their garments, but lost them, and some one else has taken their crowns, instead of their sins being blotted out, their names will be blotted out of the book of life, and they will be cut off from the house of Israel forever. We are in the "wilderness of the people," see Eze. xx, 35-38, where all the rebels will be purged out.

Some suppose that if the door is shut, there can be no more repentance unto life, or forgiveness of sins.—This is certainly a mistake. All who were borne in on the breast plate of judgment, and have not sinned wilfully, may repent and find forgiveness. Jesus says to the Laodiceans, "as many as I love I rebuke and chasten, be zealous, therefore, and repent." Again, in the type, on the tenth day of the seventh month, the daily; the morning and evening sacrifice, and other offerings for the forgiveness of sins were kept up. See Num. xxix, 7-11.

But we will come again to the Sabbath truth; and we hope that you will lay aside all prejudice, and lose sight of the humble writer, and not reject the truth of God on account of the unworthiness of the feeble instrument, through which it may be brought before your mind. And oh, may the Lord guide us into his truth, that we may see it in all its clearness and simplicity.

But, as I said before, when we urge the claims of the Sabbath, you are ready to give all that is written in the bible on this subject to the Jews; and say it was given to them as a peculiar people, under peculiar circumstances, and that the Sabbath was binding upon them; but not on us Gentiles. You call it the Jewish Sabbath, or Sabbath of the Jews. But the seventh day Sabbath is no where in the bible called the Jewish Sabbath. It is called the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. He calls it "MY HOLY DAY." Jesus says,

"The Sabbath was made for MAN." We are men; then it was made for us.

But the principle which leads you to take the position that those scriptures relating to the Sabbath, have nothing to do with us, or are not binding upon us, if carried out, would aim a deadly blow at the foundation, and unsettle and evade the force of all truth. In the days of the first advent, the scribes and pharisees could say, if we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets; but Jesus told them that they filled up the measure of their fathers, and that all the righteous blood shed upon the earth from the blood of righteous Abel, unto the blood of Zacharias, whom ye slew between the porch and the altar. Verily I say unto you, all these things shall come upon this generation. This was fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem, A. D. 70. This was but a figure or an example of what will befall the professed church of these last days, called "Babylon." "And in her was found the blood of prophets and of saints and of all that were slain upon the earth." Again said Jesus, "Suppose ye that those Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things," &c? "or those eighteen upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and slew them," &c. "I tell you nay, but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." The principle by which you reject the Sabbath, contradicts the testimony of the prophets and of Jesus Christ, and his apostles.

Said the Son of God, "Think not that I am come to subvert the law, or the prophets; I am not come to subvert, but to ratify. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be in no esteem in the reign of heaven." (See Campbell's translation. James says, "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty." Said Paul—"As many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law. For not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified." Again, "Whosoever [that is, ALL that] was written afore time, was written for our learning; that we, through patience, and comfort of the scriptures might have hope." Once more, "ALL scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable," &c.

How can these testimonies be true, on the principle by which you reject the Sabbath truth?

FORMER THINGS OF OLD, DECLARING THE END.

"The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done, is that which shall be done; and there is no new thing under the sun. Is there any thing wherof it may be said: See, this is new? it hath been already of old time which was before us." Eccl. i, 9-10.

"That which hath been is now, and that which is to be hath already been, and God requireth that which is past." Chap iii, 15.

"Remember the former things of old, for I am God, and there is none else: I am God, and there is none like me: Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done." Isa. xlv, 9, 10. See Deut. xxxii, 7, 8.

"Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples; (margin typeset) as they are written for OUR admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come." Cor. x. 11.

Let us now examine some of the former things of ancient time, which declare the end, and compare them with the things now being done. While Israel was in Egyptian bondage, they were not permitted to keep the Holy Sabbath; but God set his hand to deliver them, and with a high hand, and an outstretched arm, brought he them out of it, and led them by a pillar of cloud by day, and by a pillar of fire by night. And when they had reached the wilderness by the Red Sea, which was before them, and the Egyptians behind them, the pillar of fire which was before them, and had led them on, removed from before them and went behind them, and shut down between them and the Egyptians. It was light to Israel, but dark to the Egyptians, so that they came not near each other all that night.

The above is an example of God's setting his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, and by the proclamation of the hour of his judgment, the fall of Babylon and the midnight cry, he brought them out of spiritual Egypt, into the wilderness of the people, and when we passed the midnight cry, our pillar of light was behind us. It is indeed dark to our enemies, so that they come not near us; but it is light to us, while we remember all the way the Lord our God has led us. The proclamation of '43, the fall of Babylon, and the midnight cry, are sure way marks, and are our pillar of fire behind us, which sheds a brilliant light upon our pathway.—When Israel had crossed the Red Sea, and were free from Egyptian bondage, the Lord reminded them of his Holy Sabbath, and said, "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments, and my laws, for see that the Lord hath given you the Sabbath." So also now the first important truth brought to our minds after we came into the wilderness of the people, this side of '44, was the Sabbath truth. It has been ringing in our ears, "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments, and my laws." Israel coming to Mount Sinai, was an example of our coming to Mount Zion, the city of the living God. See Heb. xii, 18-22. And God speaking the ten commandments [which were the strength and glory of Israel; as they passed over Jordan, and had power over the nations of Canaan] from Sinai, whose voice then shook the earth, is a lively example of His roaring out of Zion, and uttering his voice from Jerusalem. Then he will "shake not the earth only, but also heaven," verse 26. At this time God's covenant keeping people, the remnant, have "power over the nations."

And while Moses was in the holy mount with God, receiving the ten commandments, engraven on the tables of stone by his finger, [an example of their afterwards being written in the hearts of God's people, by the Holy Spirit; see ii Cor. iii, 3; Heb. viii, 9, 10,] the people became impatient, by the delay of Moses, and said to Aaron, "Up, make us gods which shall go before us: for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him." Ex. xxxii, 1. They made a golden calf, an image to a beast, and offered sacrifice to it.

This is a vivid example of the disappointment, and the impatience of advent believers after the midnight cry was given. They expected that Jesus, [the antitypical Moses] would then descend from heaven, but being disappointed, and impatient, many of them organized at the Albany conference, in 1845, and made to themselves leaders to go before them. Thus doing, they have turned round, and are trying to build up what they once tore down, in exposing the corruptions of the churches, and church organization, during the cry, —Babylon is fallen.

Read the history of Israel, and the virtue of the ten commandments in the ark, in passing over Jordan, which signifies judgment. Let it be remembered, they came up out of Jordan on the tenth day of the first month, and the captain of the Lord's host appeared with a drawn sword in his hand. And the Lord said unto Joshua, "This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you." With the ark of the ten commandments, they compassed the walls of Jerico seven days and seven times on the seventh day. Then there was a mighty shout, and the walls of Jerico fell down flat and they took the city. They went on taking city after city, and driving out the nations; but they could do nothing without the ark of God. Thus they took the typical land of Canaan.

All this was typical of the saints finally taking the kingdom under the whole heaven. This is among the former things of old, to be remembered as declaring the end from ancient times, the things that are not yet done. And as ancient Israel could have no power over the nations of typical Canaan without the ten commandments, so none but those who keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus, will receive power over the nations, when the saints take the kingdom.

Again, the unbelief of the Jews in rejecting the first Advent, and the consequent judgments, in the destruction of their city and temple, shadow forth the unbelief of the professed church in rejecting the second Advent, and the consequent seven last plagues to be poured on Babylon.

Now we may understand the application of our Saviour's words, in answer to the question, "When shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" We see clearly that one is a figure or example of the other. And although it was necessary for the Christians at the destruction of Jerusalem, to pray that their flight might not be in the winter, or on the Sabbath day, yet it is among the things of which it is said—"That which hath been, is that which shall be." We see that the instructions of our Saviour in answer to the above question, applies with much greater force to the "day when the Son of Man is revealed," and to the "time of trouble, such as never was," than to the destruction of Jerusalem. "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man." "Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot." See Luke xvii, 20-37. These were also examples of the end of the world. "Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed."

"In that day, [Campbell renders it "on that day,"] let not h'n who shall be on the house-top, having his furniture in the house, come down to take it away. Let not h'm who shall be in the field return home.—Remember Lot's wife. Whoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it, and whosoever shall throw it away shall preserve it. I tell you there will be two men in the one bed; one will be seized, and the other will ESCAPE. Two women will be grinding together; one will be seized, and the other will ESCAPE. Two men will be in the field; one will be seized, and the other will ESCAPE." Compare with this Eze. vii, 16. This will be the time of Jacob's trouble. "Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it: it is even the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it." See Jer. xxx, 6, 7. This will be when the image of the beast shall both speak, and cause that as many as will not "worship the image" shall be "killed." This will be "the hour of temptation which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the face of the earth." Then we shall need to "pray that our flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day."

Perhaps some may be disposed to confine this to the days of Papal persecution, because Matthew says, "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place," &c. And again, because he says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days," &c. And Mark says, "In THOSE DAYS after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall," &c. As the sun and moon were darkened in 1780, and the stars fell in 1833, the tribulation, which was just before these signs was the Papal persecutions. Very well, Jesus then recognized the perpetuity, and obligation of the Holy Sabbath, down the stream of time as late as the days of the Papal tribulation. And surely Jesus could not have taught his disciples to pray that their flight be not on the Sabbath day, on account of the Jews preventing them from fleeing on the Sabbath day, as some say, in the days of Papal tribulation. The Jews were previously scattered among all nations, and were at that time slaves and bondmen. The perpetuity and obligation of the Sabbath is, by our Saviour, recognized clear down to the end of the world, even in the time of Jacob's trouble.

The signs in the sun, moon and stars are to be re-acted over, in the time of Jacob's troubles, in the great day of the Lord. Joel clearly teaches the darkening of the sun, moon and stars yet in the future. See Joel ii, 10, 11; iii, 15, 16; Isa. xiii, 9, 10; Eze. xxxii, 7, 8. So we see that, "that which hath been is that which shall be, even down to the latest period in the end of the world."

I have not space to take up all the objections to the Sabbath, such as Col. ii, 14-17; ii Cor. iii, 7-15; and Rom. xiv. For an answer to these and other pretended objections I must refer you to Bro. James White's pamphlet, "Present Truth, No. 1," or his reply to Joseph Marsh's article—seventh day Sabbath abolished. He has clearly and satisfactorily answered these objections, to every candid person who is earnestly seeking after the truth.

ELIJAH THE PROPHET.

"Behold I send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord."—Mal. iv, 5. Said Jesus, 'Elias truly shall first come and restore all things;' The work of Elijah, in the last days, is to restore, to 'raise up the foundations of many generations,' repair the breach in the law of God, and to restore the true worship of the true God. Those who are engaged in this restoration, are the Elijah that was to immediately precede the second advent, the same as was John the Baptist, who went before Jesus, in the spirit and power of Elijah, at the first advent.

Let me here call your attention to some of the most important points in the very interesting history of Elijah, in the days of Ahab, and his wife Jezebel. This history is one of the most important things of old to be remembered as declaring, from ancient times, the things that are now being done. Please read the entire history in I Kings, xvi, 29, to Chap. xxii: II Kings i and ii Chap's; also Chap's ix and x. Compare I Kings xvi, 31-34, with Deut. vii, 3, 4; Jos. vi, 26.

Ahab did evil above all that were before him. This is an example of the wickedness in the end of the world, which is above all that has ever been before it. Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, is a figure or example of the Catholic Church, see Rev. ii, 20. Jezebel was finally thrown down from an upper loft, and trodden under-foot of horses, so that nothing but the skull and feet and palms of her hands were to be found, and her blood was upon the wall, and upon the horses, and her carcass was dung upon the face of the field.

This is a striking figure of Mystery Babylon, the Jezebel of these last days about to be thrown down, and trodden in the wine-press of the wrath of God.—Jezebel slew all the prophets of the Lord except Elijah. So Jezebel, the Catholic Church, has slain her millions of Christians.

Balaam was a magician, and used enchantments, and was sought unto by kings, to bless them, and to curse their enemies. See Num. xxii, 6, 7. He seems to be a figure, or example of the pope, who has acted the part of Balaam in blessing and cursing. He has professed to be God's vicar on earth. For proof that Balaam is an example of the pope, read Rev. ii, 14.—Holding the 'DOCTRINE OF BALAAM,' in this text, has reference to the doctrine of the Catholic Church.

Jannes and Jambres, according to Jasher, were the two sons of Balaam. He was present when they withstood Moses. They exercised the same power of enchantment that their father, Balaam, had exercised. They deceived Pharaoh and the Egyptians, by means of those miracles which they had power to do.—'That which hath been is that which shall be.' This is an example of the two-horned beasts [Rev. xiii, 11-18] which 'exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and he doeth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down on the earth in the sight of men, and deceiveth them that dwell on the earth, by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast.' 'As Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these RESIST THE TRUTH, men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith: But they shall proceed no farther, for their folly shall be made manifest, as theirs also was.' ii Tim. iii, 1-9.

The worshippers of Balaam made an image to supply the place of Balaam. So also the two-horned beast will cause them that dwell on the earth, to make an image to the first beast before him. And those who worship the beast and his image, may properly be called Balaam's worshippers, and the worshippers of Baal.

Elijah prophesied before Ahab, that there should be neither dew nor rain these years, but according to my word.' Then the Lord said to Elijah 'Get thee hence and hide thyself by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan.' There was a sore famine in Samaria. This was an example of the proclamation of the advent, up to 1844. From that time to 1848, three and a-half years, God's true people were hid and trodden underfoot; buried under the rubbish, and spurious coin, dust and shavings, as Br. Miller saw in his dream. And there was a sore famine in the land. 'Not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord,' Amos viii, 11. There was neither dew nor rain of the Spirit. The religious periodicals teemed with articles headed 'FAMINE OF THE SPIRIT,' and 'GREAT SPIRITUAL DEARTH,' &c.

While Elijah was hid by Jordan, the people supposed he was dead. So also after '44, the funeral sermon of Millerism was preached, and many supposed, that Millerism was dead.

But the Lord said to Elijah, 'go shew thyself unto Ahab.' So at the end of three and a half years, Elijah went to shew himself unto Ahab.' So also, the word of the Lord contained in the sealing message of the third angel came to the true people of God, more clearly in 1848, after they had been hid in the wilderness of the people three and a half years. The angel began to ascend from the east, having the seal of the living God, even from the way that Elijah went to hide himself before Jordan. Yes, in 1848, the light of God's last sealing truth began to dawn upon the scattered church. And she began to look forth from the wilderness, as the morning, then fair as the moon, next clear as the sun. And is destined to 'receive power over the nations,' and be 'terrible as an army with banners.' See Sol. Songs iii, 6; viii, 5; vi, 10.

But when Elijah went to show himself unto Ahab: Ahab said unto Elijah, 'Art thou he that TROUBLETH ISRAEL.' So also it is now, when we urge the keeping of all of the commandments of God, we are charged with troubling Israel, and sowing discord, and of causing divisions, &c.

Some notices of this character have appeared in the 'Advent Herald,' and the 'Advent Harbinger.'

The most prominent Advent preacher in Canada West, said to Br. Holt when we were there, 'I wish you would not present this subject here, (referring to the Sabbath question,) for it will make me so much more LABOR and TROUBLE.'

But we will answer them in the language of Elijah to Ahab. We 'have not troubled Israel: but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have FORSAKEN THE COMMANDMENTS OF THE LORD, AND THOU HAST FOLLOWED BALAAM,' (the Pope.) The commandments of God, then was the message of Elijah when he came out of the wilderness. His work was to restore the keeping of the commandments of the Lord, which constituted the true worship of the true God.

By remembering these former things of old, declaring the end from ancient times, the things now being done, we learn our present position, present duty, and the work before us.

In contemplating this subject, I am led to exclaim, 'O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out.'

But when Elijah had called the people together he said unto them, 'HOW LONG HALT YE BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS. If the Lord be God, follow him, [keep his commandments] but if Baal, then follow him.'

Now go with me back of 1844, before the Sabbath question came up among us. Most if not all of you then regarded Sunday as holy, sanctified time, and looked with religious horror on those who violated it. And why did you regard it as holy time? I answer, because the fourth commandment in the decalogue, required you to remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. But when the Sabbath question came up, your leaders, instead of stepping into the gap, to help make up the breach, for the house of Israel to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord, went about to try to prove that Jesus Christ and his apostles kept the first day of the week as holy time, instead of the Sabbath of the bible.

But being driven from this false refuge, their next resort was to take shelter under the no Sabbath wall, which they themselves have built, daubing it with untempered mortar; and they have made many 'to hope that they would confirm the word.' [No Sabbath position.]

But unless you speedily make your escape from this false refuge, the storm of Jehovah's burning wrath will very soon overtake you, which will not only destroy the wall, but those who have built it, and daubed it with untempered mortar. See Eze. xiii.

The two opinions, between which you are halting, are God's Holy Sabbath, and the Pope's Sunday—you are neither one thing nor the other—you neither follow God, in keeping his Sabbath, nor Balaam, by regarding the Pope's Sunday as holy time. You are neither cold nor hot, but lukewarm, thinking that you are rich, and increased in goods, and have need of nothing, and know not that you are poor, and miserable, and blind, and naked. As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is no safety or salvation where you are. If you remain where you are, according to the testimony of the faithful and true Witness, He will spue you out of his mouth. O! will you, having come thus far, stop short of the kingdom? Break away from the enchanted ground. With feeling hearts we say to you in the language of Moses, 'Come thou with us and we will do thee good, for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel.'

But we can take no middle ground with you. God has forbidden it. See Jer. xv. 19-21. Elijah wished to bring the truth of his mission to a test, and requested them to bring two bullocks and they would prepare the sacrifice and put the wood and sacrifice in order, but put no fire under, and they might call on Baal. And he would call on the name of the Lord, and the God that answered by fire, let him be God. So they made ready the sacrifice, and the prophets of Baal called on Baal from morning till noon. Then Elijah mocked them, and said 'cry aloud, he is a God, either he is talking, or pursuing, or in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth and must be awaked. So they cried aloud, and cut themselves saying 'O Baal, hear us.' But no answer came.

And at the time of the evening sacrifice, Elijah called the people unto him, and he repaired the altar of the Lord that was broken down, and dug a trench about the altar, and put on the wood and the sacrifice. And he told them to fill four barrels of water, and pour it on the burnt sacrifice, and on the wood. They did it the second time, and the third time. In all, twelve barrels full, and the water ran round about the altar, and filled the trench also with water.

Then Elijah prayed, saying 'Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at thy word. Hear me, O Lord, hear me, that this people may know that thou art the Lord God, and that thou hast turned their heart back again.'

'Then the fire of the Lord fell and consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench. And when all the people saw it, they fell on their faces, and they said the Lord, he is the God! the Lord, he is the God.'

Here Elijah finished his message, and work of restoring the commandments of God, and turning back the hearts of a remnant, to follow God in keeping his commandments: And proved his message and work to be of God, by fire; which was an example of every minister's work, being tried by fire in the end of the world.

As Paul teaches us, 'every man's [minister's] work, shall be manifest, for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's [minister's] work, of what sort it is.'

And then Elijah prayed seven times for the Lord to send rain. First, there was a cloud like a man's hand, and the heavens became black with clouds, and there was a great rain. And Ahab rode and went to JEZREEL, 'And the hand of the Lord was on Elijah; and he girded up his loins, and ran before Ahab, to the entrance of Jezreel.'

This was a figure of entering the great day of the Lord. 'For great shall be the day of Jezreel.' Hosea i, 11. The rain that was sent in answer to the prayer of Elijah, was a figure or example of the latter rain, the time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, which will come upon the remnant, just at their entering the great day of the Lord, to prepare them to endure the time of trouble.

After entering Jezreel, (a figure of entering the great day of the Lord,) Ahab told Jezebel all that Elijah had done, that he had turned the hearts of the people from following Balaam, to follow the Lord in keeping his commandment; and had cut off the prophets of Baal. Then Jezebel sent a messenger unto Elijah, saying, 'So let the gods do to me, and more also, if I make not thy life as the life of one of them by to-morrow about this time.' Here then is a decree of Jezebel, that Elijah should be killed. Then Elijah 'arose, and went for his life,' and fled into the wilderness, and so escaped the hand of Jezebel.

This is an example of the decree of Jezebel, the image of the beast, that will both speak, and cause that as many as will not worship the image should be killed. This will be in the great day of JEZREEL, or day of the Lord. As Elijah had to flee for his life, so also, all that will not worship the image, will have to flee for their lives. This is the time Jesus refers to when he says, "But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." 'In that day (when the Son of man is revealed) he which is on the house-top and his stuff in the house, let him not come down to take it away; and he that is in the field, let him likewise not return back. REMEMBER LOT'S WIFE. Whosoever shall seek to save his life, [by submitting to worship the image,] shall lose it' [in drinking the wine of God's wrath in the seven last plagues,] and whosoever shall lose his life, [as Daniel and the three Hebrews did,] shall preserve it, [as their lives were preserved.]

Some tell us that we must be subject to the powers that be. This we mean to do.

The decree of Darius was that all men should cease praying for thirty days, to any God or king but Darius, or be cast into the den of lions. Daniel submitted to the latter. The decree of Nebuchadnezzar was that all should worship the image which he had set up, or be cast into the burning fiery furnace. The three Hebrews submitted to the latter. Thus they were subject to the powers that were. This image and decree was but an example of the image of the beast, and the decree, that as many as will not worship the image of the beast, shall be killed. 'That which hath been, is that which shall be done.'

But Jesus said 'I tell you in that night there shall be two in one bed, one will be seized and the other will escape.' And two at the mill; and two in the field; one will be seized and the other will ESCAPE. This will be the time of Jacob's trouble; as it was with Elijah when he escaped the hand of Jezebel, and fled into the wilderness, and came and sat down under a juniper tree, and wished for himself, that he might die. And as he slept, the angel touched him, saying, 'arise and eat,' and he arose and eat, and went in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights, unto Horeb, the Mount of God. Here Elijah saw the mountains rent, and the rocks broken to pieces, and a mighty earthquake, &c. This is an example of our coming, not to Horeb, that might be touched, and that burned with blackness and darkness, &c., but as Paul says, ye are come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the Heavenly Jerusalem, &c., where we shall hear the voice of God, when he shall 'roar out of Zion and utter his voice from Jerusalem,' and shake the heavens and the earth.

Then the Lord said to Elijah, go and anoint Hazael, Jehu and Elisha. The object of this anointing was that they should slay all the house of Ahab and Jezebel, and all the prophets and worshippers of Baal, and break down the image and house of Baal, and destroy Baal out of Israel. This was accomplished in Jezreel. See ii Kings ix, 6-10, 30-37; x, 1-38. This was a striking example of the anointing of the saints, [Isa. x, 26, 27] and their receiving power over the nations. 'And he that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations; And he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter, shall they be broken to shivers; even as I received of my father.' Rev. ii, 26, 27.

The fury of Jehu is but an example of the fury which will be manifested in the great day of the Lord's wrath. The Lord also told Elijah that he had reserved him 'all the knees which had not bowed unto Baal.' These were an example of those who will not now worship the beast nor his image. 'That which hath been is that which shall be.'

THE THIRD ANGEL'S MESSAGE.

In the fourteenth chapter of Revelations, we have a series of angels, five in number, whose work carry us down to the treading of the wine press of the wrath of God.

The first angel was a message of warning and mercy to the world, and nominal church. The rejection of this message, by the churches proved their FALL. This prepared the way for the second angel to follow, saying, 'Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city,' &c. This brought God's people out of Babylon, and made them a free people, and prepared them to receive and obey the third angel's message, which they could not have obeyed while in Babylon, no more than Israel could have kept the Holy Sabbath, while they were bondmen and slaves in Egypt.

And the third angel FOLLOWED THEM saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation, &c."

From the solemn declaration of the third angel, we see that it is of the utmost importance that we understand clearly what the beast is, and what his image is, and what is his mark, and what constitutes his worship, in order that we may avoid their worship, and their mark, and escape drinking the wine of the wrath of God.

Would God put forth such a solemn declaration, attaching such a great penalty to be inflicted on all who do not avoid the mark and worship of the beast and his image, and then leave us in the dark to guess what these things mean?

Will any man say that we do not and can not understand, from the bible, what constitutes the mark, and the worship of the beast and his image? Such a position would charge God with folly, and the height of injustice!

The clear truth, most certainly, exists on this point, and it is not only the privilege, but the duty of all of God's dear children to search and ascertain the clear truth on this point.

O, may God Almighty help us to learn and know this truth, and escape the storm of his indignant wrath, that is about to burst, with all the fury of a sin-avenging God, upon the heads of all who have the mark of the beast, and his image.

From the manner in which the third angel introduces the subject of the beast and his image, it is manifest that they had been previously brought to view.—Just before introducing the prophetic advent history of Chap. xiv, we have in Chap. xiii a description of the beast and his image, and their mark and worship, referred to by the third angel.

The beast then, whose mark and worship we are to avoid, is the one with seven heads and ten horns, of Chap. xiii, which made war with the saints, and overcame them; and had power given him to continue forty and two months, 1260 years; at the end of which he received a deadly wound by a sword, and was led into captivity. This was somewhere between 1798 and 1809, when a quarrel of no short standing, between Bonaparte and the Pope, reached its crisis.—The following is from Lockhart's Napoleon, vol. 2, pages 89, 90, 91:—

"General Mollis took military possession of Rome in Feb., 1809." "On the 17th of May, Napoleon issued his final decree from Vienna, declaring the temporal sovereignty of the Pope to be wholly at an end; incorporating Rome with the French Empire; declaring it to be his second city, settling a pension on the holy father, in his spiritual capacity, and appointing a committee of administration of the civil government of Rome. The Pope was arrested and dispatched, under a strong escort, to Savona and from thence conveyed across the Alps to Grenoble, and from thence he was removed to Fontainebleau, where he continued a prisoner during more than three years, viz. till, in the general darkening of his own fortune, the imperial jailer was compelled to adopt another line of conduct."

The above history shows clearly that a deadly wound

by a sword (military power) was inflicted upon the Papal head, and that he went into captivity. At this point, John saw another beast COMING UP—not yet up, but coming up—having two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon. Now it is certain that this two horned beast does not apply to the reign of Bonaparte, for this good reason—that Bonaparte was then already in the height of his power. Neither did he ever exercise ALL the power of the Papal beast, or do the miracles to be accomplished by the two horned beast.

In this chapter John sees the first beast wounded as it were to death, and go into captivity. Then he sees the two horned beast coming up, which causes them that dwell on the earth to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed, and which causes an image to be made to the first beast, and gives "life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed."

In Chap. xvii, John is carried away in the Spirit into the wilderness, and here he sees a woman seated on a scarlet colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. This is the image of the first beast.

The angel, after giving John this view of the image, then steps back with him to the point where the first beast received his deadly wound and went into captivity, and where John saw the two horned beast COMING UP. At this point the angel talks with John, and gives him an explanation of the seven heads and the ten horns. He says, the seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth. Some would tell us that these seven mountains are the seven literal hills of earth on which the city of Rome is built.—But how could one of those literal hills of earth be wounded to death by a sword, and then be healed again? This cannot be the correct view.

When the stone smites the metallic image upon his feet, THEN "the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold" will be "broken to pieces TOGETHER." "And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion." Rev. xiii, 2.

These texts seem to authorize us to go back to the head of gold or lion, Babylon, to count the seven heads:—Babylon, one; Medo-Persia, two; Grecia, three; Rome Imperial, four; Rome Kingly, five; Rome Papal, six; and Rome Protestant, or two-horned beast, seven. Said the angel to John, "there are seven kings, five ARE FALLEN," in the past, "one is" present, (the sixth,) "and the other, (the seventh,) is not yet come," but is COMING UP. (Two horned beast.)

Mark this—John in vision, is standing at the end of the 1260 years of Papal rule, when he sees the two horned beast COMING UP.

"The beast that thou sawest, WAS and IS NOT, [because he is wounded as it were to death, and gone into captivity,] and shall ascend [future] out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition." Chap. xvii, 8. Again, "And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the EIGHTH, and is of the SEVEN, and goeth into perdition." Verse 11. This is the image; it is the son of perdition.

The two-horned beast is Protestant Rome, and is the seventh head. The two horns are civil and ecclesiastical power. The great and grand principle on which the Protestant churches have reared themselves was the right of liberty of conscience, and free toleration. This was, indeed, lamb-like. The civil power became deeply imbued with the same spirit. It protected, sustained, and upheld the churches in this principle. This was also lamb-like in the civil power. These are the "two horns like a lamb;" but he is to speak "as a dragon." "And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him." Here again we learn the great truth, "that which hath been is that which shall be done." So that by learning the history of the first beast, we may know what to expect from the latter, which "exerciseth ALL the power of the first beast before him," although he continues but a short space. He "causeth the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed."

It is said of the first beast, that he made war with the saints. Daniel gives the same testimony, and says he shall "have indignation against the HOLY COVENANT," and shall have intelligence with them that FORSAKE the holy covenant." "And such as do wickedly against the COVENANT shall be corrupt by flatteries; but the people that do know their God shall be strong and do exploits;" "yet they shall fall by the sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil many days." Once more, "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to CHANGE TIMES AND LAWS."

This text has no reference to human times and laws, but to God's times and laws—laws of the HOLY COVENANT, of which God has said, "My covenant will I not break nor ALTER the thing that is gone out of my lips." But this beast speaks great words against the Most High, and thinks to change the very laws of which He has declared that He will NEVER BREAK NOR ALTER.

I will here give a few short extracts of history from Sabbath tract No. 4, published by the New York Sabbath Tract Society:

"Early in the seventh century, in the time of Pope Gregory I, the subject of the Sabbath attracted considerable attention. Baronius, in his Councils, says, "his year (608) at Rome, St. Gregory, the Pope, corrected that error, which some preached by Jewish superstition, or the Grecian custom that it was a duty to worship on the Sabbath as likewise upon the dominical days; and he calls such preachers the preachers of Antichrist."

"The observance of the first day was not so early in England and in Scotland as in most other parts of the Roman Empire. According to Heylyn, there were Christian societies established in Scotland as early as A. D. 435; and it is supposed that the gospel was preached in England in the first century by St. Paul. For many ages after Christianity was received in these kingdoms, they paid no respect to the first day. Binius, a Catholic writer, in the second volume of his works, gives some account of the bringing into use the Dominical day (Sunday) in Scotland, as late as A. D. 1203. "This year," he says, "a council was held in Scotland concerning the introduction of the Lord's day, which council was held in 1203, in the time of Pope Innocent III," and quotes as his authority Roger Hoveden, Matth. Paris, and Lucius Eccl. Hist. He says: "By this council it was enacted that it should be holy time from the twelfth hour on Saturday noon until Monday."

Mr. Bamfield says, "The king and princes of England, in 1203, would not agree to change the Sabbath and keep the first day, by this authority."

[A letter which Eustachius Abbott, of Flay, said came down from heaven, which threatened the people with dreadful judgments, if they did not keep the first day of the week. Read it in Sabbath Tract No. 4, or Bro. White's pamphlet—Present Truth, No. 1.]

"This was in the time of King John, against whom the popish clergy had a great pique for not honoring their prelacy and the monks, by one of whom he was finally poisoned.

"The parliament of England met on Sundays until the time of Richard II., who adjourned it from that to the following day.

"In 1203, "A council was held in Scotland to inaugurate the king, and [concerning] the feast of the Sabbath.

"The Magdeburgenses say, this Council was about the observation of the Dominical day newly brought in, and that they ordained that it should be holy from the twelfth hour of Saturday even till Monday.

"The first law of England made for the keeping of Sunday, was in the time of Edward VI. about 1470. "Parliament then passed an act, by which Sunday and many holy days, the feasts of all Saints, of holy Innocents, were established as festivals by law."

From the above texts of scripture, and quotations from history, there is not a clearer revealed truth in all God's Holy Word, than that the first beast of Rev. xiii., did have indignation against the holy covenant, and did cast down the truth to the ground, by changing the keeping of holy time from the seventh, to the first day of the week, thinking thereby to CHANGE TIMES and LAWS.

Catholics themselves do not deny that their church did institute Sunday keeping instead of the observance of the seventh day, and they are proud of the honor of so doing. The pope, professing to be God's vicar on earth, claiming infallibility, claims the right to change the times and laws of God. For say they, the keys of the kingdom were delivered unto Peter, and have been held in our church by succession.

CUTTING REPROOF.

PAPISTS.—In a book called An Antidote, or Treatise of Thirty Controversies, intended as a reply to the writings of Dr. Faak, Dr. Whitaker, Dr. Field, and others, the author speaks thus: "The Word of God commandeth the seventh day to be the Sabbath of our Lord, and to be kept holy; you [Protestants] without any precept of scripture change it to the first day of the week, only authorized by our traditions. Divers English Puritans oppose against this point, that the observation of the first day is proved out of Scripture, where it is said the first day of the week Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2; Rev. i. 10. Have they not spun a fair thread, in quoting these places? If we should produce no better for purgatory and prayers for the dead, invocation of the saints, and the like, they might have good cause indeed to laugh us to scorn; for where is it written that these were Sabbath days, in which those meetings were kept? Or where is it ordained they should be always observed? Or, which is the sum of all, where is it decreed that the observation of the first day should abrogate or abolish the sanctifying of the seventh day which God commanded everlastingly to be kept holy? Not one of those is expressed in the written word of God."

In this extract the Papists justly charge the Protestants of changing the keeping of the seventh day, to the first day of the week, without any precept of scripture, "ONLY AUTHORIZED by their traditions." So says the first beast. In this, the two horned beast, Protestant Rome, has done just what was predicted that he would do, viz: "And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth, and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed."

Sunday keeping is an institution of the first beast, and all who submit to obey this institution emphatically worship the first beast, and receive his MARK, "THE MARK of the beast." This is the very identical thing, wherein the two horned beast has caused the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the first beast, and to receive his mark. The truth of God declares it and history shows its fulfilment. And I pity the man who disregards it. For "if ANY MAN worship the beast or his image, or receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation." &c. A few short months from this, and the warning notes of the sealing angel will die away, and God will set his broad seal upon this truth, by pouring out the vials of his wrath, upon those who have the mark of the beast, and upon them which worship his image. Then they will be compelled to confess this truth which they now spurn and trample under foot, viz: that Sunday keeping is the mark and worship of the beast, and that the Holy Sabbath truth is the sign, seal or mark of the living God. The message of the third angel is the last to the little flock, to prepare them for the time of trouble. When this message is finished, the four winds will be loosed. This angel is the same as the one in Chap. vii., "having the seal (or mark, as it is called in Eze. ix, 4—6,) of the living God." His work is to seal (or mark) the servants of God in their foreheads. Seal, mark and forehead are figurative language in these texts. See Chap. xvii, 5; Eze. iii, 8, 9. All must see that forehead in these texts refers to a prominent development of character, and that the mark in the forehead means the most prominent characteristic mark in the lives, profession, or conduct of those referred to.

And all must admit that there is no point of religious faith, so prominent in the Roman world, as that of Sunday keeping, and that there is no other principle in their religious character, upon which such unity of faith exists as upon Sunday keeping. In this the great majority of the Roman world are agreed. This is their most prominent characteristic MARK, and it is "of the beast."

The third angel is raising his loud and warning voice against worshipping the beast, or receiving his mark, and has he no mark to administer? Yes, he has the seal [or mark] of the living God. What is it? Keeping "the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." Why is it said HERE are they that keep the commandments of God? Evidently because one of them had been cast down to the ground, and trodden under foot for more than 1200 years. And although the other nine had been kept, yet it could not be said that they were keeping THE COMMANDMENTS, because it is written, "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, but shall fail with respect to ONE PRECEPT, hath become guilty of all." [Campbell.]

Therefore the trodden down commandment must be restored and kept, before it can be said, "HERE are they that keep the COMMANDMENTS OF GOD." Nine of them are universally admitted to be in full force, and binding upon mankind. And there is no particular cross, or test of faith in admitting or confessing them. The veriest worldling will do this.

But the cross and test is, in confessing and obeying the trodden down Holy Sabbath commandment. God has always had a present test truth for his church to believe, which was the sealing, saving truth of the time then present. In the days of the apostles, it was the present sealing truth to believe that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh, and had suffered and had risen again from the dead, &c. See ii Cor. i, 22; Eph. i, 13, 14; iv, 30; ii Pet. i, 12.

Then come down to the proclamation of 1843, the hour of God's judgment, the fall of Babylon and the Midnight cry. These were the then PRESENT saving truths, and the world by rejecting them sealed their own damnation.

And think you that the third angel has no testing, sealing truth? strange indeed if he has not. What then, could be the object of his message? Some tell us that they have no objection to our believing, and obeying the Sabbath commandment, if we will not make it a test of salvation. I ask what would be the object of teaching this truth, if there was no salvation in it?—It is the last testing sealing truth that will ever be offered to mortals; and all who reject it will speedily drink the wine of God Almighty's wrath.

So far as the third angel's message has been proclaimed, it is known that the burden of the message has been to restore the down trodden Sabbath commandment. This is the most prominent characteristic mark of those who are proclaiming the present truth. It is the seal or mark of the living God. But some require a thus saith the Lord, that the Sabbath is the seal. They might with equal propriety require the same of every sealing truth that has ever been proclaimed to man. But thank heaven, we have got a thus saith the Lord for the Sabbath seal. He has said by his prophet, Isa. viii, 16, speaking of the present crisis, "Bind up the testimony, SEAL [or ratify] THE LAW among my disciples." This could never be done while they were violating one precept of that law.

Again, when the children of Israel had left Egypt, the first commandment urged on them was the Sabbath of the Lord our God. So, also, it was with us, after we got out of Babylon into the wilderness of the people, this side of 1844. Then it began to ring in our ears, "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws, for see that the Lord hath given you the Sabbath.

It was the LAST important truth and commandment urged from Mount Sinai, when God "made an end of communing with Moses upon the Mount;" Read Ex. xxxi, 12-18. It was then and there urged and enjoined by the most powerful motives. It was enjoined as a holy sanctifying truth, and by keeping it they should know that the Lord their God did sanctify them. It was enjoined by the most heavy penalties that could be inflicted upon the one who dared to violate or defile it. By doing any work therein, "that soul should be cut off from among his people," and should surely be put to death.

Again, the greatest favor and blessing that could be bestowed upon mortal man, was held out as the most powerful motive, to the willing and obedient, viz: "a SIGN between me and you," "that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you." Walker's definition of a sign is "a token, to MARK, to ratify by hand or to SEAL. So also, now the Sabbath is enjoined upon the little flock, as a MARK, a SEAL, and it is now enjoined and urged from the same powerful motives that it was then, viz: all who reject this truth after receiving the light upon it, and continue to defile the Holy Sabbath, by doing any work therein, are to be cut off from among his people, and purged out from among them as rebels, and are surely and speedily to be put to death, by drinking the wine of God's wrath, in the seven last plagues.

But it is a sign, a seal, a mark to the willing and the obedient, that the Lord their God doth sanctify them. Paul says, "Now these things were our examples; [margin our figures.] Cor. x, 6. Once more, "Now ALL these things happened unto them for ensamples, [margin types,] and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.—Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth, [while he is defiling the Holy Sabbath, by doing any work therein,] take heed lest he fall." Verses 11, 12.

God hath said, "Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." Said Jesus, "Elias truly shall first come, and RESTORE all things."

You have heard the voice of Elijah in the advent doctrine, which has been proclaimed in the spirit and power of Elijah, and will you now turn a deaf ear to his voice in the message of the third angel, crying in the wilderness of the people, "Prepare ye the way of the lord, make strait in the desert a high way for our God." Read Isa. lvii, 14; lxii, 10-12; xxxv, 8-10. The highway for the redeemed and ransomed of the Lord to walk in, and return and come to Zion, is so plain that the wayfaring man shall not err therein.

"Thus saith the Lord, stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls. But they said, we will not walk therein. Also, I set watchmen over you, saying, Harken to the sound of the trumpet. But they said, We will not harken. Therefore hear, ye nations and know, O congregation, what is among them. Hear, O earth, Behold I will bring evil upon this people, even the fruit of their thoughts, BECAUSE they have not harkened unto my words, nor to my LAW, but REJECTED IT."

Those who will not walk in this clear and plain highway, evidently do not delight in the law of the Lord, as did David and Paul.

The beast and his image, his mark and worship, (Sunday keeping,) are clear. Also, it is clear the keeping the true Sabbath is the seal or mark of God. Those who worship the beast and his image, by observing the first day, are certainly idolators, as were the worshippers of the golden calf in the wilderness. Compare Ex. xxxii, 1-10, with Cor. x, 7, 14. "Neither be ye idolators, as were some of them." "Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry?"

Satan always gets his counterfeit mark just as near the true mark of God as he can. This he has done in bringing into use the first day for the Sabbath. One is the true worship of the true God, and is his SEAL or MARK, the other is the worship and mark or seal of the beast and his image.

God says, by his messenger—the third angel—"If any man worship the beast or his image, or receive his mark, &c., the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God." The opposite, has power to both speak and cause, that as many as will not worship the image of the beast, should be killed. This is what Daniel heard, when he said, "I beheld then, [just before the beast was slain at the close of time] because of the voice of the GREAT WORDS which the horn spake." This is opening his mouth in blasphemy against God. John said, "He spake as a dragon."

"And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." Rev. xii, 17.

God will have his followers united in his worship, and brought into the "unity of the faith," by keeping the Holy Sabbath; also, the second commandment, in refusing to worship the image of the beast, by not keeping Sunday.

The opposite will have his followers united, and in unity, in his image worship, by keeping Sunday. And he makes war with the remnant for keeping the opposite commandments, viz: the Holy Sabbath, and not worship an image, in keeping Sunday. This is the bone of contention. This is the foundation of the dragon's declaration of war with the remnant.

"The battle is coming between the two kingdoms,
The armies are gathering round;
The pure testimony and vile persecution
Will come to close battle ere long.
Then gird on your armor, ye saints of the Lord
And he will direct you by his living word;
The pure testimony will cut like a sword."

"Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp, and said, who is on the Lord's side? let him come unto me. And ALL the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him." The sons of Levi then separated themselves from the idolitry of image worship. So, also, under the loud voice of the third angel, it is to be declared, in the language of Moses, who is on the Lord's side, let them come unto us. And we know that all who are on the Lord's side, will manifest themselves to be the sons of Levi, by leaving the idolitry of Sunday keeping. Such are the sons of Levi, referred to in Mal. iii, 1-3. The dragon will make war with them for keeping the Holy Sabbath, and refusing to worship the beast or his image. This will bring Jacob's time of trouble—the fiery trial, which is to try them in this fiery furnace, and purge them as gold, &c. Well might Malachi, in view of all this, say: "Who may abide the day of his coming, and who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap." "And he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold, &c."

In the language of Elijah, we would say, "How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, then follow him; [break away from your idolatry, and keep God's Holy Sabbath] but if Baal, then follow him," [keep his Sunday.] Do you answer, that you are not following Balaam, because you do not keep Sunday. This will avail you nothing. If you continue to defile the Sabbath, you will be cut off from among his people, and surely be put to death, by the seven last plagues.

O ye Laodiceans, to you is the word of this salvation sent. No longer halt between two opinions.—"The Lord he is the God, the Lord he is the God." "And that knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light." Rom. xiv, 12.

O, my beloved brethren, my soul goes out after you. I want to see you manifesting yourselves the sons of Levi, by marching out from that company of idolaters, and coming over on the Lord's side.

O, may God help you to buckle on the whole armor of God "for an helmet," take "the hope of salvation," then "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God;" "But, ABOVE ALL, take the Shield of Faith, whereby ye may be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked." For "as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth," there is but a step between us and the battle of the great day of God Almighty. And if you would not fall, but stand in that mighty contest, when the dragon shall make "war with the remnant," because they refuse the mark and worship of the beast, and keep God's Holy Sabbath, then step into this gap, and help repair and make up the breach in the law of God. Then you, with Israel, will "stand in the battle in the day of the Lord." Read Isa. cviii, 12-14; Eze. xiii, 4, 5; xxii, 30, 31; Isa. xxx, 1, 8, 9, 17, 18. See marginal reading of verse 8.

But I want to say a little more about the two-horned beast. It is said that "he doeth GREAT WONDERS, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth, in the sight of men, and he deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles, [or wonders.] which he had power to do in the sight of the beast."

How common is the remark, that this is an age of wonders. The mind can scarce keep pace with the march of improvement. And when the truth of the second speedy coming of Messiah to raise the righteous dead and change the living saints, and usher in the glorious jubilee, the seventh thousand years reign with Christ, the true Bible millenium, was proclaimed the priesthood of Protestant Rome, opposed this glorious truth, and have taught "them that dwell on the earth" that there was to be a temporal millenium. And the road which they marked out as leading to it, was through the improvement of the arts and sciences, and that by this means the earth would be brought into a high state of cultivation—society would be improved—a congress of nations would be established to adjust and amicably settle all difficulties, and thus all war be avoided, and that all nations would "beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into spurning-hooks, and that nation should not lift up sword against nation, neither learn war any more; and that by means of improvement in navigation and the magnetic telegraph, the nations of the earth could communicate with each other as readily as though they lived in one common neighborhood. And thus they, like "Jannes and Jambres," have withstood the truth, and "deceived them that dwell on the earth" with the fable of a temporal millenium, when in fact, the seven last plagues, and the battle of the great day of God Almighty, when the slain of the Lord will be many from one end of the earth to the other, is just ready to burst upon them in all its fury and vengeance.

The wonders and miracles performed by ancient magicians, especially those done by Jannes and Jambres, by which Pharaoh and the Egyptians were deceived, are among the former things of old to be remembered as declaring the END from ancient times, the things now being done. It was an example of the wonders and miracles which the two-horned beast was to perform, viz: "And he doeth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth, in the sight of men; and deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles, and is not, [civil power gone,] and "yet is." [The image beast.]

This prophecy is already in process of fulfillment, by the wonderful discoveries by mesmerism, the Rochester knockings, &c. "As Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses," so will these "resist the truth." See ii Tim. iii, 1-9; i Tim. iv, 1. They profess to have found out the principle by which Christ and the Holy Apostles did miracles. Through these agencies Satan will work "with all power and signs, and lying wonders and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; BECAUSE they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." ii Thes. ii, 9-12. Instead of seeking unto the living God, those who reject the truth, will seek unto mesmerizers and unto familiar spirits, such as the Rochester knocking spirits. In this way they will fill up the cup of their iniquity, as did the Amorites, who dwelt in the land of Canaan, and were driven out for doing these things. See Deut. xviii, 9-14; Saml. xxviii, 7-9; Ex. xxii, 18; Lev. xix, 26, 30, 31; xx, 6, 27; ii Kings xvii, 16-18.

"And when they shall say unto you, seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep, and that matter; should not a people seek unto their God? for the living to the dead? To the law [of God, ten commandments] and to the testimony; [of Jesus Christ.] if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Isa. viii, 19, 20.

The Rochester knocking professes to be the spirits of the dead, conversing with the living who seek unto them. "Should not a people seek unto their God? for the living to the dead?" But instead of seeking unto the living God for instruction, those who are carried away with this delusion, seek unto the dead, of whom the scriptures testifies as follows: "But the dead know not any thing." Here we see that Isa. viii, 19, is being fulfilled, just at this point of time, when the "law" of God is being sealed "among the disciples," [verse 16] under the third angel's message.

Once more, "Saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword, and did live. And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads; and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name."

When such a law as this last text describes is passed by the image beast, it will make void the law of free toleration, and the right of liberty of conscience. The passing of such a law would indeed seem to be exercising the power of the Papal beast, and would manifest it to be truly the image of the beast. This would bring Protestants and Catholics on to one common platform. It would be like Ahab, king of Israel, taking Jezebel to wife.

"The beast that thou sawest, was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition. And they that dwell on the earth shall worship him, when they behold the beast that was [Papacy] and is not, [civil power gone,] and "yet is." [The image beast.]

The "image" is the "eighth," "and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition." It is "of the seven," because it is but an image of Papacy, which is one of the seven. It is to "go into perdition" therefore it is the son of perdition, to be destroyed by the "brightness of Christ's coming." See ii Thess. ii, 8.

Said the angel, "the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet, but receive power as kings ONE HOUR WITH the beast. These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast. These shall make war with the lamb," &c. ONE HOUR is allotted for the ten horns, and the beast to have power. This will be the hour of Babylon's judgment. See Chap. xviii, 10, 19. And when the image puts forth the decree that as many as will not worship the image shall be killed, then will be the "hour of temptation which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth." It will be the trial of the saints, mentioned in Dan. xii, 10. "Many shall be purified and made white and TRIED," and the time of Jacob's trouble when the saints will have to flee, without taking any thing out of their houses to carry with them; and those that are in the field are not even to return back to take up their garments, but REMEMBER LOT'S WIFE, and flee for their lives, as did Elijah. But does your heart sadden or fail you, on account of the roughness of the way? Read some of the precious promises that God has given for our special benefit, and comfort in this last mighty conflict with the powers of darkness. Isa. xciii, 1-7; civ, 6-17; cxv, 12, 13; Ps. xci, 2-12; cxxiv, and cii. Mark the heading of Ps. cii, and verses 16-20, and cxxix, 11; Luke xii, 32-36.

The way is narrowing up; "straight is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."

God has ever brought his people into a straight place before delivering them, that he might manifest his mighty power in their salvation, and get to himself honor and glory. And shall we murmur at the roughness of the way before us? Shall we, like Ephraim, being armed, turn back in the day of battle? God forbid. Let our motto and watchword be, ONWARD, ONWARD to victory; for victory will turn on Zion's side.

If you seek to save your life by worshipping the image, you will speedily lose it by drinking the wine of God's wrath. But if you will lose your life, as Daniel and the three Hebrews did, rather than commit idolatry, you will then preserve your life, as Daniel and the three Hebrews did. God has promised to deliver us out of this snare of the fowler; and that NO WEAPON formed against us, at this crisis, shall prosper. He has promised "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon us." Said Jesus, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

THE AGE TO COME.

We can have no faith in the new doctrine, now being taught, of probation in the age to come, after the second Advent. Before Christ comes in the clouds of heaven to raise the dead and change the living saints, the great plan and work of salvation by his blood, will be finished. Before our Great High Priest leaves the Sanctuary in heaven, the sins of all Israel will be blotted out, and put upon the head of the scape-goat, and by him borne into the land of separation, or forgetfulness.

Then 'He that is UNJUST, let him be UNJUST STILL; and he which is FILTHY, let him be FILTHY STILL; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still.—And behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to GIVE EVERY MAN according as his work shall be.' Rev. xxii, 11, 12.

When Jesus comes the second time, it is without sin [sin offering] unto salvation. He will then no longer be a sin offering, consequently, no more sinners can come to God through him, after he ceases to be a sin offering, which is before he comes in the clouds of heaven.

'Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.' Acts iv, 12.

This new doctrine of probation in the age to come, looks to me like a devise of the enemy, to draw the mind away from the present sealing truth of the third angel's message.

I will now present some further objections to the doctrine of probation in the age to come. The 'law of Moses was a shadow of good things to come.' And there can be no shadow without a body or substance which casts the shadow. Take one example, the Paschal lamb was slain on the fourteenth day of the first month at evening, (margin between the two evenings,) which is 3 o'clock P. M., or the ninth hour of the day. — Jesus, the Lamb of God, was slain on the fourteenth day of the first month. The ninth hour of the day, he cried out 'It is finished.' And he arose the morrow after the Sabbath, in fulfillment of the first fruits. Thus he 'died for our sins according to the scriptures;' and 'rose again the third day, according to the scriptures;' that is, according to the law of Moses. And will any other portion of the law of Moses fail of being fulfilled, or fail of reaching its body or substance? Certainly not.

The Jews were permitted, by the law of Moses, in the typical land of Canaan, to sow their fields, and plant their vineyards six years. 'But in the seventh year shall be a Sabbath of rest unto the LAND, a Sabbath for the Lord;' 'And thou shalt number seven Sabbath of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven Sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound, on the tenth day of the seventh month, IN the day of atonement, &c.' Read Lev. xxv. Now it is perfectly clear that the seventh year Sabbath, and the jubilee, shadow forth the great antitypical Jubilee, the one thousand years reign with Christ. And there must be 'a Sabbath of rest unto the LAND,' [the WHOLE EARTH,] through the antitypical Jubilee, the seventh thousand years. This conclusion is unavoidable. There is no body of the shadow without it.

And we have other examples of this fact. The history of ancient Babylon, its downfall, and that land lying desolate, and not dwelt in from generation to generation, are examples of the downfall, and destruction of Mystery Babylon the great, and of her land lying desolate, without inhabitant through the thousand years. The typical land of Canaan lying desolate, from generation to generation is another example; also Ninevah and Sodom and Gomorrah. All these are among the former things of old, which we are required to remember, as declaring the end from ancient times, the things that are not yet done. Now read the fate of Mystery Babylon the great, in the great day of the Lord, after which it is to be 'as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in, from generation to generation, &c.' See Isa. xiii. This should forever settle the question with every reasonable mind. See Chap. xxiv, 1, 3, 4; and Chap. xxxiv; Jer. iv, 23-29, Esdras xiv, 21-32. But where will the saints reign with Christ through the one thousand years, if the earth lies desolate? We would here say that the doctrine, that the saints will dwell on the earth through theseventh thousand years, is without foundation in the word of God. It is true that the saints will finally inherit, and dwell on the earth, but not till after the seventh thousand years. Not till the new heaven and the new earth are created.

Jesus said, 'I go to prepare a place for you, and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and RECEIVE YOU UNTO MYSELF; THAT WHERE I AM, THERE YE MAY BE ALSO.' And in fulfillment of this promise, at the beginning of the seventh thousand years, Jesus, 'the Lord himself will descend from heaven,' and the saints will be 'caught up' to 'MEET the Lord in the AIR: and so shall we ever be with the Lord.' [Just as Jesus said,] 'That where I am THERE ye may be also.' They ascend up into heaven, as Enoch, Elijah and Jesus did, and enter in through the gates into the City, the place prepared for them, and that is their home through the thousand years. For 'the heavens must receive' Jesus until the times of the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets, since the world began.' Acts iii, 21. And certainly, the heavens and the earth will not be restored, or made new, until the end of the thousand years.

Then 'the rest of the dead,' (the wicked,) live again,' 'And his feet shall stand in that day, (at the end of the thousand years) upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east, and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley.' This process prepares the location for the Holy City, which then descends and rests upon it. 'And the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee.' This cannot be when the Lord comes in the clouds of heaven, at the commencement of the thousand years, for then he comes with angels, after the saints, to gather and to translate them. But it is at the close of the thousand years, when he returns with ALL his saints who have 'lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years,' then the wicked who live again come up on breadth of the earth, and compass the camp of the saints about. &c., and fire come down from heaven and devours them. Then will come the 'restitution of all things.' 'He that sat upon the throne' 'will make all things new.'

Now see Zech. xiv, 6-9, read margin of verse 6. 'It shall not be clear in some places, and dark in other places of the world.' 'But it shall be ONE day,' margin, 'the day shall be ONE,' 'which shall be known to the Lord, not day nor night: but it shall come to pass at evening time it shall be light.' Or as John saw it, 'there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light; and they shall reign,' how long? a thousand years? yea, "forever and ever." "And the Lord shall be king over all the earth. In that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one."

- After the treading of the wine press of the wrath of God, in the battle of the great day, it is evident from many texts of scripture, that a small remnant will be left. They will doubtless be the special subjects of God's wrath, who will seek death in vain. Having rejected great light, they will be left to wander a few years in mournful solitude, and behold the desolations of the earth.

This is the class spoken of in Zech. xiv, 6-19. The new doctrine of probation in the age to come supposes that these will have a probation, and may secure salvation by going "up from year to year, to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacle," &c. Now that this idea is incorrect, is evident from the following scriptures: Rom. xiv, ii; Phil. ii, 9-11; Isa. xlv, 23; Ps. lxxxvi, 9; Rev. xv, 4. We see clearly from these texts that God will cause "all nations to COME and WORSHIP BEFORE" HIM. This is when his 'JUDGMENTS ARE MADE MANIFEST.'

But does their worship at this point secure the King's favor? Most certainly it does not. Well, then, will not the judgments of God be MANIFEST to those who are left after the battle of the great day of God Almighty, after the cities of the nations are fallen, and the earth desolated and broken down? It is BECAUSE his judgments are made manifest, that they go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles. And if they neglect or refuse to perform this worship, God will still manifest his judgment unto them and smite them with the plague, even the HEATHEN that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles. But, I ask again, will this worship secure the King's favor, and bring salvation to these worshippers? Nay, verily, it will then be forever too late; the die will have been cast; and the solemn tidings will have gone forth, 'he that is filthy, let him be filthy still.' It will then be entirely too late for a great ransom to redeem any soul.

But this remnant, after wandering a few years in mournful solitude, beholding the desolation of the earth, will be slain, and the earth will be left desolate, without inhabitant, UTTERLY EMPTIED, and 'none shall pass through it forever and ever.' See Isa. xxiv, 1, 3, 6-8; xxxiv, 8-10; Jer. iv, 23-29; Esdras xvi, 23-32.

Well, say some, what do you think of the LIFE AND DEATH QUESTION?

What do you think of the sleep of the saints, and the destruction of the wicked? Do you believe that doctrine? Yes; but I do not believe that our minds should be wholly occupied with that one question, at this all-important crisis.

Let me here quote Esdras ix, 11-13:— 'And they that have LOATHED MY LAW, while they had yet liberty, and, when as yet, place of repentance was open unto them, understood not, but despised it, the same must know it after death by pain. And therefore BE THOU NOT CURIOUS HOW THE UNGODLY SHALL BE PUNISHED, and when: but enquire HOW THE RIGHTEOUS SHALL BE SAVED.'

This, to me, is of the most vital importance at this momentous time, to enquire how the righteous shall be saved; which is by 'keeping the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus.' 'If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.' Matt. xix, 17.

O, do not suffer your minds to be diverted from the present truth, by the enemy. On your speedy decision and action, with respect to the present truth, hangs your eternal destiny, for weal or woe. Oh! may God help you to make your calling and election sure, by securing the seal of the living God, before the last notes of the sealing angel shall die away, and the doleful echo come back, 'HE THAT IS FILTHY, LET HIM BE FILTHY STILL.'

"IT'S JEWISH."

BY ROSWELL F. COTTRELL.

When we present God's holy law,
And arguments from scripture draw;
Objectors say, to pick a flaw,
"It's Jewish."

Though at the first Jehovah blessed
And sanctified His day of rest;
The same belief is still expressed—
"It's Jewish."

Though with the world this rest began,
And thence through all the scriptures ran,
And Jesus said 'twas made for man—
"It's Jewish."

Though not with Jewish rites, which passed,
But with the moral law 'twas classed
Which must endure while time shall last—
"It's Jewish."

Though the disciples, Luke and Paul.
Continue still this rest to call
The "Sabbath day," this answers all—
"It's Jewish."

The gospel teachers' plain expression,
That "Sin is of the law transgression,"
Seems not to make the least impression—
"It's Jewish."

They love the rest of man's invention,
But if Jehovah's day we mention,
This puts an end to all contention—
"It's Jewish."

THE PERPETUITY OF THE LAW OF GOD.

BY J. N. ANDREWS.—[Concluded.]

But there is another strong objection existing in the minds of many, which we will now examine. It is this: "The world is under the law, but the Christian is under grace, and not under the school-master." This view admits the fact that the law of God is not abolished, but attempts to show that the Christian is not under obligation to obey it. Nay, that if he should keep its precepts he would be in danger of falling from grace! We say that this view is based on the fact that the law was not abolished at the crucifixion, for an abolished law cannot hold men under it, neither can it convince men of sin as its transgressors, after it has ceased to exist. The fact that the law is our school-master to bring us to Christ, shows conclusively that it has not been abolished. Because an abolished law can never show men that they are condemned and must perish without a Saviour. This view then, is distinct from the idea that the law was abolished at Christ's death. For if it was abolished at that time, then the world is not under it. If the world is under the law, then it has not been abolished. Let us examine the testimony on this subject.

Gal. iii, 23—26. "But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. Wherefore the law was our school-master to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a school-master, for ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus."

Rom. vi, 14, 15. "For sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace. What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid." What is it to be under the law then? Hear the testimony of the Bible. Rom. iii, 19, 23. "Now we know, that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God. For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." Then in the sight of God, the whole world is condemned and become guilty before him, as transgressors of his law. The sentence of condemnation is just and righteous, so that EVERY MOUTH IS STOPPED. Where is there hope of salvation then? Surely, man in this state is lost.

How is the law a school-master to bring us to Christ? Answer. The law shows our guilt and just condemnation, and that we are lost without a Saviour. Read Paul's account of this school in Rom. vii, 7—25. "By the law is the knowledge of sin." Rom. iii, 20. "I had not known sin but by the law." Rom. vii, 7. Then the instruction of the law is absolutely necessary, that we may know ourselves to be sinners in the sight of God. We find ourselves sinners by past offences, and unable to render present obedience. The just penalty of the law hangs over our heads; we find ourselves lost, and fly to Jesus Christ for refuge. What does he do to save us from the curse of the law? Does he abolish the law, that he may save its transgressor? He tells us that he did "not come to destroy" it; and we know that the law being holy, just, and good, cannot be taken back without destroying the government of Him who gave it. Does the Saviour modify its character, and lessen its requirements? Far from it. He testifies that not one jot or tittle shall "pass from it till all be fulfilled." Matt. v, 18; Luke xvi, 17; James ii, 10. And he shows that those who in heart commit any act of iniquity, are transgressors of the law. Matt. v, 22, 27, 28; I John iii, 15. If the Saviour did not abolish or relax the law, how can guilty man hope for salvation? What then does the Saviour do? He gives himself to die in our stead. He offers his own "life a ransom for many." Matt. xx, 28. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii, 16. We now lay hold on Jesus Christ as the great atonement for our transgressions, and receive a full and free pardon of all offence. A way has now been laid open by which man, though justly condemned by the law of God, can yet be saved without dishonoring, or making void the law. God can be just and yet "the justifier of him who believes in Jesus." Rom. iii, 25, 26.

Need we inquire further what it is to be under grace? We have already seen in what manner we are saved, notwithstanding the law condemns us, and yet the claims of the law are not made void. When we were lost and ruined by transgression, and had no way to escape the just sentence of the law, God gave his own Son to die for us. The law can then allow mercy to enter and offer pardon to all who will accept it by faith in Jesus Christ. In his person mercy and truth meet together. The law justly condemns us; Jesus bears our sins in his own body on the tree; faith in him justifies, and saves us. The law brings us to faith; faith does not make void the law, but establishes it. Those who are under sin are under the law, those who have been pardoned are under grace. Two states then are brought to view in the New Testament.—1. Under the law.—2. Under grace. Those who are under the law, are condemned: those who are under grace, are pardoned. We ask, does Christ come and die to redeem us from the just sentence of the law, that he may bring us to a state where we may at pleasure violate its precepts? Is the law of a character so sacred that it must needs have the death of the Son of God for its atonement, brethren by traveling. At this meeting we formed a happy acquaintance with a number who have recently embraced present truth, and who will, we believe, prove a blessing to the cause.

We visited a number of other towns in Vermont where the truth is taking deep root in the hearts of honest souls who have been prejudiced against our views till recently. One John Libby, of Johnson, Vt., is doing what he can to prejudice those few, with whom he has influence, against the truth by reporting falsehoods about the brethren and their faith. As Paul said of the copper-smith, (II Tim. iv, 14,) "the Lord reward him according to his works."

We learned that it had been reported in Bristol, (Vt.) that we profess to be the "angel ascending from the East, having the seal of the living God," &c.—Rev. vii, 2. But those who have read our writings, and have known our faith, know better. We have believed and taught that the ascending angel of Rev. vii, 2, was a symbol of the last sealing message of mercy to the remnant; the same as the angel with the "everlasting gospel" [Rev. xiv, 6, 7] was a symbol of the Advent message as preached by Bro. Miller and others. And we have given no more reason for men to report that we believe that any one man is the ascending angel, than has been given through Advent papers, or otherwise, that Mr. Miller, or Mr. Himes, professed to be the angel with the "everlasting gospel."

When men resort to flying reports against individuals in order to put down the views of a class of Christians, they betray a want of Scripture argument against the views in question. Such are more to be pitied than censured.

We also visited the brethren at Fairhaven and Dartmouth, (Mass.) and had freedom in presenting the evidences of our position. God has revived his bleeding cause in these places wonderfully since last June. In Dartmouth a few have very lately embraced the truth, and others are examining. It is with the tenderest feelings of Christian affection that we think of our brethren in these two places who have passed through severe trials; but out of them all the Lord has and will deliver them. Praise his name.

THE DESIGN OF THE CHART.

1. To supply those who travel and teach the present truth. This was the main object in publishing the Chart. Those whom the Lord has chosen and called to give the message of the third angel, are to be supplied gratuitously.

2. That each band of brethren might have one at their places of meeting. And if the brethren in any place are not able to pay for it, they also are to be supplied gratuitously. We never expected to supply all the brethren with a Chart, if we had, some thousands should have been prepared instead of 300. But this would be a useless expense, and waste of the Lord's money. Those, therefore, who do not travel, and who are situated where they can meet with those who have a Chart, must not expect to have one without paying for it. Price—well prepared on rollers—$2; without being sized, painted &c., just as it comes from the Lithographer, $1.25. Those sent by mail have to be pre-paid.

Those who send money should be particular to state whether they wish the amount in Charts, or, whether it is a donation. If more is received than enough to pay the cost of the Chart, it will be used in publishing the paper. All orders for it must be addressed (Post paid) to Otis Nichols, Dorchester, Mass. The name, town, county and State to which it is to be sent, should be written out plainly.

We copy the following from the "Advent Herald" for Jan. 18, 1851:

"Bro. S. R. Dennett writes from Canaan (Vt.) Jan. 8th, 1851:—Dear Bro. Himes:—I want you to say through the "Herald," that I have been very much annoyed with newspapers and pamphlets containing, as I believe, spurious doctrines, such as the old Jewish Sabbath, door of mercy closed, dreams, visions, &c. I have received as many of the above as I wish for. I want no more of such chaff."

Bro. Lothrop, of Canada East, gave us, last June, the names of a number, all strangers to us, and among them was Samuel Dennett.—We sent him the "Advent Review," containing the spirited testimonies of leading Advent men, (which certainly should not "annoy" any one bearing the Advent name,) and all we have since published up to No. 2 of the Review and Herald; therefore we infer that he refers to our publications. Here we wish to remark:—1. The terms "Jewish Sabbath" and "Christian Sabbath" are not the language of the Bible. The language of both Testaments is "THE SABBATH." Jehovah styles

it "THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD," and "MY HOLY DAY;" but Mr. Dennett, in order to stigmatize the day that God has highly honored, calls it the "Old Jewish Sabbath."

2. Mr. Dennett speaks of the "door of mercy;" but the Bible speaks of no such "door." True, Bro. Miller, and others, have used this unscriptural term, (which gives a very wrong idea of our views,) to express their work done for the world; but if we believed that God had forgotten to be merciful to his erring children, we should cease to present truth to them.

3. It really seems a pity that Mr. Dennett should be "annoyed," as he says, so long with the truth, when if he had returned one paper, we should have sent him no more. And here we wish to say that if any, to whom we send the paper, are in a like condition, you can be relieved at once by returning this No. with your name and address written on it. Such a course would look much more Christian and consistent, for those who reject the letter of the law of God, and profess to fulfill it in LOVE, than to breathe out such bitterness through the "Advent Herald."

I have, from the presentation of truth, embraced the seventh day Sabbath, and the shut door, as being my last refuge in this dark and gloomy day. I am well aware that this news may be astonishing to you, as you were well acquainted with my former views, and scriptural objections to this faith. But do not throw by the letter and refuse to read, and call your father a fanatic. Read a few of the many reasons that have led me to this change of views, with prayerful attention. And I will commence by asking you some questions, as you are well acquainted with all the Advent movement. And although previous to this movement your experience was quite limited, yet it may be well for those of us, who are pretending to hold on to the speedy coming of the Lord, to ask ourselves what is the ground of our faith.

Do you believe that the Angel that was to fly through the midst of heaven having the everlasting gospel to preach, spoken of in Rev. xiv, 6-7, is fulfilled? Read the verses, weigh well their contents. It was to "them that dwell on the earth, to every nation, tongue and people, saying with a loud voice, fear God." Was it done? "Give glory to him," was it done? "and worship him that made heaven and earth, and the sea and fountains of waters." Is what we have seen and heard a fulfillment of this prophecy? I am struck, while reading it, with its exact fulfillment. Settle this question before God. If settled in the affirmative, which I think it must be, then I ask is not "the hour of his judgment come?" This may be a new thought to you; but God's world must settle these questions. I ask again, whether the Angel which was to follow in verse 8, saying, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen," together with Rev. xviii, 4, saying, "come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues," has been fulfilled. Were God's people in the Catholic Church?—Was the simultaneous cry of almost all who gave the first cry, and the rushing of the living members in the churches, and the fear lest they should be found in them, (the only place where, but a few months before, they thought there was safety,) the work of man? What was the cause of this universal panic among the churches? All the living members were leaving them. Was this the power in man's voice? Where is that powerful voice now? Or was this the voice of that Angel that was to follow the first, the power of God in this message to the children of men? Settle these questions in your own mind as in view of the judgment. I ask not what others have thought; I am well aware of the giving up on this point. Can we ever expect, or can any generation to follow us, expect to see the like again? See if there is not as exact a fulfillment, as there was in any of the prophecies of the first advent of our Saviour.

Again I ask, what was it that gave such tremendous power to the words, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh," which broke upon us, as it were, in the stillness of night, while one servant was saying, "My Lord delayeth his coming," and the other, "The Lord is coming!" What was it that hurried those messengers through the land to spread the message as though a world's destiny depended on their flight? What was it created such an awful fear on the churches, and that made such a complete consecration of time, property and self, among the Advent bands? Was there ever such a time in the world's history? Did it not savor of the work of God? Can there ever be another "Midnight Cry," given, if Christ should not come for a thousand years, that would produce such wonderful effects? Will God suffer his people who have been praying, searching the Word, and sacrificing, to find the truth, to be deceived by these movements, and utterly fall? Or has the devil been permitted to make so exact a counterfeit, as to deceive the very elect?

It does not destroy the fulfillment of prophecy, if we should get a hundred unscriptural views of what constituted the Bridegroom's coming. I think it is more safe to acknowledge that we may have been mistaken in what constituted the coming of the Bridegroom, and the shut door, than to throw the whole prophecy away. God will not fulfill his prophecies but once, if we look for their fulfillment again as long as the Jews have for the first coming of Christ. And now what has given force and edge to these messages? It has been the preaching of time. Had time been out of the "messages," they would never have come to any point. And now has the preaching of time been of God, or of men? God has certainly given us time in his word. The 2300 days, as preached by Bro. Miller and others, ended in '44, tenth day of seventh month. This gave point to the Midnight Cry. Here all the numbers given us in the Bible ended harmoniously. From that time what confusion has there been about the ending of the 2300 days!

No one has successfully attempted to make the different numbers harmonize at any other point of time. But they have labored for six years to show that these days would end somewhere else, and in this labor have almost, if not quite, destroyed the faith of all their hearers in the speedy coming of the Lord. The only question to be decided as to the ending of the 2300 days is to find their commencement. And B. C. 457 was the starting point. Whether there will be any further attempts to make those days cover '51, '52, or '55, I know not. But for one I have lost all confidence in these brethren having any light on prophecy since '44. I must turn my eye to some other quarter for light. If the 2300 days have ended, (and the "Advent Herald" of March last says, that to fix the starting point of the 2300 days anywhere else than B. C. 457, you would have to altar the dates of more than twenty eclipses, which would throw every date into confusion. This quotation is from memory.) where did they end? and what was done at their ending?—They say in effect, that nothing has been done; the earth has not been cleansed; therefore the Sanctuary has not been cleansed.

But God says, Dan. viii, 14, "Unto 2300 days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." I feel bound to believe this plain word of God, rather than follow the delusive idea that this earth was the Sanctuary to be cleansed. Turn to Ex. xxv, and read a few of the first verses, then turn to the first of chap. xxxvi, and you will be at no loss to know what God has called his Sanctuary. You will recollect that this was to be made in exact imitation of something that God showed Moses on Mount Sinai. Here is light, but I do not expect what I have written on the subject of the Sanctuary will give you much light. Defer deciding until you hear more.

I think I have foreseen the awful vortex to which we must be driven, who have adopted any other time for the ending of the 2300 days than '43, or tenth day of seventh month, 1844, unless the Lord should come soon. The genius of men will not be able to move them much further, and then where are we? God's prophetic time has failed, and all the past movement which was got up by the preaching of time, and all our confidence that we were led by the Spirit of God in that movement is lost. I ask again, where are we? If God did not lead this people when did he ever lead a people? I confess for one, that if I were not led by the Spirit of God in trying to spread these messages, I have never known what the Spirit of God was. In more than twenty years experience, I have had no doubts of the leadings of God's Spirit, and never less than while penning these lines. With this view of the subject, I ask where is the evidence that the Lord will come in my day, or in yours?—You may answer that the signs and the images spoken of in Daniel show that He is near. So they do in connection with the time, but how definite is the image? Almost 1100 years have we been in the "toes," and can you tell how much longer we may remain there? The darkening of the sun and moon in 1780, and the falling of the stars in 1833, how long will it be to the shaking of the powers of heaven, and how long from this point to the coming of the Lord? Who can tell? You see ———, that by following these opinions, (for I think they have no light on prophecy answering to this day,) and their necessary results, I am brought near the vortex. Hence I embrace the "Midnight Cry," the "Shut Door," and "the Third Angel's Message" as being my last refuge, as I stated at first.

The embracing these truths has opened a light upon the book of Revelation, and on the Types, (so freely used in proclaiming the Midnight Cry,) as I have never seen before. I now feel that I am on the track of prophecy, and that the coming of the Lord is near. This to me is no small source of comfort, to have evidence on which I can rest, that this state of trial is soon to end. My time and your patience might be exhausted, were I to undertake to bring to your view the whole subject connected with the Shut Door. Suffice it to say, it does not in my opinion, exclude all conversion. But it does exclude those who have wilfully rejected all these Messages. I believe that the names recorded in the Lamb's Book of Life, were brought in at the tenth day of seventh month. That He then bore in their names before the Father, as the antitype of the "Breastplate of Judgment." Ex. xxviii, 15; and xxxix, 8. Read the passages in their connection, and if you will read from Ex. xxiv, to chap. xl, you will see with what exactness God has had his Sanctuary made, and all that pertains to it. Were these things recorded with such precision for the Jews only? Since I began this, I have got the small tract on the Sanctuary, and Shut Door, which I will send you. Read it with attention, it will give you much light on the cleansing of the Sanctuary.

I fear it would be wrong in me to withhold from you my views of most of our Advent brethren. They compose the Laodicean Church.—Start not, but hear my reasons. This church is neither cold nor hot, but lukewarm. Is not this applicable? This church says that they are "rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing." Do not our brethren say they have a great amount of truth, that they are far in advance of the churches? Do they not say they have truth enough?—Have need of nothing? Do not know they are "poor and miserable," etc. They are all "counseled to buy gold," etc. "That the shame of their nakedness do not appear." "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten." I hope there are many of this class. Read Rev. iii, 11-22. They must be "zealous and repent." This church came out of the Philadelphia or Brotherly-Love church, and this, out of the Sardis church, as was preached in '44. When has the world beheld, since the days of the apostles, a band of brethren that loved more fervently, coming together from the different churches. But where was the Laodicean church organized? At the Albany Conference. "Let patience have its perfect work." This point shall be made as plain as any fulfilled prophecy, if reason and facts may determine. A great proportion of the brethren went to this Conference believing in the "Shut Door." You may doubt this statement because the leaders and managers were of a different opinion, and there succeeded in convincing their brethren that the door was open, and they must now "double their diligence" to convert the world. They say they are the true Israel of God. Now read Rev. iii, 9. I ask where has been the brotherly love in this body since? Where is the light on prophecy that used to shine with such clearness from these brethren? There is need of zeal and repentance, or the Lord will execute his threatening in verse 16.

When I began this I had no expectation of using so much paper in asking and answering questions, and giving my views. However, the opinions expressed have not been formed hastily; but from long reflection. Therefore examine them patiently and prayerfully in all their parts, before you reject my conclusion; as I fear in rejecting you will reject the truth of God. I believe the Third Angel's message will be sounded louder and louder, until it is heard by every humble and penitent soul, who has not rejected God's former messages. And when the Angel has accomplished his work, (the last work to prepare God's people,) the vials of God's wrath will be poured out upon the world. And I cannot put the pouring out of these vials far in the future.

I cannot reject the idea that there will be a clear distinction between saint and sinner previous to the Lord's coming, and of course there must be something to draw out the real character. That there is need of something now to test the real friends of God, as in former days, I doubt not. And that something should be preached so crossing that the proud heart will not receive, and the humble and contrite will not reject, I doubt not.

This letter is too far advanced to gratify your wish to know how I dispose of all the New Testament objections we used to urge against my present views: and had I more space I might fail of doing it to your satisfaction. I will freely acknowledge that there are some passages that have had a strong influence upon my mind, to hold me to my former views (and when once the position is taken that there is no distinction between the Law given by Moses, for the observance of the children of Israel, through their generations, and the Law written by the finger of God, and deposited in the Ark of the Covenant, and was kept in the Sanctuary or Tabernacle which was the strength of the children of Israel, a type of what John saw in heaven, Rev. xi, 19,) and have held me for a long time. You may well suppose, with so much labor and trial, together with some conviction of the truth of my opponents, that the subject of the Sabbath has not been slightly examined, or hastily embraced. I am not aware of being influenced by any soul; but by the truth presented. I have never embraced a doctrine more crossing; but he that follows Christ will find crosses.

"The Sabbath was made for man." I have never been able to reconcile the idea that there was no Sabbath, with what I believe to be the wants of man, and the goodness and providence of God. If he was good and merciful in commanding the children of Israel to rest the seventh day, instead of requiring them to work, is there any good reason why he should not require it after Christ came? Is the Sabbath any less needed as a day of rest under this, than under the former dispensation? If there is no express command, it is evident that Christ and his Apostles observed it through their day. And Christ directed his disciples to pray that their flight be not on the Sabbath day. Matt. xxiv, 20. And it is evident from history that the seventh day Sabbath was observed for centuries after the Apostles day. If Christ thought the keeping of a Sabbath was of so much importance that he directed them to pray that they might have no occasion for breaking it forty years after his death, surely he had some expectation that it would be observed. How far these examples and requirements will supply the want of an express command in the New Testament, after so many in the Old, judge ye.—Our Savior said whosoever shall break one of the least of these commandments and shall teach men so, shall be of no esteem in the reign of heaven. If thou wilt enter into life keep the commandments. "And they returned and prepared spices and ointments; and rested the Sabbath-day, according to the commandment." Luke xxiii, 56. You say you know well the influence these test questions have upon the trembling, sincere and honest disciple, when enforced with zeal and power; for you have felt it many times. So you have come to the conclusion there have been false tests presented to you. A rational conclusion, I think.—But am I to understand because there are false tests, that there are no true ones? Such a conclusion, if true, would uproot the religion of Jesus Christ from the land. The whole economy of God as revealed in the Bible, to nations and individuals, is designed to test their fidelity to him. Why was Satan, the arch deceiver, permitted to have an existence in the world, and tempt and try the children of God, if not to test their love to Him. This opens a large field, which I have not time to explore. I will ask what advances have you made in your christian course, without having every step tested? Is it probable that at the closing scenes of this world, and the final conflict with the powers of darkness, God will have no test by which to prove his children? Will the danger to which we are exposed consist in submitting to false tests for Christ's sake, or rejecting true ones? Do any doubt, who believe in the Advent movement, that the first Angel's message tested the churches, and those churches or individuals who understandingly rejected have fallen? So with the second, and so it will be with the third. You see, —, it has taken a good deal of paper, to get out a few thoughts. I have endeavored to be as short as possible, and answer my mind. You know I am unaccustomed to putting them on paper. You will I trust, pass over the errors in the writing and composition; but mark well the subject matter. I am aware that some of it may seem simple, perhaps foolish, but "God has chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise." I know it will not accord well with the instruction you have listened to, for some time past, and the influence that may still surround you. The change made in my mind since embracing these sentiments, has been happyfying indeed. A strength has been imparted which I have not felt for years. I have endeavored to keep two Sabbaths holy unto the Lord.

✠ We do not hesitate to say that the article, "The perpetuity of the law of God," in this No. and No. 5, written by Bro. J. N. Andrews, is unanswerable. Though written under unfavorable circumstances, mostly while Bro. Andrews was traveling from place to place, yet it contains irrefutable proofs that the whole law of God, as engraven in tables of stone, is perpetual.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

We are getting out two important works which will be ready in a few days.

THE BIBLE SABBATH.—This work is a careful selection from the publications of the "American Sabbath Tract Society," including their "History of the Sabbath."—64 pages.

The above works can be obtained, at the present, only at this place.

Bro. Hiram Edson writes from Port Gibson, (N. Y.) Feb. 13. "Since I parted with Bro. Holt, I have been South, into Yates and Steuben Counties, where I found a number of precious 'jewels;' three or four who will be capable of giving the third angel's message. Bro. J. H. Lockwood and wife, of Wheeler, love the present truth. Bro. L. Lockwood, their eldest son, an interesting young man, who was strong in the truth in 1844, has ever believed the Advent movement was of God, and that the prophetic periods must have ended as proclaimed in '44. The general course of Advent believers since that time in calling the moves in '43 and '44 'a mistake,' and their making new calculations on the periods looked inconsistent to him. He finally lost his interest, backslid, gave up his hope, and went into the world; but never denied, nor gave up the truth. He always felt like standing in defence of it when he heard it ridiculed. But when he heard our present position defended and the Advent movement justified, and shown to be a clear fulfillment of prophecy, he believed and received the present truth.

He expressed a desire to accompany me home, and did so. He is gaining strength fast. Last evening, in the beginning of the Holy Sabbath, we had a glorious time of special refreshing from the presence of the Lord. It was a time of victory, complete, perfect and entire. Free and full "Hallelujahs" ascended to God and he was glorified in praise, love and adoration. Bro. L. was greatly blessed."

Bro. Geo. W. Holt writes from Oswego, (N. Y.) Feb. 3: "I have just returned home after an absence of three weeks, in company with Bro. Edson. We found a number of precious souls who were ready to receive the present truth. The interest on this subject is increasing.—Bro. Butler's letter in the 'Harbinger,' and the inquiries of C. W. S. and the weak note of 'C.' has done much to open the eyes of the honest seekers after truth. Our opponents are doing more for us than against us. Praise the Lord.

I hope the paper will continue; I think it is doing much good.—While the strife is going on in the 'Harbinger' and 'Herald,' the Lord is opening the way for the message. I never felt more like doing the whole will of God than now. Never did I realize the goodness of God, and his tender love for his people as at the present. The fellowship of the saints is sweet. O, I want to be pure in heart that I may see God, and join the heavenly company that have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

Bro. Bates writes from Guildhall, Vt., Jan. 22: "Bro. Lindsey and self accompanied Bro. Lothrop and family [from Melbourne] to Eaton. The Lord blessed his word to the good of souls there. Edwin Lothrop, wife, two daughters and sister have embraced the present truth, and are rejoicing with the other five that keep the Sabbath there. Opposition raged high; but God gave his children the victory.

At Ascot we held one meeting. I think three decided to keep the Sabbath. At Compton we held two meetings at Bro. John Cramer's. He said he would keep the commandments."

We have received a small tract of 8 pages, entitled—"A letter to the disciples of the Lord, by Roswell F. Cottrell," of Mill Grove, N. Y.—We think it very good, and hope to be able to publish it entire, soon.—He also writes Feb. 9:

"I am old, and have but little of this world's good; but I have a strong desire to see the truth spread abroad in this world. We are not Seventh-day Baptists; but I have taught my children to keep the Sabbath, and those about me here still adhere to my instruction, and the teaching of the Bible on that point."

THE PARABLE, MATTHEW XXV, 1—12.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them; but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made. Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered saying, Not so, lest there be not enough for us and you; but but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came, and they that were ready, went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily, I say unto you, I know you not."

Many have desired to obtain a correct account of an eastern marriage that they might better understand this parable. But let it be distinctly understood that our Saviour has here given us the desired history, and testifies that the kingdom of heaven shall be likened ["compared," Campbell's translation] unto it. But when shall the kingdom of heaven be likened, or compared to an eastern marriage? Our Saviour says, "THEN shall the kingdom," &c., showing beyond all doubt that there is some definite period in the history of the church where the parable may be applied. If the parable applies to a definite period, it is of the utmost importance that we understand what period it does apply to, so as to make a right application.

The twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth chapters of Matthew are one connected discourse. In this discourse our Lord has pointed out the most important events, with which the Christian Church was to be connected, from the time of the First to the Second Advent. Such as the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Papal persecution of 1260 years. Next the special signs of the Second Advent, the darkening of the sun and moon in 1780, and the falling stars in 1833. Our Lord next points out two classes of teachers. One class is represented by the "faithful and wise servant" who gave to his master's household "meat in due season." The other class of servants is represented by the "evil servant" who was saying "in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming," was eating and drinking with the drunken, and was smiting "his fellow-servants." Those who have had any experience in the Advent, know that two such classes of servants as are pointed out by Christ have appeared. The wise and faithful servants seeing by the prophetic periods, and the signs of the times, but especially the signs in the sun, moon and stars, that Christ was soon coming, gave the warning to the church and world. This warning message called out and manifested the other class of servants who first said in their heart, The Lord is not so soon coming, then they began to "smite" those who were proclaiming the coming of the Lord, and by this time they were united with every class of wicked men on the earth—eating and drinking with the drunken.

But does not this portion of our Lord's discourse have a still more close application? The "evil servant" smites his "fellow-servants." Does not this show that both classes of servants had previously been united in proclaiming the coming of the Lord until they were disappointed? This seems necessary for them to be called "fellow-servants" One class "hold fast" the Advent, as proclaimed in its purity by all the servants united, and still follow down the track of prophecy, and receive the warning message of the third Angel, while the other class doubt, give up the past, fall into the spirit of the world, and say in their heart, My Lord delayeth his coming, &c. Thus closes the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew. The twenty-fifth chapter commences thus; "THEN shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins," &c. Thus we are brought down into the experience of those who have been connected with the Advent doctrine, and are shown where the parable applies. This conclusion is natural and irresistible.

But what shall we understand by the kingdom of heaven?—Certainly not all the component parts of the kingdom; for in that case the King, [Christ,] the territory, [New Earth,] and the subjects of the kingdom [the children of the resurrection] would all be represented as going forth, tarrying, sleeping, waking, and trimming lamps, &c. It is evident that the kingdom of heaven here can only mean what may be represented by the going forth, tarrying, &c., which must be the people of God who are interested in, and are looking for the coming and kingdom of Christ. The "kingdom of heaven" should be understood here, as it is generally used in the New Testament.—Then we understand it to mean as taught by Bro. Miller and the Advent lecturers, with hardly an exception, and as published in all the Advent papers till the Albany Conference in 1845, that the history or experience of the living people of God is to be likened, or compared, unto an eastern marriage. It has been said that the Second Advent people have literally fulfilled Matt. xxv, 1—12. It is not so. Jesus is there giving the history of an eastern marriage. But Second Advent people were to experience a series of events which were to have a natural application to the events of the eastern marriage rehearsed by Christ. After the signs of Christ's coming should be preached, the two classes of servants should appear, "then" Second Advent history was not only to have a natural application, but was actually to be compared to the history of the eastern marriage found in Matt. xxv.

In order that the two histories may be likened or compared, some things are indispensable. First, both histories must be complete; all the events in both must be in the past. It is not possible to compare past history with what has not taken place. Second, after each event in Advent history has occurred, answering to each point in the history of the marriage, shut door, and knocking not excepted, there must be time to compare the two histories, also those who will compare them. We say that this is a part of the work of the faithful and wise servant who is giving to the household meat in due season. Those who have given up the past Advent movement, as the work of man only, or of unclean spirits, choose to apply the parable to the future, to be fulfilled at the coming of the Lord. But if they would only carry out the natural and true position taken of it by Bro. Miller and the entire Advent host, with hardly an exception, up to 1845, it would lead them to acknowledge the work of God in the past, it would show them their present whereabouts, and give them living faith in the speedy coming of Christ. No one has yet shown how the events, represented by trimming lamps, asking for oil, going to buy, and the knocking of the foolish could be fulfilled at, and after the Second Advent. The cry, "Behold the bridegroom cometh," is made to apply by all classes of Advent believers, then why not let each part of the parable also apply? We ask, Why should the cry, this one point in the parable, be made to cover all time to the resurrection, and the other parts not be suffered to have any application? Consistency becomes us on this subject, as well as on others.—Some seem to make every thing of the cry, "Behold the bridegroom cometh," but nothing of the other parts of the parable. By referring to the "Advent Herald" it will be seen that it is the editor's motto. If he is to give this cry till the coming of Christ, and the resurrection, then the other points in the parable that follow must apply after the Second Advent. But we do not hesitate to say that they will not then apply. No one will attempt to apply each event there.

The saints will be raised and the righteous changed "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," and caught away from the earth. The wicked who remain after the plagues, will be fleeing from the presence of the Lamb. None asking for oil, none knocking then. They will cry, but not "Lord, Lord, open unto us." No, no. They will flee from the burning glory of the Lamb, and their cry will be, "Mountains and rocks, fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb. For the great day of his wrath is come." Rev. vi, 15—17. No one will say that there is anything in this like asking for oil, going to buy, or knocking. Wherever the Bible refers to the position of the lost, after they are apprised of their real condition, they are represented as hiding, fleeing, &c., from the presence of the Lord, instead of saying, "Lord, Lord, open to us." But this will be noticed hereafter. As we are convinced that we now occupy the time when Advent history was to be "likened" to the history of an eastern marriage, we will now compare them.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom."

Let the reader be sure to shun the common error of confounding Advent History, with that of the marriage. Keep both distinct, then they may both be compared. The ten virgins had literal lamps, and literally "went forth." Not so with Adventists, yet they had what is well compared to a lamp. Says David, "Thy WORD is a LAMP unto my feet, and a light unto my path." Ps. cxix, 105. Those looking for the second coming of Christ did not literally go forth, yet the great movement produced by the proclamation that Christ would come in 1843, may well be likened to the ten virgins going forth with their lamps. This movement is also symbolized by the angel of Rev. xiv, 6, 7. But it is said that this movement represented by the going forth of the ten virgins, commenced two hundred years ago.—To this we reply, that our Lord is giving in Matt. xxiv, and Chap. xxv, 1—12, a connected history of the most important events, with which the Christian Church was to be connected, down to the Second Advent. Therefore the special signs of Christ's coming, in the sun, moon, and stars, must first take place, and then be presented to the world, with other reasons, as evidences of the Advent near, before the movement represented by the going forth can take place. As the presentation of the signs, with other evidences, calls out the two classes of servants, and produces the movement, the going forth in the parable must of necessity be applied to a period of time after the fulfillment of the predicted signs. Those who go back two hundred years to commence the "midnight cry," as they call it, the angel with the everlasting gospel, and the going forth, must not only cast aside the Advent movement with which we have been connected, but also the signs in the sun, moon and stars. Therefore it is evident that the parable applies to the Advent movement with which we have been connected. The taking of lamps, and going forth in the parable represents the effect that the judgment hour cry had on the Advent people, as they took to their Bibles, and with "the blessed hope" and joyful expectation of soon seeing the King of glory, were moved far out from the spirit and interests of this world.

"And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them. But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps."

While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept."

Real believers, and those in the Advent ranks not having true faith, have been called wise and foolish virgins. This is incorrect. Such terms are confined to the history of the marriage. But that there has been in the Advent movement two classes manifested, whose character and acts well compare, and may be "likened" to the character and acts of the foolish and wise virgins in the parable is evident. Those represented by the wise, fully believed that Christ would come, they desired his coming. The class represented by the foolish who took no oil with them, only thought he was coming, and some of them feared that it might be so, but still loved this world too well to give it up, that they might obtain true faith. The tarrying of the bridegroom is also in the history of the marriage. We now inquire, Has there been anything in Advent history that can be compared to this tarry?

The first published time for the Second Advent was 1843, Jewish time. Cart-loads of books, written by Brn. Miller, Litch, Fitch, Storrs, Hale, Bliss, and many others, presenting the evidences that Christ would come in 1843, were scattered far and wide. And we had many reasons for supposing that these men fully believed what they taught. But the Advent people were to meet with a disappointment. The time passed, and they were humbled before the world. Some publicly renounced the doctrine, but the majority followed down the track of prophecy, where they saw a tarrying time. This tarry was taught in all the Advent papers in the land. Here we will give extracts from the "Advent Shield," No. 1, pages 122—124, published in May, 1844. This was a standard work for Advent believers, and presents the unanimous view taken of their true position at that time.

"Having passed the point of the apparent termination of the prophetic periods, we are placed in a position, which God foresaw his children would be placed in, at the end of the vision; and for which he made provision, by the prophet Habakkuk, (ii, 1—3,) when he says, "I will stand upon my tower, and will watch to see what he will say unto me; and what I shall answer when I am reproved," or as it reads in the margin "argued with." "And the Lord answered me and said, Write the vision, and make it plain upon tables, that he may run that readeth it. For the vision is yet for an appointed time," [the seven times,] "but at the end [of the prophetic periods] it shall speak and not lie: though it tarry," [beyond their apparent termination,] "wait for it; because it will surely come," [in the fulness of the prophetic times, beyond which,] "it will not tarry."

That this admonition has reference to the present time is evident from Paul's quotation of it in Hebrews x, 36—39. "For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry. Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

We believe that we are occupying that period spoken of by our Saviour, when the Bridegroom taries—Matthew xxv, 5, to which the kingdom of heaven should be likened when "that evil servant [there having been an apparent failure in the time] shall say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming, and shall begin to smite his fellow servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken."

That which was positively true, and acknowledged by the Advent body in 1844, has not become untrue by the passing of a few years.—We choose to stand on the "original faith." While the bridegroom in the parable tarried, the virgins all slumbered and slept. This strikingly represents the state of the Advent body after the first published time passed. It was clearly seen that we were in the tarrying time, but how long it would be no one knew. In this state of uncertainty, without definite time, the Advent people as a body sunk into a dormant state, fitly represented by slumbering and sleeping.

"And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, saying, Not so, lest there be not enough for us and you; but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves."

Says an objector, "I do not believe that the midnight cry has yet been given." Neither do we believe that the midnight cry has been heard by us, or that it ever will be. The cry of Matt. xxv, 6, "Behold the bridegroom cometh," is in the history of an eastern marriage. But that a cry was given, and fully received by the entire Advent body in the autumn of 1844, that compares well with the midnight cry of the parable, should not be denied by those who had an experience in it. It came in the right time. The cry of the parable immediately followed the delay, and the slumbering and sleeping. This followed our delay, having been disappointed, and reached our ears while in a dormant state. That cry waked up the ten virgins, and led them to trim their lamps. This, attended by the power of the Spirit, aroused the Advent people, and led them to search the Bible as never before, and to consecrate themselves and their worldly possessions wholly to the Lord. Those who gave the cry that the Lord would come at the seventh month, 1844, clearly saw that the prophetic periods reached to that time, therefore, the evidence that had been presented from the periods to prove that the Advent would be in 1843, proved that it would be in 1844. We then saw an error in that manner of reckoning which terminated the 2300 days in 1843. None of those who wrote against the Advent saw it. The hand of Providence covered the mistake until the time came for it to be seen. The error was in taking 457 full years from the 2300, which left 1843, without making any account of the fraction of the year 457 B. C., that had passed, when the commandment went forth from which the 70 weeks are reckoned. As it takes 457 full years and 1843, to make 2300, the fraction of the year 457, B. C., that had passed when the 70 weeks commenced, should be added to 1843, which brings the termination of the 2300 days in 1844. This point is made clear in the following testimony from the "Advent Herald" of Nov. 13, 1844.

"Our minds were directed to that point of time, [1843.] from the fact that dating the several prophetic periods from those years in which the best chronologers assign the fulfillment of those events which were to mark their commencement, they all seemed to terminate that year. This was, however, only apparent. We date the 'seven times,' or 2520 years, from the captivity of Manasseh, which is, with great unanimity, placed by chronologers B. C. 677. This date is the only one we have ever reckoned from, for the commencement of this period; and subtracting B. C. 677 from 2520 years there remained A. D. 1843. We, however, did not observe, that as it would require 677 full years B. C. and 1843 full years A. D. to complete 2520 years, that it would also oblige us to extend this period as far into A. D. 1844, as it might have commenced after the beginning of B. C. 677. The same was also true of the other periods. The great jubilee of 2450 years, commencing with the captivity of Jehoiakim B. C. 607; and the 2300 days, commencing with the 70 weeks B. C. 457, would respectively require 1843 full years after Christ added to as many full years before Christ, as the years in which we have always respectively commenced each period, to complete the number of years in each; and as subtracting from each period the date B. C. of its commencement, there would remain A. D. 1843, no reference whatever was made to the fraction of the year, which in each case, had transpired from its commencement, and which would require that each period should extend as much beyond the expiration of A. D. 1843, as they respectively began after the commencement of the year B. C. from which they are dated.

While this discrepancy was not particularly noticed by us, it was also not noticed by any of our learned opponents. Amid all the arguments which were brought to bear against our position, no allusion was made to that point."

The right application of Hab. ii, 2, 3, was seen clearly by those who gave the seventh month message. The Advent body then held that the publication of what is called the old chart was a fulfillment of the words of the Prophets, "Write the vision and make it plain upon tables."—Reference to the different Advent papers published in 1844, will settle this point.—As time is connected with the visions of Daniel and John, the conclusion seems natural that their prophecies were the subject matter to be made "plain on tables," which was to be for "an appointed time."

"Though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry." Here is a seeming contradiction, which can only be explained by facts in our Advent experience. The period, 1843, was written upon the chart, as the apparent time of the termination of the 2300 days; but that, as was clearly seen in 1844, was not the real date of their termination. Therefore the vision did not really tarry, but seemed to tarry. "Though it tarry, [beyond the period of expectation.] wait for it," for at the real point of time for the termination of the 2300 days, 1844, the vision "will speak, and not lie." It is said that the message of the 7th month, 1844, was a "lie," because Christ did not then come. True, the vision of 2300 days did not teach that Christ would then come, or that his coming would be at the end of the days; but we have the best of evidence that the days, then ended, as was taught that they would end, by those who gave the message of the seventh month. The types of the law of Moses did not teach us that our Great High Priest would come out of the heavens, on the tenth day of the seventh month, 1844, yet they, in connection with the 2300 days, clearly prove that Christ did then enter upon the work of cleansing the Heavenly Sanctuary, shadowed forth by the tenth day atonement in the law. Such a change in the position of our Great High Priest, represented by the coming of the bridegroom in the parable, was very properly heralded by those who gave the seventh month message. Neither did the parable teach that the Lord would come at the point in our history where the midnight cry applied. We now see points in the parable that apply later in our experience, yet before the Second Advent, such as the knocking. When giving the seventh month message the then future scenes of trial were sealed up to us, and for our lives we could not see any Prophecy to be fulfilled prior to the Advent.

The Advent people scripturally sought, and earnestly plead, for the "bread" of life in 1843, and we are loth to believe that our heavenly Father gave us a "stone," or that he gave us a "scorpion" in 1844. And we fail to see how it was possible for the Advent body to follow down the track of prophecy, without experiencing such a movement as that of the autumn of 1844. The vision that had seemed to tarry then spake. Let others call it "a lie." But we fully believe that then was experienced the fulfillment of the words of the Prophet "at the end [of the 2300 days] it shall speak, and NOT LIE." True we were disappointed as to the event to take place, but that is no evidence that the movement was not in the order of the Lord, and a fulfillment of Prophecy. Those that "cast their garments in the way," and cried "Hosanna to the Son of David," as Jesus rode into Jerusalem, entirely mistook the object of the first Advent, yet that display was all necessary to fulfill Zech. ix, 9. The Pharisees said, "Master, rebuke thy disciples." Jesus answered, "I tell you, that if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out." If such an exhibition should take place at this day, a thousand voices would be raised pronouncing it "Miserism." Our "mistake," as it is called, at the seventh month, was of the same nature as that of the disciples. They had an opportunity of learning the object of the first Advent. Adventists have a chance to learn the events that in order precede the Second Advent. No doubt but many who joined in the general shout of "Hosanna to the Son of David," were afterwards ashamed of it, and perhaps made their "confession" to the Pharisees. Adventists should not be ashamed of the very experience that called them from the world and churches, and has made them Adventists. Consistency requires them to own their experience, or give up the Advent name.

Jesus did not rebuke the shouting multitude. He showed the necessity for their giving vent to their joy, yet they were not to realize their expectations. He did not rebuke us for giving the seventh month cry. He blessed us abundantly in proclaiming it, though we were to be disappointed. Here we will give extracts from the "Advent Herald" for Nov. 13, 1844, J. V. Himes, S. Bliss, and A. Hale, Editors, which give the right view of the seventh month movement.

"The alarm was everywhere made; the cry was every where given. And again we can see that God was with us. It was a soul-purifying work; and the children of God bowed themselves in his presence, and received blessings to their souls, unprecedented in the history of the Advent cause. And yet we are disappointed—the day passed away and we were still here."

"And we regard it as another, and a more SEARCHING TEST, than the first proclamation of the time. It has searched Jerusalem as with candles; and it has purged out the old leaven. It has tested the hearts of all who heard it, and awakened a love for the Lord's appearing; or it has called forth a hatred, more or less perceivable, but known to God, of his coming. It has drawn a line, and awakened sensibilities, so that those who will examine their own hearts, may know on which side of it they would have been found, had the Lord come—whether they would have exclaimed, Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him and he will save us; or whether they would have called to the rocks and mountains to fall on them to hide them from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. God thus, as we believe, has tested his people, has tried their faith, has proved them, and seen whether they would shrink, in the hour of trial, from the position in which He might see fit to place them; and whether they would relinquish this world and rely with implicit confidence in the word of God. And we as much believe that we have done the will of God in thus sounding the alarm, as we believe that Jonah did when he entered into Nineveh a day's journey, and cried, saying, 'yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown.' Nineveh was not then overthrown; nor has the Lord yet wrought deliverance in the earth, or the inhabitants of the world fallen. Was Jonah a false prophet when he preached the time of Nineveh's destruction? No; he had only preached the preaching that God had bid him."

"The preaching of Jonah served as a test to the inhabitants of Nineveh, and accomplished God's purposes, as much as it would have done had the city perished. So we believe that THIS LAST CRY HAS BEEN A TEST; and that with our views of duty, we should as much have sinned against God, had we refrained from giving that message as Jonah did when 'he rose up to flee unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord;' that we should as much have sinned, had we refused to give heed to it, as the Ninevites would, in refusing to repent at his preaching; and that all who are angry that we have preached a time which has not been realized, are as guilty as Jonah was, when he was angry and prayed to the Lord to take his life from him, because God had spared that great city; and they may well ask themselves as God asked Jonah, 'Dost thou well to be angry?' We thus have an instance on record where God has justified the preaching of time, although the event did not occur as predicted."

"We have, also, in the case of Abraham, when he withheld not his only son, an instance where God alone designed to try the faith of his servant. When he was commanded to get him to Mount Moriah, and to offer up Isaac as a burnt offering, it was his duty to obey God, to act in accordance with his belief. Had Abraham stepped to inquire if he might not after all be mistaken, he would have sinned; but, believing God, and accounting that he was able to raise him even from the dead, he laid his only son upon the altar and stretched forth the knife in his hand to slay him. God thus having tested him and proved his faith, spared him the offering; 'for,' said God, 'now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withholden thy son, thine only son from me.' No one will say that Abraham was mistaken in believing that he was to slay his son; but God chose this very way to test his faith. Even so do we believe that God permitted the preaching of this last time for the same purpose respecting his children now, to test their faith."

The "Herald" for Oct 30, says,—“At first the definite time was generally opposed; but there seemed to be an irresistible power attending its proclamation, which prostrated all before it. It swept over the land with the velocity of a tornado, and it reached hearts in different and distant places almost simultaneously, and in a manner which can be accounted for only on the supposition that GOD WAS IN IT. It produced everywhere the most deep searching of heart and humiliation of soul before the God of high heaven. It caused a weaning of affections from the things of this world—a healing of controversies and animosities—a confession of wrongs—a breaking down before God, and penitent, broken hearted supplications to him for pardon and acceptance. It caused self abasement and prostration of soul, such as we never before witnessed.

The lecturers among the Adventists were the last to embrace the views of the time, and the more prominent ones came into it last of all. It seemed not to be the work of men, but to be brought about against the will of men. The several Advent papers came into the view only at a late hour; and this paper was the last to raise its voice in the spread of the cry. For a long time we were determined to take no part in the movement, either in opposition or in the advocacy of it. We afterwards endeavored to point out what we considered to be a few inaccuracies in the arguments used, but which did not materially affect the result. It was not until within about two weeks of the commencement of the seventh month, that we were particularly impressed with the progress of the movement—when we had such a view of it, that to oppose it, or even to remain silent longer, seemed to us to be opposing the work of the Holy Spirit, and in entering upon the work with all our souls, we could but exclaim, 'What were we, that we should resist God?' It seemed to us to have been so independent of human agency, that we could but regard it as a fulfillment of the 'midnight cry,' after the tarrying of the bridegroom, and the slumbering and sleeping of the virgins, when they were all to arise and trim their lamps. And this last work seems to have been done; for there has never been a time before when the respective Advent bands were in so good a state of preparedness for the Lord's coming."

"In view of all the circumstances attending this movement, the blessed effect it has produced on the minds of God's children, and the hatred and malice his enemies have displayed, we must still regard it as the true midnight cry. And if we have a few days in which to try our faith, it is still in accordance with the parable of the ten virgins: for when they had all arisen and trimmed their lamps, there was still to be a time when the lamps of the foolish virgins would be gone out. This could not be without a passing by of the 10th day; for till that time their lamps would burn. There must, therefore, be a passing by of that day, for the foolish to give up their faith, as there must of 1843, for the tarrying time."

Says the "Voice of Truth," Nov. 7, 1844,—“We cheerfully admit that we have been mistaken in the nature of the event we expected would occur on the tenth day of the seventh month; but we cannot yet admit that our Great High Priest did not on that very day, ACCOMPLISH ALL THAT THE TYPE WOULD JUSTIFY US TO EXPECT. WE NOW BELIEVE HE DID."

"We think the parable of the ten virgins clearly tells where we are. The proclamation of the tenth day of the seventh month, we believe was the midnight cry, when all, not a part, of the virgins arose and trimmed their lamps. This work continued until the tenth day passed."

Testimonies of this kind can be given to great length from the pens of Miller, Marsh, Cook, Brown, Mansfield, Fassett, Needham, Porter, Shipman and others; but what we have given shows the faith of the Advent body in the seventh month cry, a short time after the time passed. We do not, by any means, base our faith on their testimony; we give it only to show that our present position relative to the cry in the parable, is the same as was held by the entire body of Advent brethren when God was with them; when they were united, and manifested the spirit of the gospel.

Says the "Herald" for Nov. 6, 1844,—“Let each and all see to it that the lesson we have received be not lost upon us. Let us hold fast that unto which we have attained. Let none go back, nor look back—Remember Lot's wife. Keep low in the valley of humiliation, at the foot of the cross. Let no man draw back unto perdition. Now is the trying moment. Persevere a little longer and all will be gained. Go back now, and all is lost."

Such excellent advice as the above, cheered the drooping spirits of the disappointed, yet waiting saints who had consecrated all for the kingdom. Had the "Herald" continued to exhort the brethren to hold fast and not loose the lesson received in the seventh month cry, thousands, doubtless, would have been kept from the spirit of the world, and would now have living faith in the coming of Christ, who have given up their hope. But when the "Herald," and "Voice of Truth," changed their position, gave up the past work of God, and many of the leaders pronounced the seventh month movement the result of "mesmerism," the Advent body was shaken well nigh to pieces. It was said at the Albany Conference in 1845, "The seventh month movement produced mesmerism seven feet deep!"

"And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came, and they that were ready, went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut."

The foolish asking for oil, when the midnight cry was given in the parable, we think represents the inquiries for light made by those who were half-hearted, and were moved with fear only at the proclamation of the seventh month message. But the five wise virgins, in the history of the marriage, had none to spare. They directed the foolish to go and buy. This strikingly illustrates our position, and the nature of our message in giving the cry. The time had then come when one could not depend upon another. Each of those who heard the cry must have a living experience of his own. "Go to God for yourself for light," was a common reply to those who asked for it.

"And while they went to buy the bridegroom came," &c. Here it may be asked if we believe that the bridegroom came in 1844. To this we answer, No, we do not. The coming of the bridegroom was in the history of the eastern marriage, which must be kept distinct from Advent history. But that an event connected with Advent history, which may be "likened" to the coming of the bridegroom in the parable has taken place, we will show.

The 2300 days was the main pillar of the Advent theory. At their termination the Sanctuary was to be cleansed. It was inferred that the cleansing of the Sanctuary was the burning of the world at the second coming of Christ. And we understood Dan. viii, 14, as though it read Unto 2300 days, then Christ will come, and at his coming the earth, Sanctuary, will be renovated and made new. That the 2300 days commenced A. C. 457, was made clear in 1843 & 1844, and has since been settled in the "Herald" of 1850 and 1851, beyond a doubt. It has been shown that Christ was crucified A. D. 31, in the midst [middle] of the 70th week, therefore the 70 weeks terminated in the autumn of A. D. 34, and the 2300 days consequently terminated in the autumn of 1844. See No. 2 of the "Review and Herald."

But Christ did not come at the end of the days, and the earth remains unchanged. Therefore we shall do well to search more carefully, and see if the earth, or the land of Canaan is the Sanctuary. Only three texts [Ex. xv, 17; Ps. lxxviii, 54; Isa. lxiii, 18] have been quoted to prove that the earth, or the land of Canaan is the Sanctuary, and when they are compared with their connection, they really disprove the point they are said to prove. See No. 4 of the "Review and Herald."—Also, the articles on the Sanctuary by O. R. L. Crosier, in the pamphlet, "Advent Review," pages 37—48, and No. 10 of the "Review and Herald."

As the 2300 days reach down into the gospel dispensation, we should seek the signification of the Sanctuary to be cleansed at their end, from the New Testament. Paul has written a commentary upon the typical law, and has shown us clearly the true Sanctuary in heaven that has taken the place of the earthly, the only thing that can properly be called God's Sanctuary in the gospel dispensation. We will here quote from his epistle to the Hebrews.

"Then verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary. For there was a tabernacle made; the first wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the shew-bread; which is called the sanctuary. And after the second vail, the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all; which had the golden censer, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant. And over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat; of which we cannot now speak particularly. Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God: But into the second went the high priest alone once every year"—Chap. ix, 1—7.

"Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest; who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the Sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man. . . . For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest. [Here is positive proof that Christ's priesthood was not fulfilled on earth at the time of the first advent, but, that it was to be fulfilled in heaven, after his ascension,] seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law. Who serve unto the example and shadow of HEAVENLY THINGS, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for he (saith he) that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed thee in the mount."—Chapter viii, 1—5.

The "pattern" that was shown to Moses in the Mount was the "True Tabernacle," or Sanctuary in heaven, of which Christ was to be a Minister or Priest in the gospel dispensation. Did Moses obey God and follow the "pattern?" If he did, then we have overwhelming evidence that the type is a perfect guide to the substance, the heavenly things themselves. It will lead us to a correct view of the priesthood of Christ in the heavenly Sanctuary.

The place for the "candlestick" in the typical Sanctuary was the Holy Place. See Heb. ix, 2. John had a view of Christ A. D. 96, a Priest in the Holy Place of the heavenly Sanctuary. He says:

"And I turned to see the voice that spake with me. And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; [“And thou shalt make the seven lamps thereof: and they shall light the lamps thereof, &c.”—Ex. xxv, 37;] And in the midst of the seven candlesticks, one like unto the Son of man, clothed with a garment down to the foot.”—Rev. i, 12, 13.

The only place for the Ark of the covenant in the typical Sanctuary was in the Most Holy Place, within the second veil. This most sacred place is called the "tabernacle of the testimony." The Most Holy Place of the heavenly Sanctuary was to be opened under the sounding of the seventh angel, just before the Second Advent, and the Ark of the covenant was then to be seen by the church. The eleventh chapter of Revelation gives the events under the sounding of the seventh angel. One is as follows:

"And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament."—Rev. ix, 19.

"And after that I looked, and behold, the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened."—Rev. xv, 5.

Thus we have sufficient proof that the distinct Holies, furniture and holy vessels of the heavenly Sanctuary exist, as really as did those of the earthly. When Moses received instructions how to make even the golden tongs and snuff-dishes, the Lord said to him, "And look that thou make them after their pattern, which was shown thee in the mount." Ex. xxv, 38—40.

The earthly Sanctuary was cleansed on the tenth day of the seventh month, at the end of 364 days. That cleansing was not because the Sanctuary of itself was unclean, but "because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins." Lev. xvi, 16. The heavenly Sanctuary, for the same reason, was to be cleansed at the end of the 2300 days. Says Paul,—

"But Christ being come a high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands." "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these."—Heb. ix, 11, 23.

In the typical law there were two atonements. One was for the forgiveness of sins, while the priests only entered the Holy; and to make it, they could enter that apartment "always," or daily. The other was the yearly atonement for the cleansing of the Sanctuary, while the high priest alone entered the "Holiest of all." It was on the tenth day of the seventh month. On that day a change took place in the services of the Sanctuary. "The tabernacle of the testimony" of the earthly Sanctuary, that had been closed for 364 days, was on that day opened. While speaking of the priests who officiated in the worldly Sanctuary, the Apostle says:

"Who serve unto the EXAMPLE and SHADOW of HEAVENLY THINGS, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See (saith he) that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed thee in the mount."—Heb. viii, 5.

Here let it be clearly understood that the services connected with the two atonements of the law, were an "example and shadow of heavenly things," that is, the heavenly things, or priesthood of Jesus Christ, the substance or body, cast its shadow back into the Jewish age. And to make it still more sure that the services of the earthly Sanctuary, the "shadow," were framed from the then future services of the heavenly Sanctuary, the "good things to come," the Apostle adds, that when Moses was about to make the tabernacle, he was charged to "make ALL THINGS according to the pattern shewed" to him "in the mount." Says Paul, "The law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things." It was not possible that the services of the earthly Sanctuary should be the "very image" of those of the heavenly, but as nearly so as a shadow corresponds to the substance. There is this difference. The priests officiated in the daily ministration in the Holy, for 365 days, then a change took place in the services of the worldly Sanctuary. The high priest entered the Most Holy, on the tenth day of the seventh month, and on that day made an atonement for the cleansing of the Sanctuary. This change was yearly. But no such change was to take place in the services of the heavenly Sanctuary until the end of 2300 prophetic days. "Unto 2300 days, then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed," said the angel to Daniel. The slaying of beasts in the law was repeated daily and yearly; but Christ was slain but once. The daily atonement was continued only 364 days before the services of the earthly Sanctuary changed, and the tenth day atonement for the cleansing of the Sanctuary was introduced. But in the priesthood of Jesus Christ, his continual intercessions in the Holy Place of the heavenly Sanctuary, were to continue more than 1800 years, down to the end of the 2300 days, [years.] which was the autumn of 1844, when a change was to take place in his mediation. He could no longer be a "Minister" in the Holy Place for all the world, as he had been for more than 1800 years, for the time had come for the heavenly Sanctuary to be cleansed. Jesus, therefore, on the tenth day of the seventh month 1844, at the end of the 2300 days, having closed his mediation for all the world, must pass into the Most Holy Place, within the second veil, or into that apartment of the "Temple of God in heaven" called the "tabernacle of the testimony." "Testimony" here means the ten commandments, which in the typical Sanctuary were placed in the "Holiest of all." This change in the position of our Great High Priest is illustrated by, and may well be "likened" to the coming of the bridegroom in the parable of the ten virgins. The priesthood of Christ is "unchangeable" in this respect, it does not pass from him to another as did the Levitical priesthood; but that a change was to take place in his position and ministration, at the end of the 2300 days, is clear.

It is said that the view that Adventists have fulfilled the parable of Matt. xxv, 1—12, leads to spiritualism. This may be true; but take notice, this is not our position. The coming of the bridegroom is in the history of the marriage. Our position is, that a change has taken place in the position and work of our literal High Priest in the literal Sanctuary in heaven, which is to be compared to the coming of the bridegroom in the marriage. This view is a perfect safeguard against spiritualism. We not only believe in a literal Jesus, who is a "Minister of the Sanctuary," but we also believe that the Sanctuary is literal.—And more, when John says that he saw "one like the Son of man" "in the midst of the seven candlesticks," that is, in the Holy Place, we know not how to make the candlestick spiritual, and the Son of man literal. We therefore believe that both are literal, and that John saw Jesus while a "Minister" in the Holy Place. John also had a view of another part of the Sanctuary, which view applies to the time of the sounding of the seventh angel. He says, "The temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ARK OF HIS TESTAMENT." Rev. xi, 19. Also, "The tabernacle of the testimony was opened in heaven." Chap. xv, 5. This being an event to take place under the sounding of the seventh angel, it could be fulfilled at no other time than at the end of the 2300 days. The Most Holy, containing the Ark of the ten commandments, was then opened for our Great High Priest to enter to make atonement for the cleansing of the Sanctuary. If we take the liberty to say there is not a literal Ark, containing the ten commandments in heaven, we may go only a step further and deny the literal City, and the literal Son of God. Certainly, Adventists should not choose the spiritual view, rather than the one we have presented. We see no middle ground to be taken.

"And they that were ready, went in with him to the marriage."—The inquiry is often made, How did true believers go in with Christ to the marriage in 1844? To this we reply, the going in, and shut door, is in the history of the marriage. The ten virgins had literal lamps, literally walked forth, and the "wise" went in with the bridegroom, and a literal door was shut. Not so in Advent history. Those therefore who contend that the going in must be literally fulfilled by the saints entering the New Jerusalem, or some other place, should also make the lamps, going forth, and knocking, literal. At the seventh month, 1844, we were called out from the world. At the tenth, our sympathy was wholly with the expected Jesus. Previous to this, we were warning the world with tears to be ready for the Lord's coming; but on that day, or about that time, our labor for unbelievers rolled off from us, and an unseen hand drew us away from the world, and shut us up in sweet communion with Jesus. The thrilling testimonies of leading brethren, published after the tenth, and the experience of the entire body of Advent brethren establish this point. The church of Christ, since the day of pentecost, has not experienced so sudden and so great a change in labor and feeling, as Adventists experienced in 1844. A few days before the tenth of the seventh month, thousands were running to and fro, giving the cry, and papers containing the message were scattered everywhere, like the leaves of autumn. But about the tenth, every Advent paper was stopped, and the traveling brethren returned to their homes, feeling that they had given their last message to the world. The state of feeling throughout the entire body of Advent brethren can be accounted for in no other way, than that a change then took place in the position of the "vine," [Jesus,] and the living "branches" felt it. And as he ceased to plead for the world, and moved within the second vail, the living branches were called away from the world, and their sympathy was with Jesus, and with each other.

This well compares with the wise virgins in the parable going in to the marriage. We might here remark also that on the day of atonement for cleansing the earthly Sanctuary, the high priest bore into the Holiest, upon the breast-plate of judgment, the names of all Israel that could be benefited by the tenth day atonement. Thus our High Priest bore in, on the tenth day of the seventh month, 1844, all that had not rejected light and truth sufficient to be cut off from Israel. In this way the branches were borne in with the Vine.

"And the door was shut." This also was a literal door in the marriage, and was designed to illustrate an important event connected with Advent history, which we have already referred to in our remarks upon the coming of the bridegroom, and the going in with him to the marriage. Christ, the "Minister of the Sanctuary, and of the True Tabernacle," was to officiate in the anti-typical daily ministration, until the termination of the 2300 days. Then that work for the world was to cease forever; and he was to pass within the second vail, and enter upon the work of cleansing the Sanctuary. This subject is made very clear by the following, addressed to the church of brotherly love.

"And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write; These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that OPENETH, and no man SHUTTETH; and SHUTTETH, and no man OPENETH: I know thy works; behold, I have SET BEFORE THEE AN OPEN DOOR, AND NO MAN CAN SHUT IT; for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name."

This language is addressed to only one church of the seven. Adventists have agreed in applying them to seven periods, or states of the church. This language does not apply to the Sardis, [nominal church,] neither to the Laodicean church; but to the Philadelphia, the church of Brotherly Love, that came out of the different sectarian bodies, and were united in the Advent faith in 1844. All denominational tenets were laid aside, and although the Advent brethren came out from the different sects, yet all were perfectly united on the great subject of Christ's coming. To this church, one door is opened, while another is shut. "Behold, I set before thee an open door." This door Christ opens, while he shuts another. As the Philadelphia church applies to no other period than the time of the termination of the 2300 days, when Christ closed his work for the world in the Holy, and opened the door of the "Holiest of all," the conclusion seems irresistible that the open and shut door of Rev. iii, 7, 8, refers to the change in the position and work of our Great High Priest in the heavenly Sanctuary. He then closed the work or "door" of the daily ministration in the Holy, and opened the door of the Most Holy. "The tabernacle of the testimony" was then opened; but before this could be done, the "door," or work of Christ's continual mediation in the Holy had to be closed. This may well be "likened" to the shut door in the parable.

The idea that the door of God's mercy is closed, or ever was to be closed to those who do not reject the offers of mercy, is not found in the Bible. No such door is mentioned in Scripture. But that there ever has been a point, beyond which men may go, where, according to the plan of salvation, the intercession of Christ could not benefit them, is evident. The Jewish church, having rejected and condemned Christ, could not be benefited by his mediation in the Holy. The nominal Gentile church, as a body, having rejected the Second Advent, cannot be benefited by his intercessions in the Most Holy.

Says the objector, "I believe that Jesus is still on the mercy-seat." To this we reply, that Jesus never was on the mercy-seat, and never will be. The place for the mercy-seat is over the Ark containing the ten commandments, in the Most Holy Place. Jesus did not enter that apartment till the end of the 2300 days, much more, take his position upon the mercy-seat. This is one step further than we can possibly go. We do believe, however, that Jesus entered the "tabernacle of the testimony" at the end of the 2300 days, and now stands before the mercy-seat, pleading his blood before the Father, in our behalf. There he stands an intercessor between the Father and the scattered members of his body, ready to pour salvation and mercy on those who zealously repent of their backslidings, turn to God with the whole heart, and receive the present truth. Oh, may God wake up the Laodiceans, and lead them by the power of his Spirit and truth to the open door, which presents to our view Jesus in the Holiest, standing beside the Ark of the ten commandments. Amen.

"Afterward come also the other virgins, saying, Lord, lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily, I say you, I know you not."

The wise virgins in the history of the marriage, entered in, and a literal door was shut, and the foolish came to that shut door, fully expecting to enter. Our Saviour has shown us the application of this portion of the parable in the following text.

"When once the Master of the house is risen up and hath shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without and to knock at the door, Saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us; and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are."—Luke xiii, 25.

The foolish, in the parable, knocked at a literal door. Christ has shown us that the cry "Lord, Lord," after the Master of the house [Jesus] should rise up [from his mediation for the world in the Holy] is the event connected with Advent history, that may be "likened" unto it. It is evident that the five foolish, in the parable, fully expected to enter. If not, they were indeed foolish to come and seek admission, when they knew they could not enter. Those who say "Lord, Lord," and seek the presence and favor of God, after Jesus rises up from his mediation in the Holy Place, are laboring under a similar deception.—This leads us to a brief examination of the nature of the knocking.—Said Jesus,—

"Ask, and it shall be given you, seek, and ye shall find, KNOCK, and it shall be opened unto you."—Matt. vii, 7.

The word knock, in this text represents earnest and urgent cries and entreaties for the presence and favor of God, such as ever have been necessary in the conversion of men from sin to holiness. It is evident that the knocking, after Jesus has risen up from his mediation in the Holy, is of the same nature. But those who thus "knock" and say, "Lord, Lord," and seek the favor of God, are evidently under a similar deception to that of the five foolish, who expected admission after the door was shut, not to be opened. If this position is correct, then the knocking will appear very much like the work of God in past time; therefore, we may expect to see what the churches and Adventists who have gone back with them, call reformations. This is strikingly taught in the following testimony from the Prophet:

"They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord; [a mediator for all the world, in the Holy:] but they shall not find him; he hath withdrawn himself [to the Most Holy] from them.—They have dealt treacherously against the Lord, for they have begotten STRANGE CHILDREN; [apparent converts,] now shall a month devour them with their portions."—Hosea v, 6, 7.

Those who refuse to follow down the track of Prophecy, so as to learn the present position and work of our Great High Priest, will "knock," or seek the Lord as a Minister in the Holy, where he is not. Therefore they will not find him, and his present intercessions in the Most Holy Place will not benefit them, any more than the blood of beasts, and the services of the priests in the wordly Sanctuary benefited the Jewish nation, after Christ ascended on high, a Minister of the "True Tabernacle" in heaven. Had the Jews believed John and Christ, and then followed down the track of Prophecy to the day of Pentecost, they would have received the Holy Ghost, that was then poured out, which signified that the way of the heavenly Sanctuary was then opened.

But it may be said that those represented by the foolish virgins will not knock until Christ comes, or not until they know that the door is shut against them. To this we reply, that as the foolish in the parable expected admission, so will those who knock after the Master of the house is risen up. This seems very necessary that one should be "compared" with the other. Also, the Bible teaches that men will not say, "Lord, Lord, open unto us," when Christ comes, or when they know that the door is shut. Their only desire and object will then be to flee and hide from his presence. Those who knock say, "Lord, Lord, OPEN UNTO US." They desire his presence. But when they are apprised of their real condition, their cry will be, "Mountains and rocks fall on us, and HIDE US FROM the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." Those who can make the words, "hide us from," &c. mean "open unto us," will probably still apply the knocking to the future, after men know that they are lost.—But Scripture and reason teach that the knocking should be applied to the period of time beginning at the end of the 2300 days, in 1844, and closing in the great day of wrath, at the point of time when men will be made to know that the door is shut.

We have now gone through with the history of the marriage, and have seen that it compares well with Advent history. And that all the events in Advent history, that were to be "likened" to the corresponding events in the marriage, are in the past, excepting the knocking, which applies not only to the past and present, but more especially to Satan's last hour of deception and triumph, that is just before us. We say, therefore, that the time has come for the fulfillment of our Saviour's words, "THEN shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom," &c. Now they can be compared, for the events of both are history.—May the servants of the Lord be endowed with meekness and heavenly wisdom, so as to compare the two in such a manner that the scattered flock may see their present position, and be ready to hail with joy the King of glory, "when he shall return from the wedding."

But it may be asserted that the church is the bride of Christ, and that the marriage cannot take place till Christ comes to earth to take his people to himself. We have not space to take up the subject of the bride at this time as we should be glad to, and answer every objection, but will present a very few ideas. Said the Angel to John, "Come hither, I will shew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife." Well, this is the very thing we wish to understand. The angel promised to show John the bride, and if he showed him the church, then it is forever settled that the church is the bride of Christ. One positive testimony is worth more on this point, or any other, than a hundred inferences. But what did the angel show to John in fulfillment of his promise that he would show him the bride? Let John answer.

"And he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that Great City, the Holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God." Rev. xxi 9, 10.

Then instead of the bride being the church, it is the "Great City, the Holy Jerusalem." But, says an objector, "It will take a great deal to make me believe that a City, made of different kinds of stone is the bride of Christ. Let me say, my brother, your objection is against the plain testimony of the Bible. If you object to that, we can say nothing to help you. Do be reconciled with the word of God. But, really, is it not as easy to credit the testimony of the beloved disciple, when he testifies that the Holy Jerusalem is the bride of Christ, as that of Paul that the New Jerusalem is the mother of the church? Says Paul; "But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all." Gal. iv, 26. It may also be said, that it is hard to believe that a literal city of stones is the mother of the church. But Adventists should not be "slow of heart" to believe Bible testimony.

The principle Scripture brought to prove that the church is the bride of Christ, is Eph. v, 22—33. But it should first be particularly noticed, that Paul's subject is the duty of husband and wife. The union that should exist between them is strikingly illustrated by the union that exists between Christ and the church. But the Apostle does not intimate that the church is the bride of Christ. Those who use this text to prove that the church is the bride, infer that it is so, merely because Paul chose the union existing between Christ and the church, to show the duty of man and wife. Those who have had much to say upon the insufficiency of inferential reasoning should not rest their faith relative to the bride, on such a weak inference, which contradicts the plain testimony of John. Rev. xxi, 9, 10.

Christ is the "everlasting Father" of his people, [Isa. ix, 6,] the New Jerusalem the mother, [Gal. iv, 26,] and the members of the church of Christ are the children. Soon the whole family in heaven and in earth will be gathered. The view that the church is the bride of Christ, not only unites by marriage, the father with the children, but the bridegroom with the guests. It should here be understood that the virgins in the parable were not the bride. They represent the church, while the bride represents the New Jerusalem, the Lamb's wife. This fact being understood, we may now see that the marriage of the Lamb takes place in heaven, where the bride is, before he comes to call forth the sleeping saints, and to change the living righteous. For when he comes, he does not come to the wedding, but returns from the wedding. Says Jesus:

"Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will RETURN FROM THE WEDDING." Luke xii, 35, 36.

The marriage of the king's son [Matt. xxii, 1—14,] was designed to illustrate the same as the parable of the ten virgins, though its application may embrace more. There was a period in the marriage of the king's son, when the king came in to examine the guests. He found one destitute of a wedding garment, who was bound hand and foot, and cast out. Now this is an important portion of the parable, and has a direct application, as well as the other parts of it. But it is perfectly impossible to make any application of it to the view of the marriage, that the church is the bride, and that the marriage takes place at, or after the Second Advent. For it cannot be supposed that Christ, at his second coming, would take any to himself, into the air, or into the City, who were unprepared, and upon examination would be found destitute of what may be represented by a wedding garment, and have to be cast out into the earth again! But apply the marriage where it should be applied, to the preparatory scenes of the coming of the Son of man, and all is clearly understood.

As we are now in the time of the marriage, we may expect a message to be given, that will test and try those who have been called out from the world and churches, by those messages that brought them to the time of the marriage in 1844. The work of this message will compare with the examination of the guests in the marriage. And we believe that the third angel's message is just such a test, by which the guests are now being examined. If there had been no danger of some losing their garments in this trying time, in which the saints were to wait for the return of the Lord from the wedding, then there would have been no need of the caution. "Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame." Rev. xv, 15. Those who have drawn "back," we fear "to perdition," have been improperly called foolish virgins. It seems evident that those who really believed the Lord's coming in 1844, and acted out their faith, are represented by the wise virgins. Such had their names borne in with Christ to the marriage. But their state is represented by the man destitute of a wedding garment. We must now leave this interesting subject for the present, and may God add his blessing.

We have hastily written out this subject, and doubtless our readers will discover many defects we shall, however, be happy to answer all reasonable objections and inquiries relative to it. W.

THE SEVENTH ANGEL.—It is reasonable to believe that the three woes angels at least are all of the same nature. The fifth and sixth angels are understood to be symbols. The seventh is a symbol also, and not the literal trump that is to wake up the sleeping saints at the coming of Christ. When the trump of God is heard, the saints then come forth, and the living righteous are changed "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and are caught away from the earth." But the seventh angel is to sound for days, evidently years.

"But in the DAYS of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." Rev. x, 7.

The sounding of the fifth angel occupied 150 years, and the sixth, 391 years and fifteen days. The sounding of the seventh angel is also to occupy a period of years. Under the fifth was a series of events which have transpired according to prophecy, also under the sixth. There is also a series of events, predicted to take place under the sounding of the

THE REVIEW AND HERALD.

"Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

SARATOGA SPRINGS, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1851.

THE ANGELS OF REV. xiv.—No. 2.

Having, as we think, clearly shown, by way of introduction, that the thirteenth chapter of Revelation, and the first five verses of the fourteenth chapter are one connected chain of past, present and future events, beginning with the Papacy, and reaching into the future, to the complete redemption of the 144,000, when they shall stand on Mount Zion with the Lamb, we will now notice another chain of events, symbolized by a series of angels proclaiming messages. This chain begins with the sixth verse of the fourteenth chapter, where the former chain ends.

In this chapter six angels are introduced, five of them having sayings or cries. The messages of the first three angels are directed to those living on the earth. And as literal angels are not sent to preach the gospel to the inhabitants of this world, we must conclude that these angels and their messages are symbols, representing three distinct messages of Bible truth to be proclaimed by God's called and chosen servants. That John in vision saw literal angels in heaven, and heard their voices, is evident; but the fulfillment of the prophecy must certainly be on earth, where the messages were needed to bring out, and to perfect the church of Christ, preparatory to his second coming. The fact that the position of the Son of man upon the great white cloud, with his most kingly crown and sharp sickle, ready to reap the harvest of the earth, is the next link in this prophetic chain, is strong evidence that these three proclamations relate to the Second Advent, and that they immediately precede it.

These three angels are the same in character, though their messages differ, and each symbolize a distinct proclamation to be given by God's servants in this mortal state, prior to the Second Advent.

These angels follow each other. It is expressly stated in reference to the second angel, "And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen." Also, of the third it is said, "And the third angel followed them." The first angel delivers the burden of his message and then gives place to the second who follows. The second gives his important message, and gives place to the third, who finishes his work and retires from the field before the "Son of man" is seen on the great white cloud with his sickle, ready to reap the harvest of the earth.

All classes of Advent believers have been ready to admit that the first of these three angels symbolized the proclamation of the second coming of Christ and the judgment, that has been given, especially in this country, and has called out a people who profess to be looking for Christ. As this view, which has been so universally adopted, is the only consistent view that can be taken of this subject, we feel in duty bound to adhere to it. But when this view of the first angel is taken, we are naturally led to look for two other distinct messages to be given to the people of God, in fulfillment of the sayings of the second and third angels. Those who admit that the message of the first angel has been given, to be consistent, should not teach that it lasts to the coming of the Lord; for in so doing they give no place for the two that follow. To say that the second and third messages are to be given after Christ comes, is too gross an absurdity to be advanced by any one. Then, if the first message is to last unto the coming of Christ, two important links of this prophetic chain are taken out and laid aside.

To say that these three messages are to be given at the same time, is as absurd as to teach that the seven angels of Revelation all sound at once. "Order is heaven's first law." But what perfect confusion would be caused in the church of Christ, if the messages of these three angels, so unlike each other, should be proclaimed with loud voices at the same period of time!

We do not say that the "everlasting gospel" has ceased to have effect upon all, for some are now embracing the doctrine of the speedy coming of the Lord, who have not been identified with the Advent people in the past movements. But that the burden of the message of the first angel is in the past, let the facts in the case testify. We have only to compare the present state of the Advent cause with the past, say from 1840 to 1844, to see that the special flight and proclamation of the first angel is in the past. Neither do we say that the message of the second angel, setting forth the fallen state of the various sects, with the call to leave them, cannot now be obeyed by those honest children of the Lord who find themselves bound by sectarian creeds. But when we compare the wonderful movement under the second angel in 1844, when the entire Advent body, with very few exceptions, came away from the several churches, with what has been done since that time in this respect, we shall not fail to see that the burden of the second angel is in the past, and that its place was prior to our great disappointment in 1844. The following from the "Voice of Truth Extra," of Dec. 1844, relative to the first two angels of Rev. xiv, expresses the faith of the Advent body at that time, with very few exceptions.

"We are doubtless near that auspicious hour when the harvest of the earth will be reaped, as described in Rev. xiv, 14—16. The history of God's people in this mortal state, as given in that chapter, before being glorified, is nearly complete. The everlasting gospel, as described in verses 6 and 7, has been preached unto every nation, kindred, tongue and people; saying with a loud voice, fear God and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come, and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters. No case can be more clearly demonstrated with facts than that this message has been borne to every nation and tongue under heaven, within a few past years, in the preaching of the coming of Christ in '43 or near at hand. Through the medium of lectures and publications, the sound has gone into all the earth, and the word unto the ends of the world.

"The fall of Babylon, as described in verse 8, has been proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of the land. The spiritual death, and the deep corruption of the churches which constitute Babylon, together with her own often repeated lamentations, and acknowledgments, and the fact that God's people have actually come out of her, prove beyond all contradiction that this message has been given and had its effect. This work is done. This angel has flown. Babylon, the nominal church, is fallen. God's people have come out of her. She is now the 'synagogue of Satan.' Rev. iii, 9. 'The habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and cage of every unclean and hateful bird.' Rev. xviii, 2."

Those who are giving the warning message of the third angel have followed down the simple chain of prophecy contained in the fourteenth chapter of Revelation. While the first message was being given, our eyes were holden that we did not see the second, and so in relation to the third, while the second was being given. Now we see the third message as clearly as we saw the former ones. In fact, we are able to define our position with much more clearness than ever before, for this reason, we can now see the several links of the prophetic chain contained in this chapter.

To avoid the natural and reasonable conclusion that the third message is to be given, and that we are now entering the time of the angel's loud voice, efforts are being made to show that the Advent people have been entirely mistaken in their application of the first and second angels of this prophetic chain.

Henry Jones, in an article in the "Advent Harbinger," labored to show that the three angels of Rev. xiv, 6—12, would be heard after Christ was seen coming in the clouds of heaven. We are of the opinion that he will have to enjoy this view alone, or nearly so, for certainly but few, if any, can be found who will adopt a view so absurd. Really, we should think it would be too late to dispatch three angels, with each a different message, "to preach unto them that dwell on the earth," after Christ is seen coming in the clouds of heaven.

On the other hand, C. Stowe, in an article published in the "Advent Herald," labors hard to remove the bounds, and carry the messages of the three angels back to the 12th, 14th and 16th centuries, to the days of Waldo, Wickliffe and Luther. But as the history produced does not at all fit the prophecy, we think the view nearly as absurd as that which places the three messages after Christ is seen coming.

We will here give extracts from a "Tract on Prophecy," published by J. V. Himes, entitled, "Our Specific Work."

"The proclamation of an everlasting gospel—'The hour of his judgment is come,'—(Rev. xiv, 6, 7),—is the leading advent proclamation."

"The facts, summed up, are these. John, looking into the distant future—gazing upon the theatre of the final conflict, sees a messenger—a minister of an everlasting gospel, fly through mid-heaven, with a special, elevated, joyous, public proclamation, requiring haste and extraordinary energy in its delivery. The proclamation contains a fact, and a command founded upon that fact. 1. The fact—'The hour of his judgment is come.' 2. The command—'Fear God,' &c. These are the elements of this special commission. The work of this symbol agent is thus clearly defined—no terms more specific."

"Does this messenger symbolize a class of teachers? Such has been the general understanding of expositors. Mr. Wesley and Dr. Benson so interpret the passage. On this point there is a great unanimity. It is plain from the fact that it is said to preach. That class of people is modern. Mr. Wesley and Dr. Benson make this messenger symbolize the Protestant reformers in the days of Luther. With their views agree a mass of expositors. This commission, however, cannot be Luther's."

"That body must exist somewhere, and, in its character and in the nature of its work, it must agree with the symbol messenger. They must agree as face to face in a mirror. Can such a body be found? The proclamation above stated has been heard. The world can bear testimony to this. The cry, 'The hour of his judgment come,' sounded through all Christendom. The multitudes heard, and scoffed, or trembled. By what body of believers was this proclamation made? Not by those who taught that that judgment was a thousand years in the future! No church which holds to the doctrine of a spiritual reign can be that body, as the elements of their proclamation flatly contradict those elements above stated. Such a body now existing can be found alone among those who constitute the Advent believers in Europe and America."

"Take up the stumbling-block out of the way of my people."

An article with the above caption appeared in the "Advent Herald" a few weeks since, which it may be proper to notice. The writer attempts to show that these messages have been misapplied, and that the stumbling-block must be removed by showing that they have no application to the present time. "If the Advent preaching fulfills the first angel's message," says Sister Stowe, "then there remain the messages of two angels following in succession, to be fulfilled in two distinct proclamations, before the coming of Christ." The sad effect of the view that the third angel addresses himself to us, it is said "need not be named." As this message is the real stumbling-block which the writer wishes to remove, we think it would have been in the highest degree proper, that its evil effects should have been specified. Facts are wanted, not insinuations. This message has had the effect to cause those who would obey God, to embrace all his commandments, and to stand in the patience of the saints, without casting away their confidence, or drawing back to perdition. Rev. xiv, 12; Heb. x, 35, 36.

If, therefore, the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus, be the stumbling-block which the writer wishes to remove, we think it high time that she should stop and inquire, whether she is not laying down a stumbling-block, over which some may stumble into perdition, instead of removing an obstruction, which might turn the honest-hearted out of the way. We see souls "for whom Christ died," stumbling over the traditions of the elders, and trampling under foot the commandments of God. Would to God that Sister Stowe would aid us in removing the real stumbling-block, instead of strengthening the hands of those who are breaking the commandments of God, and teaching men so.

That they are a stumbling-block to those who reject them, we do not deny. Even Jesus was a stumbling-block to many in his day. "But we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God." 1 Cor. i, 23, 24. "As it is written, Behold, I lay in Zion a stumbling stone, and rock of offence; and whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed." Rom. ix, 33. We are pained that the present truth should be an occasion of stumbling to any. But how the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, together with the solemn warning against the worship of the beast and his image, can be an occasion of stumbling to any but the disobedient, we cannot tell. That all whose names are not written in the book of life, shall yet worship the beast, is clear from Rev. xiii, 8. That the two-horned beast is preparing to act its part in the final work of deception and opposition in "the time of trouble, such as never was," is evident to all who are watching "the signs of the times." And that one of the commandments of God, at least, is being openly trampled under foot by his professed people, is also a fact. With these things before us how can we cease to utter the solemn voice of warning, "If any man worship the beast and his image, the same shall drink the wine of the wrath of God. Here is the patience of the saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God." That such a message is imperatively demanded everything around us testifies.

The writer affirms that there is no proof that the proclamation, "Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come," has any reference to the Advent message. To this we answer: 1. It certainly is not the apostolic message. Paul reasoned before Felix of "righteousness, temperance, and JUDGMENT TO COME." Acts xxiv, 25. To the Athenians he declared that God "now commandeth all men everywhere to repent; because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world." Acts xvii, 30, 31. Then to the Thessalonians he writes, that this day of the Lord is not at hand. 2 Thess. ii. It is clear therefore that the apostles did not give this proclamation. 2. We answer further, the Advent preaching is the only message since the days of the apostles that accords with this prophecy. It has demonstrated from the great chains of prophecy, from the prophetic periods, and from the "signs of the times," that we are in the immediate neighborhood of the judgment of the great day. There can be, therefore, but one question further to be asked, viz: The Advent proclamation, is it from heaven or of men? We ask what message can be brought out from any scenes in the past, for which such, or indeed any evidence can be offered? The objection that we could not preach the Advent as an immediate event if two other messages were to follow, is fully answered by the simple fact that our "eyes were holden" that we should not see beyond the work then present.

But an objection to the view that the second angel's message is addressed to the present generation, is raised on the ground that the great city, Babylon, cannot be understood to include the daughters of Babylon. To this we answer that the daughters of a city are included in the city. The daughters of Jerusalem form a part of Jerusalem. Luke xxiii, 28; Lam. iii, 51. The daughters of Rabbah are a part of Rabbah. Jer. xlix, 3. The daughters of Babylon form a part of Babylon. Psalm cxxxvii; Isa. xlvii, 1; Jer. l, 52. The daughters of Mystic Babylon form a part of that great Babylon that will be thrown down, as a millstone is cast into the mighty deep. There is perfect propriety, therefore, in understanding that great Babylon embraces all corrupt Christianity, and that when she had rejected the solemn announcement, "The hour of his judgment is come," God left her forever by his Spirit, and called on his people to come out of her. Her destruction immediately follows. See Rev. xxiii.

It is urged that the first beast must be in the height of his power when the message of the third angel is delivered. The fallacy of this may be seen by comparing Rev. xiv, 9—12, with chapter xiii, 11—18. The comparison shows clearly that the third angel's message pertains to the work of the two-horned beast. This beast acts its part after the first beast has lost its power, and received its deadly wound. It is asserted, indeed, that the beast received his deadly wound before his reign of 1260 years, instead of receiving it at its close. No evidence that a deadly wound was then given to it is presented. But that the Papal beast did receive a deadly wound at the close of its period of triumph, when the Papal government was subverted, and the Pope carried a prisoner into France, is a fact too well known to be easily set aside.

It is asked how it could be said "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord," in immediate connection with the Advent? We answer that there is to be a "time of trouble such as never was." Dan. xii. The third angel's message is a warning with reference to that scene. Rev. xiv, 9—12; xiii, 11—18. Habakkuk "trembled in himself that he might rest in the day of trouble." Hab. iii, 16. Job prays "O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me secret till thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time and remember me." Job xiv, 13. Jeremiah exclaims, "Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it; it is even the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it. Jer. xxx, 7. We understand that the language of blessing is uttered in view of this awful scene. The dead were never in danger of purgatory, hence there is no propriety in "suggesting" that henceforth they need not be in fear of it!

None have claimed that the two-horned beast has yet exercised all the arbitrary power of the first beast. It is in view of what he will do that the third angel utters his voice of warning. That the predicted "wonders" of this beast are being rapidly developed we most firmly believe. The Protestant church has rejected greater light than the Catholic church was ever favored with. It remains, therefore, that greater darkness and deception come upon it. Luke xi, 34, 35; 2 Thess. ii, 9—12. The Jewish church rejected the truths of the first Advent, though based on overwhelming evidence, and as a natural consequence the "hour and power of darkness" came upon them, [Luke xxiii, 53,] and they seized the Son of God and put him to a shameful death. The Protestant church has rejected the truths of the second Advent though based on greater evidence than that which was presented to the Jewish church. The hour of temptation is coming on all those who have not kept the word of Christ's patience. We may then expect the same bitter work of persecution. One thing is certain "the image" is something distinct from the beast. The beast and the image cannot both be applied to Papacy.

The first beast is applied to the Roman civil power. The two-horned beast is applied to the Roman hierarchy, or priesthood. To this we answer that the thirteenth chapter of Revelation gives us an account of the dragon's act of giving power and authority to the beast. This power he was to retain forty and two months, and exercise it in oppressing and wearing out the saints of God. If this does not refer to the reign of that blasphemous power, Papacy, we know of no place where his reign is described. The Roman priesthood never yet sought (as this theory declares,) to make the world worship the civil power, but instead of that it has always sought to subject the civil power to the priesthood. The idea that an ecclesiastical body is ever termed a beast in the prophecies, will be found, if examined, to be without any foundation. Dan. vii, 17, 23.

Sister S. next proceeds to make an application of the first message. This we are told was fulfilled in the twelfth century, in the days of Peter Waldo. On what foundation this application rests we now proceed to inquire. The first angel announces that the hour of God's judgment is come. Could it be said that the hour of God's judgment had come in the twelfth century? No! Certainly not. The writer does not tell us how it could be. Was it nigh at hand? To answer this we will refer to the prophecies which mark the time of the judgment. The seventh chapter of Daniel, which gives the 1260 years reign of the little horn, shows that at least six centuries from the days of Waldo must elapse, before the Ancient of days should sit in judgment. The Lord Jesus told his disciples that when they should see certain signs, they might know that his coming (to judge the quick and dead) was nigh at hand. These signs were not witnessed in the twelfth century, for our Lord locates them near the close of the days of tribulation, where they actually began to occur, viz. in 1780. Matt. xxiv, 29, 30; Mark xiii, 24. Until then Jesus did not authorize the disciples to believe that the judgment was at hand. They certainly could not find evidence from the word of God, that the hour of God's judgment had come in the twelfth century, or that it was nigh at hand, for the evidence was of a contrary character. But there is another astonishing feature of absurdity in this view. The very prophecies which determine our relative distance from the judgment, were closed up and sealed until the time of the end. That is, until about 1798. Dan. xii. Nothing can be more absurd than the view that this proclamation, "The hour of his judgment is come," was made before the signs which were to precede it had been seen, or the prophecies which contain the evidences on the point, had been opened. To assert that this proclamation was made, before the church understood those prophecies on which it is based, or rather to suppose that it was made at a time when the prophecies contained a large amount of evidence to the contrary, is to assume that a message without any scriptural foundation, and absolutely contradicting the Bible, could be a fulfillment of this prophecy! No such proclamation, however, was made by Peter Waldo, and we ought to be slow to wrest things to make them answer a desired purpose. Nor can it be said that the hour of God's judgment on Babylon had then come, for the writer shows that it did not reach the height of its power till near a century and a half later. The eighteenth chapter of Revelation shows that the hour of Babylon's judgment, follows the second angel's message, and that it is even yet future. See verses 8—10, 15—17.

The fact that the first message could not be given until the prophecies on which it is based were unsealed and understood, is conclusive proof that the second and third angels could not have given their messages centuries before that event. The entire family of Babylon now exists. The people of God at the time of the first angel's message, were to a greater or less extent united with that great city. As the glorious truth of the speedy coming of Jesus Christ was utterly rejected by her, nothing more could be done to heal, and to save her. The people of God were then called by the second angel to flee out of her. This has left her the hold of foul spirits, and the cage of unclean and hateful birds.

As we are approaching the time of final conflict with the beast and his image, we are constrained to lift the voice of warning and sound the alarm to others. The Lord helping us we shall still strive to vindicate the commandments of God, which the beast has vainly attempted to destroy.

It is little short of downright folly, to apply these messages to the period when the church was in the wilderness, and the witnesses were clothed in sackcloth. Rev. xii, 6, 14; xi, 3. The plain reading of the messages, and their associated events, shows that they are intimately connected with the opening scenes of the day of God. When the Jews wished to evade the words of the prophets they set them far ahead. "The vision that he seeth is for many days to come, and he prophesieth of times that are far off." Ezekiel xii, 27. In order to rid ourselves of those cutting truths by which the Lord would separate us from the world, we throw them away back in the past. Though we may thus deceive ourselves, we may rest assured that God is not mocked. We entreat our friends, and all who have an "ear to hear," that they no longer break the commandments of God, that they may cherish the institutions of the beast. To us is addressed the voice of warning, and of instruction. "If any man worship the beast and his image, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God. Here is the patience of the saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." J. N. A.

The "Great Supper."

Luke xiv, 16. A certain man made a great supper, and bade many. Compare with Matt. xxii, 2—10.

FIRST MESSAGE.

Verse 17th. "And sent his servants at SUPPER TIME to say to them that were bidden, come, for all things are now ready." Explanation given by "Wcs. Mid. Cry." "A call to supper implies a little previous notice, that guests may cease from the labors of the day, and prepare themselves.—This text has had its fulfillment in the proclamation of the coming of the Lord in or about 1843."

Verse 18th. "And they ALL with one consent began to make excuse. The first said unto him, I have bought a piece of ground, and must needs go and see it: I pray thee have me excused." "Or in other words" the Lord cannot come yet, for there are large portions of the earth yet uninhabited. "A piece of ground" in the way.

Verse 19th. "And another said I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them, I pray thee have me excused." "I have so much business on hand that I have not time to examine the subject."

Verse 20th. "And another said, I have married a wife, and therefore CANNOT COME." "It is well to be ready, but as for me, it is my business to attend to my family," &c.

"IT'S JEWISH."

BY ROSWELL F. COTTRELL.

When we present God's holy law,
And arguments from scripture draw;
Objectors say, to pick a flaw,
"It's Jewish."

Though at the first Jehovah blessed
And sanctified His day of rest;
The same belief is still expressed—
"It's Jewish."

Though with the world this rest began,
And thence through all the scriptures ran,
And Jesus said 'twas made for man—
"It's Jewish."

Though not with Jewish rites, which passed,
But with the moral law 'twas classed
Which must endure while time shall last—
"It's Jewish."

Though the disciples, Luke and Paul,
Continue still this rest to call
The "Sabbath day," this answers all—
"It's Jewish."

The gospel teachers' plain expression,
That "Sin is of the law transgression,"
Seems not to make the least impression—
"It's Jewish."

They love the rest of man's invention,
But if Jehovah's day we mention,
This puts an end to all contention—
"It's Jewish."

THE PERPETUITY OF THE LAW OF GOD.

BY J. N. ANDREWS.—[Concluded.]

But there is another strong objection existing in the minds of many, which we will now examine. It is this: "The world is under the law, but the Christian is under grace, and not under the school-master." This view admits the fact that the law of God is not abolished, but attempts to show that the Christian is not under obligation to obey it. Nay, that if he should keep its precepts he would be in danger of falling from grace! We say that this view is based on the fact that the law was not abolished at the crucifixion, for an abolished law cannot hold men under it, neither can it convince men of sin as its transgressors, after it has ceased to exist. The fact that the law is our school-master to bring us to Christ, shows conclusively that it has not been abolished. Because an abolished law can never show men that they are condemned and must perish without a Saviour. This view then, is distinct from the idea that the law was abolished at Christ's death. For if it was abolished at that time, then the world is not under it. If the world is under the law, then it has not been abolished. Let us examine the testimony on this subject.

Gal. iii, 23—26. "But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. Wherefore the law was our school-master to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a school-master, for ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus."

Rom. vi, 14, 15. "For sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace. What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid." What is it to be under the law then? Hear the testimony of the Bible. Rom. iii, 19, 23. "Now we know, that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God. For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." Then in the sight of God, the whole world is condemned and become guilty before him, as transgressors of his law. The sentence of condemnation is just and righteous, so that EVERY MOUTH IS STOPPED. Where is there hope of salvation then? Surely, man in this state is lost.

How is the law a school-master to bring us to Christ? Answer. The law shows our guilt and just condemnation, and that we are lost without a Saviour. Read Paul's account of this school in Rom. vii, 7—25. "By the law is the knowledge of sin." Rom. iii, 20. "I had not known sin but by the law." Rom. vii, 7. Then the instruction of the law is absolutely necessary, that we may know ourselves to be sinners in the sight of God. We find ourselves sinners by past offences, and unable to render present obedience. The just penalty of the law hangs over our heads; we find ourselves lost, and fly to Jesus Christ for refuge. What does he do to save us from the curse of the law? Does he abolish the law, that he may save its transgressor? He tells us that he did "not come to destroy" it; and we know that the law being holy, just, and good, cannot be taken back without destroying the government of Him who gave it. Does the Saviour modify its character, and lessen its requirements? Far from it. He testifies that not one jot or tittle shall "pass from it till all be fulfilled." Matt. v, 18; Luke xvi, 17; James ii, 10. And he shows that those who in heart commit any act of iniquity, are transgressors of the law. Matt. v, 22, 27, 28; I John iii, 15. If the Saviour did not abolish or relax the law, how can guilty man hope for salvation? What then does the Saviour do? He gives himself to die in our stead. He offers his own "life a ransom for many." Matt. xx, 28. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii, 16. We now lay hold on Jesus Christ as the great atonement for our transgressions, and receive a full and free pardon of all offence. A way has now been laid open by which man, though justly condemned by the law of God, can yet be saved without dishonoring, or making void the law. God can be just and yet "the justifier of him who believes in Jesus." Rom. iii, 25, 26.

Need we inquire further what it is to be under grace? We have already seen in what manner we are saved, notwithstanding the law condemns us, and yet the claims of the law are not made void. When we were lost and ruined by transgression, and had no way to escape the just sentence of the law, God gave his own Son to die for us. The law can then allow mercy to enter and offer pardon to all who will accept it by faith in Jesus Christ. In his person mercy and truth meet together. The law justly condemns us; Jesus bears our sins in his own body on the tree; faith in him justifies, and saves us. The law brings us to faith; faith does not make void the law, but establishes it. Those who are under sin are under the law, those who have been pardoned are under grace. Two states then are brought to view in the New Testament.—1. Under the law.—2. Under grace. Those who are under the law, are condemned: those who are under grace, are pardoned. We ask, does Christ come and die to redeem us from the just sentence of the law, that he may bring us to a state where we may at pleasure violate its precepts? Is the law of a character so sacred that it must needs have the death of the Son of God for its atonement, and when the sinner has obtained pardon, is it then "relaxed, or slacked up," so that it is at his option whether to obey it or not? Does this state of grace give us license to violate the law of God? In answer to these inquiries, we are told that "that part of the law which Christ quoted is certainly binding on us. But those precepts which he did not quote, are not to be regarded, for they ceased at his death." We answer, there is an end to this part of the controversy then, for the law which brings us to Christ for salvation, must most certainly be that law which condemns us. And no part of the law can condemn us, save that which is now in existence. And if it be admitted that we are not at liberty to violate any part of that law which brings us to Christ, we leave this part of the subject, and inquire whether a part of the law was left out by Jesus. For the question we are examining turns on this point. Did our Lord re-enact a part of the law, and leave the remainder to expire, or be abolished at his death? Let us examine the facts in the case. At no one time did our Saviour quote all the commandments. And indeed we may say that he never quoted the first, the second, or the fourth commandment. And still farther, he does not re-enact those precepts which he quotes, but refers to them as a part of the law of God. But one or two views can be taken of this subject.—1. Christ meant that those commandments which he quoted were the only ones which should henceforth be binding; or, 2. He appealed to the law of God as to the highest authority, and cited those commandments which were particularly adapted to the cases of those persons with whom he conversed. If the first view be correct, then Jesus meant to teach that henceforward they were not under obligation to obey the first, second, or fourth commandment! And this in the face of the fact that they were all to continue till the crucifixion, when as some say they were all abolished. Further, it is assumed, not proved, that he re-enacted those precepts which he quoted. For, to say the least, the idea is a very strange one, that he should re-enact a law which was already in force. But if the other position be correct, viz., that by quoting a part of the law he sanctioned its high authority, and left it on its own basis, as the law of his Father, then are we correct in saying that the whole law as such brings us to Christ, and when we are justified by faith, we are by no means at liberty to violate one of its precepts. The fact that the law is our school-master, to show us the just claims of God, and our own just condemnation, shows plainly that it has not been abolished; hence, though we have been pardoned through God's free grace, we can never violate its precepts without being "convinced" by it "as transgressors." That we are justified by grace through faith is evident, [Eph. ii, 8,] and yet faith does not "make void the law." For the whole plan of salvation is based on the justice of God's law, and the sufficiency of Christ's atonement. The law stands out before us to show us our transgressions. "The gospel of the grace of God" shows us how we may be pardoned. We are justified by grace through faith. Faith works by love. This is the love of God that we keep his commandments. Thus love is the fulfilling of the law.

Gal. iv, 21—31. Those who would reject pardon by faith in Jesus Christ, and take their own chance for salvation through a law which justly condemns them, and shuts their mouths, are here addressed. The Holy Spirit illustrates the old and new covenants by an allegory drawn from the family of Abraham. The great promise having been made to Abraham, that he and his seed should inherit the earth, he was, by virtue of this covenant, called the "father of all them that believe." Rom. iv, 11. This covenant was based on "the righteousness of faith," and contained all those blessings which the subsequent ones secured to his seed. The covenant from Sinai added another condition, viz., "the righteousness of the law." The new covenant is based on the original condition, and points us to Christ's atonement, as the source of grace, that we may fulfill the righteousness of the law." Rom. viii, 3, 4. Notice, it is not the law of God which is represented by the bond-woman, neither is it the gospel which is represented by Sarah. But Hagar represents Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children, and Sarah represents Jerusalem which is above, which is free, which is the mother of us all. The son of the bond-woman represents the children of Old Jerusalem by the first covenant, even as Isaac represents the children of the New Jerusalem, by the new covenant. The bondage of literal Israel was not because the law of God was given to them, but because they were its transgressors,—the servants of sin. John viii, 33—36. The freedom of those who are the children of the New Jerusalem is not that the law has been abolished, but that they have been made free from sin. Rom. vi, 22.

Gal. v. That the "yoke of bondage" here spoken of means "the law of commandments contained in ordinances," and not the law of God, is evident from many considerations. The ordinance of circumcision was not one of the precepts of the royal law—was not a part of the ten commandments; but it belonged to the law of Moses. John, viii, 23. The apostles [Acts xv.] in treating of circumcision, and the law of Moses in general, call it a yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear. But that the law of God, so far from being a yoke of bondage, is the delight of God's saints, both testaments prove. Ps. i, 2; cxix, 174; Rom. vii, 7, 22; viii, 1-7; 1 John v, 3. And the fourth commandment is particularly pointed out as such, Isa. lviii, 13, 14. Those who observed circumcision were debtors to do the whole law of Moses; for if one of its ordinances is binding all of them must be. Then we should have to return to its offerings and atonements, and thereby reject the one offering of Jesus Christ, the only ground of justification before God. The typical service was succeeded by the antitypical, when the bond-woman was succeeded by the free-woman. "Love is the fulfilling of the law?" Why so? Answer: Because, "This is the love of God that we keep his commandments," and "love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." 1 John, v, 3; Rom. xiii, 10.—Love to God consists in rendering obedience to those commandments which contain our duty to Him; love to our neighbor consists in obeying those commandments which contain our duty to him. Those who love God with all their hearts, and their neighbor as themselves, render cheerful obedience to those precepts which hang on these two great commandments, not forgetting the "new commandment" of Jesus, that his people love one another EVEN AS HE LOVED US. John, xiii, 34; 1 John iii, 16, 22-24. Love then does not make void the law, but fulfills it. Charity, the perfect love of God, is then the end, the object, the design of the commandments of God. If we are led by the Spirit we are not under the law, for AGAINST those who bring forth its fruit, there is no law. Gal. v. 18-23.

Eph. ii, 11-17. The care with which Paul has stated what was abolished at the crucifixion, will enable us to understand the subject in its true light. Does he testify that the law of God was abolished? Far from it, for in chapter vi, he enforces the duty of obedience to parents by quoting the fifth commandment. What does he say? He testifies that Christ abolished in his flesh the enmity, the law of commandments contained in ordinances. The middle wall of partition was thus broken down, and the enmity between Jews and Gentiles was slain by the cross, that through the one offering, both might be reconciled to God. The law of ordinances, which pointed forward to the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, was abolished or done away in him; because the body had been reached which cast the shadow. Col. ii, 17. To this law the Gentiles never were amenable, for it was a wall of separation between themselves and literal Israel. But that all men were under the law of God, and condemned by its precepts, is clearly shown. Rom. iii, 14-23. And this is further evident from the fact that all need a share in the atonement. Eph. ii, 16; Gal. iv, 4, 5; Heb. ii, 9. The one law pertained only to Israel, to the other law all mankind were amenable. By the one, the whole world was condemned, and shown to be guilty before God; by the other, was given a typical atonement, which pointed forward to the offering of Him who should die for the sins of the world. The one having reached its antitype, is abolished; but the other stands, if possible, on a firmer basis than ever. Rom. iii, 31. For the immutability of its character is shown in that the Son of God must lay down his life before guilty man could be rescued from its just sentence. The ordinances of the Jewish Church, ceased with that Church, being succeeded by those of the Christian Church. But the law of God pertains to men not as members of any Church, but as moral agents, amenable to the government of God; hence it is not changed, relaxed, or abolished by any dispensation.

Jesus Christ came not to destroy this law, but he did abolish the law of ordinances, nailing it to his cross. The PRECEPTS of the one were spoken by the voice of God, and were written with his own finger in tables of stone; but the other was written by the hand of Moses in a book. The one was the "royal law" from the "King eternal;" the other is "the hand-writing of ordinances." Matt. v, 17-19; xix, 17; James ii, 8-12; Rom. vii, 7, 12, 22; Eph. ii, 15; Col. ii, 14; Acts, xv, 5.

Col. ii, 14-17. A second testimony is borne to the same point. The hand-writing of ordinances was taken out of the way by Jesus, and nailed to his cross. This law being written by the hand of Moses in a book might be blotted out, but the words engraved by the finger of God in stone, never! This law having been abolished, we are not to be judged by any of its festivals or ordinances. Mark the contrast. James introduces that part of the royal law which contains our duty to our neighbor, [compare Matt. xxii, 35-40; James ii, 8,] quotes several of its precepts, and shows us that he who violates a part, is guilty of breaking the whole law, and adds, "so speak ye, and so do, as THEY THAT SHALL BE JUDGED BY THE LAW OF LIBERTY." That we should not be judged by an abolished law is perfectly natural; that we should be judged by a law to which all men are amenable, is in the highest degree reasonable. We have before noticed other sabbaths, besides the Sabbath of the Lord; we here contrast the laws by which they were enforced.

Heb. viii, 6-13. The promises on which the two covenants were based are here noticed. The first required perfect obedience to the law of God, [Jer. xi, 4, 5; Ex. xix; xx,] but did not contain those clear and gracious promises of pardon through Jesus Christ that were needed by fallen guilty man. Hence it was not faultless, though the law of God on which it was based as its condition is pronounced by both testaments to be perfect, holy, just and good. Ps. xix; Rom. vii. The covenant "waxed old," because its conditions were broken; hence the new covenant, based on better promises, was introduced. This covenant shows us the great atonement from whence we may expect pardon, reveals to us the fountain of grace, from whence we may receive strength to yield obedience, and places the law of God in our hearts. Jer. xxxi, 33; Heb. viii, 10; x, 16. The transition from the old covenant to the new, is marked by the death of the Testator. Heb. ix, 15-17; 1 Cor. xi, 25; Gal. iii, 19. But if the law of God was abolished at that time, then no law was in existence to place in the hearts of the people of God! Nor can this point be met fairly by saying that Christ brought forward a part of the law by quoting it, for it would be absurd to believe that he re-enacted part of a law which was already in force, or rather that he re-enacted a part of the law, and then abolished the whole! Those who adopt this idea, are bound to explain why Christ should omit the first, second, and fourth commandments. Or rather, they are bound to prove that he re-enacted those commandments which he quoted, for their argument is mere assertion till this is done. We repeat, there is but one Law-giver, and this is not the Son, but the Father.—James iv, Ex. xx.

James ii. The royal law is here enforced by James in an unmistakable manner. Had he believed that it was abolished, or that it was a "yoke of bondage," he would never have said, "If ye fulfill the royal law," "ye do well." Nay, he would never have asserted that if they had respect to persons they would commit sin and be convinced of the law as transgressors; for an abolished law can never convince a man of sin. Rom. iv, 15. The sixth and seventh commandments of this law are then quoted. And we are shown that the transgressor of one precept is guilty of breaking all; [MacKnight;] which is not unlike the words of our Lord, that "one jot or tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." Then if one part be in force, it is all in force. If one commandment be broken, all are broken. Such is the testimony of James. How can those, who violate the fourth commandment, meet this in the Judgment? See verse 12. But the fourth commandment is evaded thus: The Sabbath has been changed, and good men in past ages have kept the first, instead of the seventh day. Are we not safe in following them? We offer to yield the first point when one text is brought which testifies that the Sabbath has been changed, or that the first day was ever sanctified by God, or that we are required to keep it holy. Further, we reply that every man is accountable to God for the light which shines before him. The fact that God has given us light on this subject, shows that we have no excuse for further disobedience—no cloak for our sins. Certainly we cannot plead the right to make void the "commandment of God" that we may keep "the tradition of the elders." Mark vii, 9. The fourth commandment is definite, requiring us to keep that day holy which God himself rested upon, and sanctified. We may charge God with folly in giving this commandment, but in the day of Judgment we shall find that obedience would have been far better.

1 John iii, 3, 4. Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law; for sin is the transgression of the law. And ye know that he was manifested to take away our sins, and in him is no sin. Notice these striking thoughts. The definition of sin is "the transgression of the law." Every sinner is a transgressor of the law. In Christ was no sin, hence no transgression of the law. Jesus was manifested to take away our sins. How does he do this? He dies for us that we may be delivered from the just sentence of the law; its execution is stayed, that mercy may be permitted to enter, and offer pardon through the blood of Christ. The refusal of pardon offered at such an immense cost, greatly enhances the guilt of the transgressors; for they have not only violated the law of God, but by this act they tread under foot his Son who died to redeem them.

From these testimonies we conclude that the New Testament teaches the perpetuity of the law of God, and for that reason does not re-enact any part of it.

THE ROYAL LAW CONTENDED FOR.

SOME BRIEF GROUNDS, SERVING TO PROVE THAT THE TEN COMMANDMENTS ARE YET IN FULL FORCE, AND SHALL SO REMAIN TILL HEAVEN AND EARTH PASS AWAY.

BY EDWARD STENNET.

1. The matter of the ten commandments was written in the heart of Adam before his fall, as doth appear in Gen. i, 27, God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; also in Eccl. vii, 29, God hath made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions. And the Apostle plainly asserts, that the Gentiles which had not the law, (in the letter of it,) did by nature the things contained in the law, which sheweth the work of the law written in their hearts.—Rom. ii, 14, 15. Now if the Gentiles had the word of the law written in their hearts in their sinful state, doubtless they had it in more perfection in their state of innocence, as considered in Adam; for the letter of the law was added, because of transgression. Gal. ii, 19. Now if there was transgression before the letter of the law was added, that implies that there was a law before then; in that the letter of the law is said to be added, it implies that the matter of it was in being before, but much worn by sin; and that is one reason why the Lord was pleased to add the letter.

Let it be considered, how it can stand with Scripture or right reason, that Jesus Christ should abrogate this law. Did Christ blot out this law from the hearts of all men by his death? Then all men have not the law of nature to guide them; for we cannot be so gross as to imagine that the law is put into their hearts upon a new account, for that were to bring all men under the new covenant.

2. God spake all these commandments unto the people, and they heard his voice, (Deut. v, 22-24,) with great majesty and glory, and he added no more; and he wrote them upon two tables of stone, and delivered them unto Moses—all of which holds forth their perpetuity; they are spoken by God, they are written by him in tables of stone; so was never any ceremony. Job desired that his words might be graven with a pen of iron and lead in a rock of stone forever. Job xix, 24.

3. Afterward the first tables were broken, which I suppose did signify the Israelites' breaking of the first covenant; for Moses broke them on account of their having made a golden calf, and so had broken the covenant. Whereupon Moses was then commanded to hew two tables like the first, and God wrote the same words again upon them, (Deut. x, 1-4,) and they only of all the laws were put into the ark, and when the ark is set in its proper place between the cherubim there is nothing in it but the two tables. 1 Kings viii, 9. . . . See Jer. xxxi, 33, where God promises to put his law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts. Now what law is this that must be put into the heart, when the law of sacrifice is abolished? Compare Heb. x, 6-9, with Psalm. xl, 6-8. That this is the law that is here spoken of is manifest if we consider how proper and suitable it is for the heart of a believer. Paul calls it the law of his mind in Rom. vii, 23, and in verse 22 he professeth he delights in the law of God after the inward man; and God saith he will put the law in his heart and write it there; both which phrases hold it forth to be the same law that was written by God and put into the ark. Man's heart is the tables, and God himself is the writer; the matter written is the law.—Hear what Wisdom saith to this: My son, keep my words, and lay up my commandments within thee; keep my commandments and live, and my law as the apple of thine eye; bind them upon thy fingers, write them upon the table of thy heart. Prov. vii, 1. Now what laws are these but the table laws? And Wisdom's son is to have them written upon the fleshy tables of his heart.

4. When God promiseth to exalt his first born higher than the kings of the earth, and that his covenant should stand fast with him, and that his seed should endure forever, and his throne as the days of heaven, (Ps. lxxxix, 28, 29,) yet he saith, If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; if they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgression with a rod, and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless, my loving kindness will I not utterly take away, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. Verses 30-32. Mark it, this covenant was with Christ, (though with David in the type,) in behalf of all the seed; and the chastisements must be the portion of the seed if they break the law of God, though his covenant stand fast. Now as this covenant reaches all the seed, so doth the law and the punishments for the breach of it; and if so, then what law is it that reaches all the seed, if not the law of the ten commandments, with those laws which are comprehended in them.

5. These commandments are eminently distinguished and marked out from all the ceremonial laws, both to show their eminency and perpetuity; they are said to be the work of God, in Exod. xxxii, 16, and the Psalmist saith, The works of his hands are verity and judgment. And these works are called, all his commandments, Ps. cxi, 7, and they are ten. Deut. iv, 13. * *

They are distinguished from the ceremonial ordinances, and called all the commandments, to set forth their number, as before said, and their eminency; and therefore they are so frequently called in the Scripture, the commandments of God, distinct from the other laws, which were shadowy in the time of the law of shadows, (as these places of Scripture, besides many others, do show, viz., Deut. v, 31; vi, 11; vii, 11, viii, 11; xi, 1; xxx, 16; 1 Kings ii, 3; viii, 58; 2 Chron. xix, 10; Neh. i, 7, and x, 29, &c.) and distinct from the testimony of Jesus in clear gospel times. In Rev. xii, 17, note that the dragon's war is with the remnant of the woman's seed which kept the commandments of God and the testimony of Jesus. And again, here are they that keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Rev. xiv, 12. And when the man would know what he should do to be saved, Christ told him that he knew the commandments. A cloud of witnesses would come in, if need were, for the confirmation of them. But farther observe what the Scripture saith to their duration.—The Psalmist saith, All his commandments are sure, they stand fast forever and ever, and are done in truth and uprightness. Psalm cxi, 7, 8. Note it; all his commandments, which are the works of his hands, as aforesaid, stand fast forever and ever; that is not only in the time of the ministration of the letter, which was in a sense for ever, but for ever and ever, that is under both ministrations, that of the letter and that of the spirit, in Old Testament times and in the new. Search and see if you can find any word that doth speak of any thing that is said to abide or stand fast for ever and ever, which comes short of the time aforesaid. And when God hides his face from the house of Jacob, then is the time that the testimony is bound up and the law is sealed among the disciples, (Isa. viii, 16, 17,) clearly relating to the time that the Jews rejected the gospel, and the disciples are commanded to make use of the law as well as the testimony to try the doctrines of others by. Isa. viii, 20. All which shows the perpetuity of this law of God, which will farther appear if we consider Deut. vii, 9. Our Lord saith in Matt. v, 17, 18, Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am come not to destroy, but to fulfill. But the question will be, what law is this? To me it appears to be the law of the ten commandments; for these reasons:

1st. Because this comes in as the motive to provoke his disciples to let their light shine in the world, that men might see their good works and glorify their father which is in heaven. Matt. v, 16. Therefore it must be such a law as the doing of it holds forth good works to public view.

2d. It is such a law as Christ professes he came not to destroy; but the ceremonial law he destroyed in this very sense, so that none are to be in the practice of it; he blotted out the hand-writing of ordinances that was against us, and contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross.

3d. Destroying of the law is here put in direct opposition to fulfilling of it; to destroy is to take out of the way or to blot out as before; but to fulfill the law is to do that which is contained in the law; therefore saith Christ to John, when he went to be baptized, It becometh us to fulfill all righteousness, (that is, to perform it.) Matt. iii, 15. And the Apostle saith, that love is the fulfilling of the law. What law? Why this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, &c. Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law. Rom. xiii, 8-10. So that to fulfill the law of the ten commandments, is not to blot them out or make them void; that were to destroy them, which Christ came not to do, but on the contrary, to do the things contained in them, which he did exactly in his life, and so was offered up a Lamb without spot.

4th. This is such a law as must stand in force, every jot and tittle of it, till heaven and earth pass away. Matt. v. 19. But heaven and earth are not yet passed away; therefore this law stands firm. But because it is said in the text, Till all be fulfilled, hence some affirm that all was fulfilled at the death of Christ, and this fulfilling of it holds forth the abrogating of it.—But did heaven and earth pass away then? or did Christ, by his taking upon him all that guilt which was due to us, and by his perfect fulfilling of it in his walk, take us from our obedience? God forbid. Because Christ fulfilled the righteousness of the law, must we not fulfill it? The Apostle saith that for this end Christ died. For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin condemned sin in the flesh; that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. Rom. viii, 3, 4. But what is the fulfilling of the righteousness of the law, but to do the righteous things contained in the law? And in this sense every true believer doth fulfill the law, though his completeness be in Christ; for love is the fulfilling of the law, (Rom. xiii, 10,) so that the commanding power of the law is such a just measure, that every one that loves acts his part towards the fulfilling of it.

5th. It farther appears to be the ten commandments, by the use Christ makes of what he had before asserted: "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven." Matt. v, 19. That is, forasmuch as that law must stand till heaven and earth pass away, and I came not to destroy it, therefore beware of breaking it, for whosoever you are that break any part of it, and shall teach men so, you shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; "but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." To prevent farther mistake, he repeateth the law in many particulars, and gives the sense, showing how far their righteousness should exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees. By all of which it plainly appears, that this law, which Christ came not to destroy, is the law of the ten commandments, or the laws that were comprehended in them.

6. The Apostle confirmeth and establisheth this law after the death of Christ, as plainly appears in the third chapter of Romans, the drift of which is to set Jews and Gentiles in a like condition by nature—all breakers of the law of God, and so become guilty before him, (verse 19,) and that therefore no flesh could be justified by the deeds of the law, the law being for another purpose—to convince of sin, (verse 20,) or to bring sin to their knowledge. He proves that Jews and Gentiles, circumcised and uncircumcised, are justified by and through faith, and not by the law of works. Verses 27-30. But lest the Gentiles should think, because they could not be justified by the works of the law, that therefore they might look upon the law as a thing done away or made void, he puts this question to the uncircumcised Gentiles, "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid; yea, we establish the law." He settles this question, whether the law be in force to believing Gentiles or no, with a God forbid; which shows the greatness of his zeal against such a persuasion, it being the same answer which he gives to another gross question, whether we should continue in sin that grace might abound; and, as if that were not enough, he adds to it, Yea, we establish the law.

7. This same Apostle doth prove that the law was in force at the time of his conversion. He saith he had not known sin but by the law; he had not known lust except the law had said, "Thou shalt not covet." Rom. vii, 7. He was alive without the law once, but when the commandment came, sin revived, and he died, (verse 9,) that is, not without the letter of it, for that he had, and did in a great measure conform to, but without powerful convictions for sin by the law; and in this sense then the commandment came, sin revived, and he died that before was alive in his own apprehension. "For without the law sin was dead," (verse 8,) and by the law is the knowledge of sin; and sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived him, and slew him. "Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, just and good," (verses 11, 12,) not that the holy and just law was made death unto him—God forbid—but sin, that it might appear sin, by this good law wrought death in him, that by the commandment sin might appear exceeding sinful. Verse 13. And if so, then this law did not die with the body of Christ; though we are dead to the law by the body of Christ, that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter, and that we should be married to another, even him who is raised from the dead; we being dead to that spirit of bondage in which we were held, that we set our obedience to the law no longer in the room of Christ as our head and husband; Christ by his blood having purchased us from that power that the law had over us by reason of sin. So that our service is not to satisfy the law, as a woman serves to please her husband that she is bound to; but we are not dead to serving in newness of spirit in obedience to Christ as our husband. Rom. vii, 4---6. In this sense the Apostle delights in the law of God after the inward man, (verse 22,) though the other law in his members stood in great opposition to it. Verse 23. Mind this chapter well, and it will appear so plain that he that runs may read, that the Apostle intends no such thing as to take us from our obedience to the law, nor yet the abrogating of the law, but the contrary.

8. The same Apostle urges the law, in the very letter of it, to the Ephesians. He saith, in chapter vi, 1-3, "Children obey your parents, for this is right; honor thy father and thy mother, which is the first commandment with promise." He proves his exhortation to be right from the commandment, and he takes notice of the order of the commandments; it is the first commandment of that second table, and it hath a promise annexed to it. He speaks in the present tense; he does not say it was the first commandment, but it is the first with a promise, "that thy days may be long on the earth." He urges the promise to them for their encouragement; and to prevent mistakes, he shows the extent of it, that it was not only to the Jews, that they should live long in the land of Canaan, but to the Gentiles also; therefore the interpretation says, "that thy days may be long on the earth."

9. James gives a full confirmation to what I am treating of. He convinces them of sin by this law, in having the faith of Jesus Christ with respect of persons, as appears by chapter ii, 10, 11, "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." He shows what law he means, and how it is that he who offends in one point is guilty of all; because, "He that saith, Do not commit adultery, saith also, Do not kill; now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law." And John saith, "Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth the law, for sin is the transgression of the law," (1 John iii, 3, 4,) and in the next verse he explains what law he means, and saith, it was such transgression that Christ was manifested to take away.—Now if this law of God was done away by the death of Christ, sin could not be a transgression of it so long after; neither could any be convinced of sin by it, because it was not. But the Apostle saith, "Whosoever committeth sin transgress-eth the law;" which shows it was in force then, and not only so, but that likewise it should so remain.

10. Let it be considered whether this opinion that the law is done away doth not clash with redemption itself. The Apostle states that all men were under the law, and by breaking of it they came under the curse. Gal. iii, 10. And Christ was made under the curse, to redeem his people from under the curse of the law, that the blessing of Abraham might come upon the Gentiles through faith. Verses 13, 14. Now if we were not under the commanding power, we could not be under the curse, (for that follows disobedience,) and if so, then Christ was not made a curse for us; neither can the blessing of Abraham come upon the Gentiles upon that account, if the Jews only were under the law, and under the curse of it. Christ's dying to redeem them from the curse, could not bring the blessing of Abraham upon the Gentiles. And again the Apostle saith, "that Christ was made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. Gal. iv, 4, 5. Now if we were not under the law, we could not be redeemed by Christ's being under the law, nor receive the adoption of sons thereby; but it is manifest that every one is under the commanding power of the law, and by nature under the curse; and Christ hath only redeemed his people from the curse, but they are not redeemed from their obedience to the law of God. I find no Scripture that saith so; but the contrary.

11. God complaineth of the blindness of his servants, and of the deafness of his messengers that he sent, (Isa. xlii, 19, 20,) and their blindness and deafness appears in this, that they did not hear nor understand God's design in the gift of his Son, that it was not to destroy the law or to slight it, but to magnify it and make it honorable. Verse 2. Previously it was in tables of stone, but now in the fleshy tables of the heart; service was then done from a spirit of bondage, but now from a spirit of adoption. And in this sense I conceive the law to be magnified and made honorable, and upon this account God is well pleased for his righteousness' sake, that is, I conceive, for his Son's sake.

THE REVIEW AND HERALD.

"Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

PARIS, FEBRUARY, 1851.

OUR VISIT TO VERMONT.—It will doubtless interest the brethren to hear of the state of the cause in those places we visited in our late tour; so we will give a brief sketch.

On our way we met with the brethren in New Ipswich, Bennington, and Washington, (N. H.) In the last two named places they have but recently embraced the message of the third angel, yet they are decided and strong. Our dear Bro. Wheeler, of Washington, told us, with much feeling, that he felt deeply impressed with a sense of duty to go out and give the message. We hope the way will soon open before our brother, so that he may go out and sound the third message with success, as he did the two former cries.

At Waterbury, (Vt.) a goodly number of disciples came together.—Bro. Joseph Baker, of Lebanon, (N. H.) was with us. His decided and faithful testimony for the truth added much to the interest of the meeting. We learn that he is out among the brethren giving the message. May the Lord bless his labors, and give him access to the hearts of those brethren with whom he labored, and held sweet counsel in sounding the "everlasting gospel" and the fall of "Babylon." A large portion of the Adventists, among the mountains of Vt. and N. H., have heard, with joy, the former messages, especially the "Seventh Month Cry," from the mouth of Bro. Baker. And we expect that many, in the wide "harvest" before him, will, through his labors, receive this last message of mercy to the "little flock." Our meeting at W. was one of labor and some trial, yet God gave us the victory, and the truth triumphed. Some, who had never heard our position so fully explained, confessed the truth with joy. A spirit of fanaticism, which has struggled hard in Vermont, was happily checked, and, we think a good step was taken to promote gospel order in the church. Bro. A—A—, who has traveled much from place to place, and to whom Tim. iii, 6, may apply, was, in a kind manner, advised by the unanimous voice of all present to seek a steady home, and no longer be a trial to his

We visited a number of other towns in Vermont where the truth is taking deep root in the hearts of honest souls who have been prejudiced against our views till recently. One John Libby, of Johnson, Vt., is doing what he can to prejudice those few, with whom he has influence, against the truth by reporting falsehoods about the brethren and their faith. As Paul said of the copper-smith, (II Tim. iv, 14,) "the Lord reward him according to his works."

We learned that it had been reported in Bristol, (Vt.) that we profess to be the "angel ascending from the East, having the seal of the living God," &c.—Rev. vii, 2. But those who have read our writings, and have known our faith, know better. We have believed and taught that the ascending angel of Rev. vii, 2, was a symbol of the last sealing message of mercy to the remnant; the same as the angel with the "everlasting gospel" [Rev. xiv, 6, 7] was a symbol of the Advent message as preached by Bro. Miller and others. And we have given no more reason for men to report that we believe that any one man is the ascending angel, than has been given through Advent papers, or otherwise, that Mr. Miller, or Mr. Himes, professed to be the angel with the "everlasting gospel."

When men resort to flying reports against individuals in order to put down the views of a class of Christians, they betray a want of Scripture argument against the views in question. Such are more to be pitied than censured.

We also visited the brethren at Fairhaven and Dartmouth, (Mass.) and had freedom in presenting the evidences of our position. God has revived his bleeding cause in these places wonderfully since last June. In Dartmouth a few have very lately embraced the truth, and others are examining. It is with the tenderest feelings of Christian affection that we think of our brethren in these two places who have passed through severe trials; but out of them all the Lord has and will deliver them. Praise his name.

THE DESIGN OF THE CHART.

1. To supply those who travel and teach the present truth. This was the main object in publishing the Chart. Those whom the Lord has chosen and called to give the message of the third angel, are to be supplied gratuitously.

2. That each band of brethren might have one at their places of meeting. And if the brethren in any place are not able to pay for it, they also are to be supplied gratuitously. We never expected to supply all the brethren with a Chart, if we had, some thousands should have been prepared instead of 300. But this would be a useless expense, and waste of the Lord's money. Those, therefore, who do not travel, and who are situated where they can meet with those who have a Chart, must not expect to have one without paying for it. Price—well prepared on rollers—$2; without being sized, painted &c., just as it comes from the Lithographer, $1.25. Those sent by mail have to be pre-paid.

Those who send money should be particular to state whether they wish the amount in Charts, or, whether it is a donation. If more is received than enough to pay the cost of the Chart, it will be used in publishing the paper. All orders for it must be addressed (Post paid) to Otis Nichols, Dorchester, Mass. The name, town, county and State to which it is to be sent, should be written out plainly.

W.

We copy the following from the "Advent Herald" for Jan. 18, 1851:

"Bro. S. R. Dennett writes from Canaan (Vt.) Jan. 8th, 1851:—Dear Bro. Himes:—I want you to say through the "Herald," that I have been very much annoyed with newspapers and pamphlets containing, as I believe, spurious doctrines, such as the old Jewish Sabbath, door of mercy closed, dreams, visions, &c. I have received as many of the above as I wish for. I want no more of such chaff."

Bro. Lothrop, of Canada East, gave us, last June, the names of a number, all strangers to us, and among them was Samuel Dennett.—We sent him the "Advent Review," containing the spirited testimonies of leading Advent men, (which certainly should not "annoy" any one bearing the Advent name,) and all we have since published up to No. 2 of the Review and Herald; therefore we infer that he refers to our publications. Here we wish to remark:—1. The terms "Jewish Sabbath" and "Christian Sabbath" are not the language of the Bible. The language of both Testaments is "THE SABBATH." Jehovah styles

it "THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD," and "MY HOLY DAY;" but Mr. Dennett, in order to stigmatize the day that God has highly honored, calls it the "Old Jewish Sabbath."

2. Mr. Dennett speaks of the "door of mercy;" but the Bible speaks of no such "door." True, Bro. Miller, and others, have used this unscriptural term, (which gives a very wrong idea of our views,) to express their work done for the world; but if we believed that God had forgotten to be merciful to his erring children, we should cease to present truth to them.

3. It really seems a pity that Mr. Dennett should be "annoyed," as he says, so long with the truth, when if he had returned one paper, we should have sent him no more. And here we wish to say that if any, to whom we send the paper, are in a like condition, you can be relieved at once by returning this No. with your name and address written on it. Such a course would look much more Christian and consistent, for those who reject the letter of the law of God, and profess to fulfill it in LOVE, than to breathe out such bitterness through the "Advent Herald."

I have, from the presentation of truth, embraced the seventh day Sabbath, and the shut door, as being my last refuge in this dark and gloomy day. I am well aware that this news may be astonishing to you, as you were well acquainted with my former views, and scriptural objections to this faith. But do not throw by the letter and refuse to read, and call your father a fanatic. Read a few of the many reasons that have led me to this change of views, with prayerful attention. And I will commence by asking you some questions, as you are well acquainted with all the Advent movement. And although previous to this movement your experience was quite limited, yet it may be well for those of us, who are pretending to hold on to the speedy coming of the Lord, to ask ourselves what is the ground of our faith.

Do you believe that the Angel that was to fly through the midst of heaven having the everlasting gospel to preach, spoken of in Rev. xiv, 6-7, is fulfilled? Read the verses, weigh well their contents. It was to "them that dwell on the earth, to every nation, tongue and people, saying with a loud voice, fear God." Was it done? "Give glory to him," was it done? "and worship him that made heaven and earth, and the sea and fountains of waters." Is what we have seen and heard a fulfillment of this prophecy? I am struck, while reading it, with its exact fulfillment. Settle this question before God. If settled in the affirmative, which I think it must be, then I ask is not "the hour of his judgment come?" This may be a new thought to you; but God's world must settle these questions. I ask again, whether the Angel which was to follow in verse 8, saying, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen," together with Rev. xviii, 4, saying, "come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues," has been fulfilled. Were God's people in the Catholic Church?—Was the simultaneous cry of almost all who gave the first cry, and the rushing of the living members in the churches, and the fear lest they should be found in them, (the only place where, but a few months before, they thought there was safety,) the work of man? What was the cause of this universal panic among the churches? All the living members were leaving them. Was this the power in man's voice? Where is that powerful voice now? Or was this the voice of that Angel that was to follow the first, the power of God in this message to the children of men? Settle these questions in your own mind as in view of the judgment. I ask not what others have thought; I am well aware of the giving up on this point. Can we ever expect, or can any generation to follow us, expect to see the like again? See if there is not as exact a fulfillment, as there was in any of the prophecies of the first advent of our Saviour.

Again I ask, what was it that gave such tremendous power to the words, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh," which broke upon us, as it were, in the stillness of night, while one servant was saying, "My Lord delayeth his coming," and the other, "The Lord is coming!" What was it that hurried those messengers through the land to spread the message as though a world's destiny depended on their flight? What was it created such an awful fear on the churches, and that made such a complete consecration of time, property and self, among the Advent bands? Was there ever such a time in the world's history? Did it not savor of the work of God? Can there ever be another "Midnight Cry," given, if Christ should not come for a thousand years, that would produce such wonderful effects? Will God suffer his people who have been praying, searching the Word, and sacrificing, to find the truth, to be deceived by these movements, and utterly fall? Or has the devil been permitted to make so exact a counterfeit, as to deceive the very elect?

It does not destroy the fulfillment of prophecy, if we should get a hundred unscriptural views of what constituted the Bridegroom's coming. I think it is more safe to acknowledge that we may have been mistaken in what constituted the coming of the Bridegroom, and the shut door, than to throw the whole prophecy away. God will not fulfill his prophecies but once, if we look for their fulfillment again as long as the Jews have for the first coming of Christ. And now what has given force and edge to these messages? It has been the preaching of time. Had time been out of the "messages," they would never have come to any point. And now has the preaching of time been of God, or of men? God has certainly given us time in his word. The 2300 days, as preached by Bro. Miller and others, ended in '44, tenth day of seventh month. This gave point to the Midnight Cry. Here all the numbers given us in the Bible ended harmoniously. From that time what confusion has there been about the ending of the 2300 days!

No one has successfully attempted to make the different numbers harmonize at any other point of time. But they have labored for six years to show that these days would end somewhere else, and in this labor have almost, if not quite, destroyed the faith of all their hearers in the speedy coming of the Lord. The only question to be decided as to the ending of the 2300 days is to find their commencement. And B. C. 457 was the starting point. Whether there will be any further attempts to make those days cover '51, '52, or '55, I know not. But for one I have lost all confidence in these brethren having any light on prophecy since '44. I must turn my eye to some other quarter for light. If the 2300 days have ended, (and the "Advent Herald" of March last says, that to fix the starting point of the 2300 days anywhere else than B. C. 457, you would have to altar the dates of more than twenty eclipses, which would throw every date into confusion. This quotation is from memory.) where did they end? and what was done at their ending?—They say in effect, that nothing has been done; the earth has not been cleansed; therefore the Sanctuary has not been cleansed.

But God says, Dan. viii, 14, "Unto 2300 days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." I feel bound to believe this plain word of God, rather than follow the delusive idea that this earth was the Sanctuary to be cleansed. Turn to Ex. xxv, and read a few of the first verses, then turn to the first of chap. xxxvi, and you will be at no loss to know what God has called his Sanctuary. You will recollect that this was to be made in exact imitation of something that God showed Moses on Mount Sinai. Here is light, but I do not expect what I have written on the subject of the Sanctuary will give you much light. Defer deciding until you hear more.

I think I have foreseen the awful vortex to which we must be driven, who have adopted any other time for the ending of the 2300 days than '43, or tenth day of seventh month, 1844, unless the Lord should come soon. The genius of men will not be able to move them much further, and then where are we? God's prophetic time has failed, and all the past movement which was got up by the preaching of time, and all our confidence that we were led by the Spirit of God in that movement is lost. I ask again, where are we? If God did not lead this people when did he ever lead a people? I confess for one, that if I were not led by the Spirit of God in trying to spread these messages, I have never known what the Spirit of God was. In more than twenty years experience, I have had no doubts of the leadings of God's Spirit, and never less than while penning these lines. With this view of the subject, I ask where is the evidence that the Lord will come in my day, or in yours?—You may answer that the signs and the images spoken of in Daniel show that He is near. So they do in connection with the time, but how definite is the image? Almost 1100 years have we been in the "toes," and can you tell how much longer we may remain there? The darkening of the sun and moon in 1780, and the falling of the stars in 1833, how long will it be to the shaking of the powers of heaven, and how long from this point to the coming of the Lord? Who can tell? You see ———, that by following these opinions, (for I think they have no light on prophecy answering to this day,) and their necessary results, I am brought near the vortex. Hence I embrace the "Midnight Cry," the "Shut Door," and "the Third Angel's Message" as being my last refuge, as I stated at first.

The embracing these truths has opened a light upon the book of Revelation, and on the Types, (so freely used in proclaiming the Midnight Cry,) as I have never seen before. I now feel that I am on the track of prophecy, and that the coming of the Lord is near. This to me is no small source of comfort, to have evidence on which I can rest, that this state of trial is soon to end. My time and your patience might be exhausted, were I to undertake to bring to your view the whole subject connected with the Shut Door. Suffice it to say, it does not in my opinion, exclude all conversion. But it does exclude those who have wilfully rejected all these Messages. I believe that the names recorded in the Lamb's Book of Life, were brought in at the tenth day of seventh month. That He then bore in their names before the Father, as the antitype of the "Breastplate of Judgment." Ex. xxviii, 15; and xxxix, 8. Read the passages in their connection, and if you will read from Ex. xxiv, to chap. xl, you will see with what exactness God has had his Sanctuary made, and all that pertains to it. Were these things recorded with such precision for the Jews only? Since I began this, I have got the small tract on the Sanctuary, and Shut Door, which I will send you. Read it with attention, it will give you much light on the cleansing of the Sanctuary.

I fear it would be wrong in me to withhold from you my views of most of our Advent brethren. They compose the Laodicean Church.—Start not, but hear my reasons. This church is neither cold nor hot, but lukewarm. Is not this applicable? This church says that they are "rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing." Do not our brethren say they have a great amount of truth, that they are far in advance of the churches? Do they not say they have truth enough?—Have need of nothing? Do not know they are "poor and miserable," etc. They are all "counseled to buy gold," etc. "That the shame of their nakedness do not appear." "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten." I hope there are many of this class. Read Rev. iii, 11-22. They must be "zealous and repent." This church came out of the Philadelphia or Brotherly-Love church, and this, out of the Sardis church, as was preached in '44. When has the world beheld, since the days of the apostles, a band of brethren that loved more fervently, coming together from the different churches. But where was the Laodicean church organized? At the Albany Conference. "Let patience have its perfect work." This point shall be made as plain as any fulfilled prophecy, if reason and facts may determine. A great proportion of the brethren went to this Conference believing in the "Shut Door." You may doubt this statement because the leaders and managers were of a different opinion, and there succeeded in convincing their brethren that the door was open, and they must now "double their diligence" to convert the world. They say they are the true Israel of God. Now read Rev. iii, 9. I ask where has been the brotherly love in this body since? Where is the light on prophecy that used to shine with such clearness from these brethren? There is need of zeal and repentance, or the Lord will execute his threatening in verse 16.

When I began this I had no expectation of using so much paper in asking and answering questions, and giving my views. However, the opinions expressed have not been formed hastily; but from long reflection. Therefore examine them patiently and prayerfully in all their parts, before you reject my conclusion; as I fear in rejecting you will reject the truth of God. I believe the Third Angel's message will be sounded louder and louder, until it is heard by every humble and penitent soul, who has not rejected God's former messages. And when the Angel has accomplished his work, (the last work to prepare God's people,) the vials of God's wrath will be poured out upon the world. And I cannot put the pouring out of these vials far in the future.

I cannot reject the idea that there will be a clear distinction between saint and sinner previous to the Lord's coming, and of course there must be something to draw out the real character. That there is need of something now to test the real friends of God, as in former days, I doubt not. And that something should be preached so crossing that the proud heart will not receive, and the humble and contrite will not reject, I doubt not.

This letter is too far advanced to gratify your wish to know how I dispose of all the New Testament objections we used to urge against my present views: and had I more space I might fail of doing it to your satisfaction. I will freely acknowledge that there are some passages that have had a strong influence upon my mind, to hold me to my former views (and when once the position is taken that there is no distinction between the Law given by Moses, for the observance of the children of Israel, through their generations, and the Law written by the finger of God, and deposited in the Ark of the Covenant, and was kept in the Sanctuary or Tabernacle which was the strength of the children of Israel, a type of what John saw in heaven, Rev. xi, 19,) and have held me for a long time. You may well suppose, with so much labor and trial, together with some conviction of the truth of my opponents, that the subject of the Sabbath has not been slightly examined, or hastily embraced. I am not aware of being influenced by any soul; but by the truth presented. I have never embraced a doctrine more crossing; but he that follows Christ will find crosses.

"The Sabbath was made for man." I have never been able to reconcile the idea that there was no Sabbath, with what I believe to be the wants of man, and the goodness and providence of God. If he was good and merciful in commanding the children of Israel to rest the seventh day, instead of requiring them to work, is there any good reason why he should not require it after Christ came? Is the Sabbath any less needed as a day of rest under this, than under the former dispensation? If there is no express command, it is evident that Christ and his Apostles observed it through their day. And Christ directed his disciples to pray that their flight be not on the Sabbath day. Matt. xxiv, 20. And it is evident from history that the seventh day Sabbath was observed for centuries after the Apostles day. If Christ thought the keeping of a Sabbath was of so much importance that he directed them to pray that they might have no occasion for breaking it forty years after his death, surely he had some expectation that it would be observed. How far these examples and requirements will supply the want of an express command in the New Testament, after so many in the Old, judge ye. Our Savior said whosoever shall break one of the least of these commandments and shall teach men so, shall be of no esteem in the reign of heaven. If thou wilt enter into life keep the commandments. "And they returned and prepared spices and ointments; and rested the Sabbath-day, according to the commandment." Luke xxiii, 56. You say you know well the influence these test questions have upon the trembling, sincere and honest disciple, when enforced with zeal and power; for you have felt it many times. So you have come to the conclusion there have been false tests presented to you. A rational conclusion, I think. But am I to understand because there are false tests, that there are no true ones? Such a conclusion, if true, would uproot the religion of Jesus Christ from the land. The whole economy of God as revealed in the Bible, to nations and individuals, is designed to test their fidelity to him. Why was Satan, the arch deceiver, permitted to have an existence in the world, and tempt and try the children of God, if not to test their love to Him. This opens a large field, which I have not time to explore. I will ask what advances have you made in your christian course, without having every step tested? Is it probable that at the closing scenes of this world, and the final conflict with the powers of darkness, God will have no test by which to prove his children? Will the danger to which we are exposed consist in submitting to false tests for Christ's sake, or rejecting true ones? Do any doubt, who believe in the Advent movement, that the first Angel's message tested the churches, and those churches or individuals who understandingly rejected have fallen? So with the second, and so it will be with the third. You see, —, it has taken a good deal of paper, to get out a few thoughts. I have endeavored to be as short as possible, and answer my mind. You know I am unaccustomed to putting them on paper. You will I trust, pass over the errors in the writing and composition; but mark well the subject matter. I am aware that some of it may seem simple, perhaps foolish, but "God has chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise." I know it will not accord well with the instruction you have listened to, for some time past, and the influence that may still surround you. The change made in my mind since embracing these sentiments, has been happyfying indeed. A strength has been imparted which I have not felt for years. I have endeavored to keep two Sabbaths holy unto the Lord.

¶ We do not hesitate to say that the article, "The perpetuity of the law of God," in this No. and No. 5, written by Bro. J. N. Andrews, is unanswerable. Though written under unfavorable circumstances, mostly while Bro. Andrews was traveling from place to place, yet it contains irrefutable proofs that the whole law of God, as engraven in tables of stone, is perpetual.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

We are getting out two important works which will be ready in a few days.

THE BIBLE SABBATH.—This work is a careful selection from the publications of the "American Sabbath Tract Society," including their "History of the Sabbath."—64 pages.

The above works can be obtained, at the present, only at this place.

Bro. Hiram Edson writes from Port Gibson, (N. Y.) Feb. 13. "Since I parted with Bro. Holt, I have been South, into Yates and Steuben Counties, where I found a number of precious 'jewels;' three or four who will be capable of giving the third angel's message. Bro. J. H. Lockwood and wife, of Wheeler, love the present truth. Bro. L. Lockwood, their eldest son, an interesting young man, who was strong in the truth in 1844, has ever believed the Advent movement was of God, and that the prophetic periods must have ended as proclaimed in '44. The general course of Advent believers since that time in calling the moves in '43 and '44 'a mistake,' and their making new calculations on the periods looked inconsistent to him. He finally lost his interest, backslid, gave up his hope, and went into the world; but never denied, nor gave up the truth. He always felt like standing in defence of it when he heard it ridiculed. But when he heard our present position defended and the Advent movement justified, and shown to be a clear fulfillment of prophecy, he believed and received the present truth.

He expressed a desire to accompany me home, and did so. He is gaining strength fast. Last evening, in the beginning of the Holy Sabbath, we had a glorious time of special refreshing from the presence of the Lord. It was a time of victory, complete, perfect and entire. Free and full "Hallelujahs" ascended to God and he was glorified in praise, love and adoration. Bro. L. was greatly blessed."

Bro. Geo. W. Holt writes from Oswego, (N. Y.) Feb. 3: "I have just returned home after an absence of three weeks, in company with Bro. Edson. We found a number of precious souls who were ready to receive the present truth. The interest on this subject is increasing.—Bro. Butler's letter in the 'Harbinger,' and the inquiries of C. W. S. and the weak note of 'C.' has done much to open the eyes of the honest seekers after truth. Our opponents are doing more for us than against us. Praise the Lord.

I hope the paper will continue; I think it is doing much good.—While the strife is going on in the 'Harbinger' and 'Herald,' the Lord is opening the way for the message. I never felt more like doing the whole will of God than now. Never did I realize the goodness of God, and his tender love for his people as at the present. The fellowship of the saints is sweet. O, I want to be pure in heart that I may see God, and join the heavenly company that have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

Bro. Bates writes from Guildhall, Vt., Jan. 22: "Bro. Lindsey and self accompanied Bro. Lothrop and family [from Melbourne] to Eaton. The Lord blessed his word to the good of souls there. Edwin Lothrop, wife, two daughters and sister have embraced the present truth, and are rejoicing with the other five that keep the Sabbath there. Opposition raged high; but God gave his children the victory.

At Ascot we held one meeting. I think three decided to keep the Sabbath. At Compton we held two meetings at Bro. John Cramer's. He said he would keep the commandments."

We have received a small tract of 8 pages, entitled—"A letter to the disciples of the Lord, by Roswell F. Cottrell," of Mill Grove, N. Y.—We think it very good, and hope to be able to publish it entire, soon.—He also writes Feb. 9:

"I am old, and have but little of this world's good; but I have a strong desire to see the truth spread abroad in this world. We are not Seventh-day Baptists; but I have taught my children to keep the Sabbath, and those about me here still adhere to my instruction, and the teaching of the Bible on that point."

MODERN PHENOMENA OF THE HEAVENS.

CHRIST, the prophets and apostles, have distinctly and repeatedly foretold of remarkable phenomena or "Wonders in the heavens," and of "Fearful sights and great signs," particularly describing them, which on being witnessed, were to admonish the world of the near coming of the "great and terrible day of the Lord," which he has appointed, "in the which he will judge the world in righteousness." While even the church and her watchmen, quite generally, have long been slumbering over the prophecies and signs of the Lord's coming again, with the pleasing dream of a temporal millenium first, they have been thus fulfilling another prophecy of the Advent at hand, which foretells that "darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people;" (and that both the wise and the foolish would be finally aroused from their midnight sleeping, only by the cry, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him.") And while asleep under such darkness, it is not at all surprising that they should consider, as many do still, that those prophecies of Christ's return, and the signs of it, are all mystical, and as referring only to political and other temporal events, mostly already fulfilled and as having nothing to do with things so solemn as Christ's coming to judgment.

In now attempting briefly to show that the Second Advent of Christ, personal and glorious, is now specially nigh at hand, from the modern fulfilling of the prophetic wonders, sights and signs in the heavens which were to precede the great day, I would class them under the following heads:

I.—"Great Signs," "in the Heavens," "Blood, and Fire, and Pillars of Smoke."

II.—"Signs in the Sun and in the Moon"—both darkened, &c.

III.—"Signs in the Stars,"—Stars falling, &c.

IV.—The Great Comet of 1843, and

V.—Miscellaneous other late Phenomena.

I.—"GREAT SIGNS" "IN THE HEAVENS," "BLOOD, AND FIRE, AND PILLARS OF SMOKE." Or the Aurora Borealis and Northern Lights are to be considered.

Some of the scriptures foretelling these phenomena are as follows:

And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, that I will pour out of my spirit And I will shew wonders in heaven above, and in the earth beneath, blood, and fire, and vapor of smoke before that great and notable day of the Lord come.—Acts ii, 17—20.

And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come.—Joel ii, 30, 31.

Fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory, and when these things begin to come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh.—Luke xxi, 11, 25—28.

While many, in their putting "far away the evil day," and saying the "Lord delayeth his coming," presumptuously maintain that these passages are mystical, and fulfilled without showing the judgment at hand, they must themselves be responsible for thus denying or altering the words of Jehovah; but I claim for myself and my brethren of the "blessed hope," the right to understand them all literally, and to mean precisely all that is most naturally implied or understood by them. And in now showing that the Aurora Borealis has perfectly and literally fulfilled these predictions, with special regard to the "Wonders," "fearful sights, and great signs" in the heavens, of "blood," "fire," and "pillars of smoke," I will here give a description of the phenomenon, as it was witnessed in London, Sept. 3, 1839, seen also in this country, so far as respects the Aurora only, though much less remarkable.—See New York Com. Advertiser, Sept. 4, and Ch. Advocate and Journal, Sept. 13, 1839.

"From late London Papers."

"London, Sept. 5.—Between the hours of ten, on Tuesday night, and three yesterday morning, in the heavens, was observed one of the most magnificent specimens of those extraordinary phenomena, the falling stars and northern lights, witnessed for many years past. The first indication of this singular phenomenon, was about ten minutes before 10, when a light crimson, apparently vapor, rose from the northern portion of the hemisphere, and gradually extended to the centre of the heavens, and by 10 o'clock, or a quarter past, the whole, from east to west, was one vast sheet of light. It had a most alarming appearance, and was exactly like that occasioned by a terrific fire. The light varied considerably; at one time, it seemed to fall, and directly after rose, with intense brightness. There were to be seen mingled with it, volumes of smoke, which rolled over and over and every beholder seemed convinced that it was a tremendous conflagration. The consternation in the metropolis was very great; thousands of persons were running in the direction of the supposed awful catastrophe. The engines belonging to the fire brigade stations in Baker street, Farringdon street, Watling street, Waterloo Road, and likewise those belonging to the West of England station in fact, every fire-engine in London, were horsed, and galloped after the supposed scene of destruction with more than ordinary energy, followed by carriage-horsemen, and vast mobs. Some of the engines proceeded as far as Highgate and Halloway, before the error was discovered. These appearances lasted for upwards of two hours, and toward morning, the spectacle became one of more grandeur.

"At two o'clock in the morning the phenomenon presented a most gorgeous scene, and one very difficult to describe. The whole of London was illuminated as light as noon-day, and the atmosphere was remarkably clear. The southern hemisphere, at the time mentioned, although unclouded, was very dark; but the stars, which were innumerable, shone beautifully.—The opposite side of the heavens presented a singular, but magnificent contrast; it was clear to extreme, and the light was very vivid; there was a continual succession of meteors, which varied in splendor. They appeared formed in the centre of the heavens, and spread till they seemed to burst; the effect was electrical; myriads of small stars shot out over the horizon, and darted with that swiftness toward the earth that the eye scarcely could follow the track. They seemed to burst also, and to throw a dark crimson vapor over the entire hemisphere. The colors were most magnificent. At half past two o'clock, the spectacle changed to darkness, which, on dispersing, displayed a luminous rainbow in the zenith of the heavens, and round the ridge of darkness that overhung the southern portion of the country. Soon after, columns of silvery light radiated from it; they increased wonderfully, intermingled among crimson vapor, which formed at the same time, and when at full height, the spectacle was beyond all imagination.—Stars were darting about until 4 o'clock, when all died away. During the time that they lasted, a great many persons assembled on the bridges across the river Thames, where they had a commanding view of the heavens, and watched the progress of the phenomenon attentively."—New York Commercial Advertiser, Oct. 22, 1839.

Without any apparent intention on the part of the writer, who was probably not aware of the prophecies on the subject, he has described the phenomena as most fully answering to their prophetic description. He does it, however, in language more full and impressive than the usual brevity of the inspired writings will allow. The scriptures speak of these wonders in the heavens, as an exhibition of "Blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke;" while this writer, on beholding them, with thousands of others, speaks of them as something "extraordinary—singular—most magnificent—vast—alarming—intense brightness—terrific fire—dark, crimson vapor—most gorgeous—tremendous conflagration—volumes of smoke which rolled over and over—beyond all imagination—producing very great consternation—galloping of every fire engine in London," &c.

Another instance of this phenomenon was very extensively witnessed in this country early in the evening of Jan. 25, 1837, when, as described by many, the very heavens, for a short time, seemed to be on fire, and when the snow upon the ground much resembled blood and fire; which was so alarming in appearance, as to cause the solemn inquiry, with some, who were out at the time, if the day of judgment had come—and also to cause the animals to tremble with fear. In one place, near a mountain, the people informed me, that on the snow there was the appearance of "waves of fire rolling down the mountain."

A clergyman of Mass., gave me the following account of the same phenomenon, as he and others witnessed it, in one of the towns of Cape Cod, in that State. He was sitting with another minister in the pulpit, who had just commenced a discourse on the subject of the final judgment, to a crowded audience of a protracted meeting; when suddenly, through the windows, the whole house was filled with the most vivid and fiery light, so alarming in its appearance, that several of the audience shrieked aloud—all was disorder and commotion—many rushed for the doors, and all prospect of further worship for the time, seemed to be lost, till one from without, perceiving the consternation within, forced his way through the astonished crowd up to the desk, with an account of the aurora-phenomenon just witnessed by those out of doors. Then this clergyman, as he said, called attention, and informed the audience that they had "more cause for admiration than alarm, and that the appearance which they had just witnessed was but a beautiful and unusually splendid exhibition of the aurora borealis, which the Lord had been giving them." Then the audience resumed their seats, and the meeting went on.

Though his opinion on the subject, and his quietus for the alarmed audience were doubtless honest with himself, and approbated by all who look not for their Lord soon to come, I must consider it extremely injudicious, contrary to the word of God, and very dangerous to the unconverted who are quieted with it, because in the very connection of these foretold "Wonders in the heavens," the Lord rather says, "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain: let all the inhabitants of the land tremble, for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand." Joel ii, 1.

Somewhat similar accounts of this phenomenon might be greatly multiplied, as having been more or less frequently seen since about seventy years ago, as recollected by the aged, when, as some of them have represented, it appeared as armies fighting in the skies, and more fiery and terrific than anything of the kind they had ever before seen, or heard of from others.

Objections answered.

Obj. I.—It is objected by some, that the aurora borealis has been but a common event in all ages of the world, and of course wholly unsuitable as a latter day signal sign of the judgment at hand.

To this objection, I reply, that it is certainly a human assertion and not capable of proof from history, either sacred or profane. And as authentic proof of what I now say, all my readers will bear witness that the Bible contains no history of the early occurrence of this wonderful phenomena, although the prophets foretell it as belonging only to the last days. Again, there is much proof aside from the Bible, which alone is sufficient, that the Aurora is but of recent origin. Such as the following.

A lady, by the name of Willard, resided in Saybrook, Ct., from infancy to old age, informed me at her dwelling, not long since, that her grandmother had often stated in her hearing, that the first of this phenomenon in that place, was in the year 1730, and as understood, the inhabitants of the town had no knowledge of their previous occurrence. The precise date of this fearful sight, the old lady recollected from the memorable fact, that a Mr. Abiel Lord was to have been married on the evening of this alarming appearance in the heavens, and that the wedding was broken up by the fright of the guests and parties on the occasion, the ceremony being performed the next day, when the sight was past, and their apprehensions of the judgment day just upon them, had abated.

It is recorded however, in some of the writings of the venerable Noah Webster, LL.D., of New Haven Ct., recently deceased, that the first appearance of the Northern lights in America, was some ten or twelve years earlier than as attested above; and be it so, they both agree, in the very modern exhibition of this phenomenon in America, so far as is known.

Again, I have of late found an ancient American book, filled with this very subject, which also settles the question that this phenomenon is modern, rather than ancient, so far as witnessed in our country especially. It is a small volume of five sermons on the text—“Fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven.” Luke xxi, 11. Its spelling, type and all, show it as among the earliest printed books of America, and dated on two title pages, as published at Boston, 1680. These sermons were delivered by the far known Increase Mather, D. D., then a Congregational minister, and father of the celebrated Dr. Cotton Mather, both of Boston, Mass., and believers in Christ's Second Advent at hand. In these sermons throughout, the writer adheres closely to his text, and attempts to show, even without the Northern lights, that the foretold “Fearful Sights,” &c., had then already been witnessed in the heavens, as a premonition of the judgment at hand, when the Lord would “come down with a long besom of destruction to sweep away a world of sinners before it.” And as appears in his work, he had searched over the histories of all ages, and so far as then to be found, he could find nothing answering to the Northern lights, which lights, as we have seen, did not appear in America until some thirty or forty years after that date. And yet, he had found in history, accounts of several blazing stars, which he supposed had sufficiently the appearance at times, of “blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke” in the heavens, to render them the fulfilling of such prophetic signs of the great day at hand. One of those fiery comets was blazing in the heavens at the time of, and occasioned his last discourse, which discourse, he called, “HEAVEN'S ALARM TO THE WORLD.” But,

It is further objected, and said, that there is abundant proof from history, that the Aurora Borealis is really ancient, and a distinguished Professor has publicly answered, when inquiry was made of him, that Mairan, a French writer, gives a detailed account of them, from the earliest ages.”

I answer, that this work and others written even since the Aurora first appeared in America, is not satisfactory testimony, because it really proves the antiquity of this phenomenon, no more than any present printed declarations could do it, unless some more anciently written work authorizing it, can be presented.—And here it may be stated, that it is nearly four years since I have called publicly on the opponents of my position, to bring forward the real ancient book, of some two hundred years old, recording the previous occurrence of this phenomenon, or tell us where we may find it; and yet the thing is not done; which greatly strengthens my former presumption that they know indeed, of no such books.

The most anciently published history of this phenomenon which I have yet seen, is contained in a large one volume 8vo. “DICTIONARY OF ARTS AND SCIENCES,” published in London, just about eighty years ago. This, like others published since, gives a full account of the first occurrence of this phenomenon at London, in March, 1716, and states expressly, that the oldest inhabitant there, at that time, had never seen, nor heard of the like before. The writer, after giving some six or eight pages on the subject, concludes his account by giving a list of writings he had found, concerning it, the oldest of which was a magazine in London for the above year of 1716, and the next were files of the same paper for ten years following; with other works written afterward. We sometimes receive as an answer to our argument, seemingly for want of a better, that there being no really anciently published history of these phenomena, is no proof after all, against their antiquity; because, as it is said, they could have appeared in all ages, without being recorded in history, till in modern times. But we see, that in 1716, and ever since, the moment any such wonder is seen in the heavens, it becomes the subject of interesting remark and history, certainly among the learned and curious, which wonder, from the same propensity of such men, would naturally have been equally noticed, and published, before 1716, in London, had it been previously witnessed there.

THE OBJECTION against our position, drawn from the alleged great antiquity of the Aurora Borealis, will now be further met, by an appeal to some of our very modern and most popular writers on the subject, on whom our objectors mainly rely, though we consider them incompetent to testify, if they would, to the great antiquity of the phenomenon. Having examined several of these writers in Encyclopædias and other books, and finding them substantially agreed on the point at issue, I would quote now, fairly, and briefly, as follows:

“The most unaccountable of all the circumstances respecting the Aurora Borealis is, that it is not much more than a century since this phenomenon has been observed with any degree of frequency in our latitudes. We find, indeed, a few atmospheric phenomena recorded by the ancients, which may be regarded as examples of this meteor. But with trifling exceptions, the whole of antiquity is absolutely silent on this subject.

“Dr. Halley informs us that he had begun to despair of witnessing this beautiful phenomenon, when the remarkable Aurora of 1716, made its appearance. This philosopher has given us a historical detail of the several observations of this meteor, in which he says the first of it on record in an English work, is a book entitled, ‘A Description of Meteors, by W. F. D. D.’ reprinted at London in 1654, which speaks of burning spears being seen Jan. 30th, 1560. The next appearance of a like kind is recorded by Stow, and occurred in Oct. 7, 1564. In 1574, according to Stow and Camden, an Aurora was seen for two successive nights, viz: the 14th, and 15th of November. The same phenomenon was twice seen in Brabant, in 1575 on the 13th of Feb. and the 28th of Sept., and the circumstances accompanying it were described by Cornelius Gemma, who compares them to spears, fortified cities; and armies fighting in the air. In 1580 and 1581, this phenomenon was repeatedly observed at Backrange, in the county of Wirtemberg, in Germany. But from this till 1621, we have no such phenomenon on record, when it was seen all over France on Sept. 2, and is particularly described by Gassendi, in his Physics, under the title of Aurora Borealis.

“In Nov., 1623, another was seen all over Germany, and is particularly described by Kepler. Since that time, for more than eighty years, we have no account of any such phenomenon being observed. In 1707 Mr. Neve observed one of short continuance in Ireland, and in the same year, a similar appearance was seen by Romer at Copenhagen, while during an interval of eighteen months, in the years 1707 and 1708, this sort of light had been seen no less than five times.

“The Aurora of 1716, which Dr. Halley particularly describes, was remarkably brilliant. It was also visible over a prodigious tract of country, being seen from the West of Ireland to the confines of Russia and the East of Poland, extending nearly thirty degrees of longitude, and from the fiftieth degree of north latitude, over almost all the north of Europe; and in all places exhibiting, at the same time, appearances similar to those observed in London.

“It appears then to be certainly established that the Aurora was of rare occurrence in our latitudes till about a century ago; for it cannot be supposed that so beautiful and striking a phenomenon would have passed unnoticed and unrecorded during the two preceding centuries, while men of science, and particularly astronomers, were so busily employed in examining every remarkable appearance of the heavens or that the philosophers of Greece and Rome, would have remained silent concerning so beautiful a meteor, had it been in any degree familiarly known to them. It is in vain to account for their silence by saying that they inhabited latitudes which are scarcely ever visited by these appearances, for the Romans not only visited but long resided in the north of Germany and in Britain, where the Aurora is now frequently seen in great splendor.

“The Aurora is by no means confined to the northern hemisphere. In the high southern latitudes it was long ago observed that there is a similar phenomenon; (see Phil. Trans. No. 461, and Vol. 54, No. 53;) and if the existence of the Aurora Australis was in some measure doubtful, it has been fully ascertained by the second voyage around the world, of Capt. Cooke. On Feb. 17, 1773, says Mr. Foster, who accompanied Capt. Cooke in the capacity of Naturalist, in 50 degrees of south latitude, a beautiful phenomenon was observed during the preceding night, which appeared again this, and several following nights.—It consisted of long columns of clear, white light shooting up from the horizon to the eastward, almost to the zenith, and gradually spreading over the whole southern part of the sky.” Edinburg Encyclopædia.

Admitting the correctness of the above historic statements concerning these wonderful and “fearful sights,” it is at once apparent that they are but of modern origin, and as at present exhibited, not to be traced back further than to 1716.

And admitting that Dr. Halley found an “English work,” “Entitled, ‘a description of Meteors, by F. W., D. D.’ reprinted at London, 1654, which speaks of burning spears,” &c., “Jan. 30, 1560,” the reader will see that it says nothing of our present “Wonders” of “blood,” “fire,” and “smoke,” now very falsely called the “Northern Lights.” And let it be noticed, also, that Dr. Halley is not here said to have found any other printed book touching any phenomena except that of the “spears” and meteors. And again, it should be noticed, that the “wonders” now under consideration, are not “Northern Lights,” any more than Southern; for they are now seen in all points of the compass, and by Capt. Cooke and crew in 50 degrees south latitude. So that if Northern Lights, or white streaks of light, had been seen around the North Pole, a hundred years sooner, as I have no occasion to dispute, it is another thing altogether, and there is, after all, even no alleged proof in these extracts against considering these “wonders in the heavens,” as having their origin within less than a century and a half, past.

LETTERS.

From Bro. Hübner.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—The Review and Herald is just such a paper as we need in these last days of perilous times. When I read the letters from the brethren and sisters, I cannot refrain from weeping, and giving glory to God for the free Spirit of love that flows in my heart, to all the saints scattered abroad, in the patient waiting time, keeping the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus. I praise the Lord that so many are turning their feet from the Sabbath, and repairing the breach that has been made in God's holy law, that they may stand in the battle of the day of the Lord.

There are a few of us in this place that are endeavoring to keep God's Holy Sabbath, and walk in obedience to all of the commandments. We very much desire to have some of the servants of the Lord come this way and hold a conference with us. At the reception of every paper, we look with an anxious heart to see if there is not an appointment for this place.—We need help. Since Bro. Bates was here, some have been teaching that there is no Sabbath, to overthrow the faith of some. “The prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means; and my people love to have it so; and what will ye do in the end thereof?” Jer. v, 31.

I believe the Sabbath is binding on us in the gospel dispensation. I rejoice that the third angel's message has ever sounded in my ears. When Bro. Bates

SIGNS.

In the sun, and moon, and stars,
Signs and wonders there shall be;
Earth shall wake with inward wars,
Nations with perplexity.

Soon shall ocean's hoary deep,
Tossed with stronger tempests, rise;
Dark storms the mountain sweep,
Redder lightnings rend the skies.

Evil thoughts shall shake the proud,
Racking doubt and restless fear;
And amid the thunder cloud
Shall the Judge of men appear.

But though from that awful face,
Heaven shall fade and earth shall fly,
Fear not ye, his chosen race,
Your redemption draweth nigh!

MODERN PHENOMENA OF THE HEAVENS.

II.—PROPHETIC SIGNS IN THE SUN AND MOON. Scriptures Foretelling these Signs.

"FEARFUL sights and great signs shall there be from heaven . . . And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon . . . And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory.—Luke xxi, 11, 25, 27.

And it shall come to pass in the last days, (saith God,) . . . I will show wonders in heaven above
The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come.—Acts ii. 17, 19, 20; Joel ii.
10, 30, 31; iii. 15.

And the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood, . . . And the heavens departed as a scroll . . . For the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?—
Rev. vi. 12, 14, 17.

The sun shall be darkened and the moon shall not give her light . . . And then . . . they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. Matt. xxiv. 29, 30, 31.

THE ABOVE SIGNS FULFILLED, AND IN MODERN HISTORY.

1 Of the Sun darkened, &c.—Dark day of May 19, 1780.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived: 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man, for his lamp was trimmed, and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude. His nephew, who was then a little child, in after life retained a lively recollection of that scene, and his childish feelings are an interesting exhibition of the manner in which Mr. Lee was regarded, for he felt not the least alarm in his presence, thinking that he was perfectly safe where his good uncle was, even if the day of judgment had come."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society.—

Life of Edw. Lee, of Mass.

"The 19th of May, 1780, was a remarkable dark day. Candles were lighted in many houses. The birds were silent and disappeared. The fowls retired to rest. It was the general opinion that the day of judgment was at hand. The Legislature of Connecticut was in session, at Hartford, but being unable to transact business adjourned. A motion for adjournment was before the council; but when the opinion of Col. Davenport, [of Stamford,] was requested, he replied,—'I am against the adjournment. The day of judgment is either at hand or it is not. If it is not, there is no cause for the adjournment; if it is, I wish to be found in the line of my duty. I wish, therefore, that candles may be brought.'"—President Dwight, in Ct., Historical Collections.

"Dark day of May 19, 1780.—The sun rose clear, and shone for several hours; at length, the sky became overcast with clouds, and by ten o'clock, A. M. the darkness was such as to occasion the farmers to leave their work in the field, and retire to their dwellings; fowls went to their roosts, and before noon, lights became necessary to the transaction of business within doors. The darkness continued through the day; and the night till near morning was as unusually dark as the day.—Gage's History of Rowley, Mass.

"Anniversary of the Dark day.—The Dark Day,
May 19, 1780, is thus described by Mr. Stone, in his History of Beverly:

"The sun rose clear, but soon assumed a brassy hue. About ten o'clock, A. M. it became unusually dark. The darkness continued to increase till about one o'clock, when it began to decrease.—During this time candles became necessary. The birds disappeared and were silent, the fowls went to their roosts, the cocks crow as at daybreak, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. The alarm produced by this unusual aspect of the heavens, was great, and tradition has preserved many anecdotes of terror.—
An old gentleman of rather singular turn, supposing the judgment day at hand, dressed himself with unusual care, and taking his silver-headed cane, walked out into the field to await the event. As the darkness came on, Mr. Willard, who possessed some rare instruments, took a station on the common to make observations, and was soon surrounded by a large number of his parishioners, who gazed on his operations with awe and wonder. Mr. W. paid no attention to the conjectures and expressions of alarm uttered in his hearing, and calmly pursued his investigations.—
In the midst of these, a person of excitable temperament, came running from the sea-shore, exclaiming in accents of terror, 'the tide has done flowing!' 'So it has!' replied Mr. Willard, who, with admirable presence of mind, took out his watch, so it has, for it is just high water.'"—Portsmouth Journal, May 20, 1843.

"In the Dark Day, May 19, 1780, the heavens were covered with a dense cloud for three or four hours . . . During this time, the clouds were tinged with a yellowish or faint red, for hours, for which no satisfactory cause has been assigned. I stood and viewed the phenomenon, but had not any fear that the world was coming to an end."—N. Webster, L.
L. D.—New Haven Daily Herald.

A host of living eye-witnesses are now testifying, substantially as above, though in different places there was some difference in the darkness. As to the natural cause of this unnatural darkening of the sun, it is well known, that philosophers have never been able to assign any, in which even themselves can agree. Dr.
Webster of New Haven, has given as rational a supposed cause as any I have seen, in the following extract:

"The most probable cause of that darkness, I suppose to have been the smoke of some Volcano in the Northern regions of this continent, wafted in a vast volume by the wind. I think no fire in our forests could have been sufficient to spread a dense cloud over the whole of New England, and even some part of the Middle States.

New Haven, Feb. 18, 1843.—N. Webster.—Ibid.

Surely, it is unphilosophical to suppose the smoke of such a Volcano, in the midst of dispersing and flying winds should be wafted such a distance in so dense a form, as to produce such darkness for 3 or 4 hours,
"over the whole of New England," &c., and then suddenly leave all clear again. It is not so in a smoky atmosphere, the darkness in such cases, appears and disappears more gradually; and usually continues longer. Again, had such a cloud of volcanic smoke produced the dark day, it would seem still more unnatural, that after several hours of its entire passing over, it should thus cover the heavens again, in the total darkening of the largest part of the following night. And more strange it would be still, that a cloud of smoke should travel so swift as to pass over 1000 miles extent at once, when natural clouds are supposed to travel seldom more than 10 miles an hour, or 240 miles a day. And indeed, why would it not be as honorable to the word of God, and useful to man, for philosophers to presume on the probable natural cause of the darkening of the sun precisely so, and about as long, and for the rending of the rocks and veil of the temple, &c., when Christ was crucified, as in case of the dark day? See Matt. xxvii, 45, 51—53.

The dark spots on the sun, seen a few years ago, by thousands, are not yet forgotten, while no satisfactory natural cause for them can be assigned, and so it must remain, except we admit the truth of the prophecies now fulfilled, of "signs in the sun," &c., to precede Christ's coming to judgment.

2. MOON DARKENED.—"SIGNS IN THE MOON" FULFILLED.

The night after the dark day of 1780.

"The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes, was equally invisible with the blackest velvet." Mr. Tenny of Exeter, N. H., quoted by Mr. Gage, "to the Historical Society."

"The night succeeding that day, (May 19, 1780,) was of such pitchy darkness, that, in some instances, horses could not be compelled to leave the stable when wanted for service. About midnight, the clouds were dispersed, and the moon and stars appeared with unimpaired brilliancy." Portsmouth Journal, May 20, 1843. Extract from Stone's History of Beverly.

As in the case of the dark day, there are still thousands of living witnesses to the above darkening of the moon, and of the night following the dark day

though it being 63 years ago, many of them were then but small children, and naturally witnessed less of it than of the dark day. Some have described it as "Egyptian darkness that might be felt." And what is remarkable, is, that according to general testimony, and the almanac for 1780, the moon was but one day past the full, and there was no eclipse of the sun or moon during the whole day and night of that darkness, as in case of the sun's total eclipse in America, June 16, 1806, which caused much darkness for a few minutes only. Neither were there natural clouds, smoke, or anything else, thus to darken those luminaries in 1780, as is evident from the views then taken of the darkness, not merely by the weakest, but also, by some of the strongest minds in Connecticut and elsewhere, as already shown.

III.—"Signs in the Stars."—Stars falling, &c.

And there shall be signs in the stars . . . and then shall they see the Son of man coming, &c.—Luke xxi, 25.

The stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heaven shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven and they shall see the Son of man coming, &c.—Matt. xxiv, 29, 30. Mark xiii, 25, 26.

And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely [or green] figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll For the great day of his wrath is come," &c.—Rev. vi, 13—17.

Fulfilled, once at least, in the falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833.—Observations of the phenomenon by Mr. Henry Dana Ward, of this city, then residing in Park Place, published in, and now copied from the New York Journal of Commerce of Nov. 15, 1833.

FOR THE JOURNAL OF COMMERCE.

"THE FALLING STARS.—In your paper this morning, some notice is taken of the phenomenon of yesterday. It comes so far short of the view taken of it by myself, and a number of friends who gazed upon it with me, that I send you the story of that eventful scene as we witnessed it.

"One of the family arose at five o'clock, A. M., to prepare for leaving the city in the seven o'clock boat. He threw up the window to see whether the dawn had come; and beheld the East was lighted up, and the heavens were apparently falling. He rubbed his eyes, first in doubt, but seeing on every side the starry firmament, as if it were broken up, and falling like the flakes of snow and whitening the skies, he aroused the whole family. At the cry, 'Look out of the window,' I sprang from a deep sleep, and with wonder saw the East lighted up with the dawn and meteors. The zenith, the North, and the West, also, showed the falling stars, in the very image of one thing, and of only one, I ever heard of. I called to my wife to behold; and while robing, she exclaimed, 'see how the stars fall!' I replied, 'that is the wonder,' and we felt in our hearts, that it was a sign of the last days. For truly, 'the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. vi, 13. This language of the prophet has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday it was literally fulfilled. The ancients understood by aster in Greek, and stella in Latin, the smaller lights of heaven.—The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore, the idea of the prophet, as it is expressed in the original Greek, was literally fulfilled in the phenomenon of yesterday, so as no man before yesterday had conceived to be possible that it should be fulfilled. The immense size and distance of the planets and fixed stars forbid the idea of their falling unto the earth. Larger bodies cannot fall in myriads unto a smaller body; but most of the planets and all the fixed stars are many times larger than our earth. They cannot fall unto the earth; but these fell toward the earth.

"And how did they fall? Neither myself, nor one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy before quoted. 'It rained fire,' says one;—another, 'It was like a shower of fire!' Another, 'it was like the large flakes of falling snow, before a coming storm, on large drops of rain before a shower.' I admit the fitness of these for common accuracy; but they come far short of the accuracy of the figure used by the prophet. 'The stars of heaven fell unto the earth; they were not sheets, or flakes, or drops of fire; but they were what the world understands by 'falling stars,' and one speaking to his fellow, in the midst of the scene, would say, 'See how the stars fall!' And he who heard would not pause, to correct the astronomy of the speaker, any more than he would reply, 'the sun does not move, to one who should tell him 'the sun is rising.' The stars fell 'even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet. The falling stars did not come as if from several trees shaken, but from one: those which appeared in the East fell toward the East; those which appeared in the North fell toward the North; those which appeared in the West fell toward the West; and those which appeared in the South (for I went out of my residence into the Park) fell toward the South. And they fell not as the ripe fruit falls. Far from it; but they flew, they were cast like the unripe fruit, which at first refuses to leave the branch; and when, under a violent pressure, it does break its hold, it flies swiftly, straight off, descending; and in the multitude falling, some cross the track of others, as they are thrown with more or less force, but each one falls on its own side of the tree. Such was the appearance of the above phenomenon to the inmates of my house. I walked into the Park with women of Pearl St. feeling and confessing that this scene had never been figured to our minds by any book or mortal, save only the prophet. What should be next, we were at a loss to conceive, consistent with the usual course of events. We asked the Watchman how long it had been, he said, 'About four o'clock it was thickest.'

"We gazed until the rising sun put out the lesser falling stars, with the lesser fixed stars, and until the morning star stood alone in the East, to introduce the bright orb of day. And here take the remark of one of my friends in mercantile life, who is as well informed in polite learning as most intelligent merchants of our city, who have not made science their study. Sitting down to breakfast, we spoke of the scene, and he said, 'I kept my eyes fixed on the morning star. I thought while that stood firm we were safe; but I feared every moment that would go, and all would go with it.' Be assured, Messrs. Editors, this was the language of nature, in full flow of feelings, just after an hour's watch of the magnificent scene, and was met with an open response of approbation from other intelligent eye-witnesses. The reader will see that this remark proceeded from an almost irresistible impression of intelligent eye-witnesses, that the firmament had given way—that the whole host of stars had broken up—yet, hope clung to the morning star, which never shone more glorious.

"In this narrative, I have spoken not of causes, but of appearances, and the appearances according to the impressions they made on men. I know not how to convey a more accurate notion of them, and yet some will say, 'It is fanciful.' Such may know my opinion, that no fancy is adequate to realize with any description the solemn interest of the scene; and that it required no fancy to heighten the picture, but a sound, well-informed, and enlightened reason, to check the fancy, and to restrain it from running headlong into the idea of the thing which this scene is made in prophecy to prognosticate.

MR. WARD, on present inquiry, has furnished the following additional remarks on the phenomenon.

"This scene astounded men from two o'clock A. M., until half past six, A. M., and yet no alarm was made, no public notice was given. It is often asked, 'Why did they not arouse the city?' I reply, the overwhelming interest of the scene was such, that the man who went out of doors to wake his neighbors, forgot his purpose, in mute astonishment at the sight; and one who would extend his hand toward a bell knob, might be drawn from the reach of his design by the shower of stars that on every side alike caught his attention, and threatened his head, and seemed to fall all around him.

"Many witnesses did affirm, in the midst of the scene and after, that they saw the stars fall to the ground; but, questioned closely, the fall was behind the house, or over the fences, and proved so far an optical illusion.

"The dawn was a full hour that morning earlier than usual, and the whole eastern sky was transparent like molten glass, so as I never witnessed before or since. An open arch of brilliant light arose from the east, above which arch stood the morning star, inexpressibly glorious for its brilliancy and firmness on the face of the dark, transparent, and bursting firmament.

"It is now nine years since the foregoing communication was furnished for the Journal of Commerce.—Not a word of the description seems to be overdrawn many things might be added to fill it up; but it is better for it to remain the honest and candid impression of the mind the day after the scene, than to be diluted with subsequent reflections. The description is right, whatever instruction it may convey to the reader's mind; but the writer's mind is disposed to receive it as in the beginning. The impressions were irresistible, and are abiding.

From the Baltimore Patriot.

"MR. MUNROE:—Being up this morning (Nov. 13, 1833) I witnessed one of the most grand and alarming spectacles which ever beamed upon the eye of man. The light in my room was so great, that I could see to tell the hour of the morning by my watch which hung over my mantle; and supposing that there was a fire near at hand, probably on my own premises, I sprang to the window, and beheld the stars, or some other bodies presenting a fiery appearance, were descending in torrents as rapid and as numerous as ever I saw flakes of snow, or drops of rain in the midst of a storm. Occasionally a large body of apparent fire would be hurled through the atmosphere, which, without noise, exploded; when millions of fiery particles would be cast through the surrounding air. To the eye it presented the appearance of what might be called a raining of fire, for I can compare it to nothing else. * * * Yours, B."

From the "Christian Advocate and Journal," Dec. 13th, 1833.

"The meteoric phenomenon which occurred on the morning of the 13th of November last, was of so extraordinary and interesting character, as to be entitled to more than a mere passing notice. . . . The lively and graphic descriptions which have appeared in various public journals, do not exceed the reality. No language, indeed, can come up to the splendor of that magnificent display; and I hesitate not to say, that no one who did not witness it, can form an adequate conception of its glory. It seemed as if the whole starry heavens had congregated at one point, near the zenith, and were simultaneously shooting forth, with the velocity of lightning, to every part of the horizon; and yet they were not exhausted—thousands swiftly followed in the tracks of thousands, as if created for the occasion, and illuminated the firmament with lines of irradiating light. Some coursed in their course, and thus connected themselves with others by lateral paths of brightness; while many sped their way in straight and even lines, and left luminous streaks behind them, which continued some seconds after the meteors were lost in the distance, or extinguished in the density of our atmosphere. They differed both in magnitude and velocity, some appearing as mere points, and others of the size of Venus and Jupiter." . . . (Signed) F. REED.

"The Connecticut Observer, of Nov. 25, 1833, copied from the Old Countrymen, reads as follows:—We pronounce the raining of fire, which we saw on Wednesday morning last, an awful type, a sure forerunner, a merciful sign of that great and dreadful day, which the inhabitants of the earth will witness when the sixth seal shall be opened. The time is just at hand, described, not only in the New Testament, but in the Old. A more correct picture of a fig tree casting its leaves when blown by a mighty wind, it is not possible to behold."—Signs of the Times, Nov. 9, 1842.

"Same Connecticut Observer, in an article signed B., respecting Thomas Burnett's 'Theory of the Earth,' published in 1697. He [Burnett] says, 'The last sign before the coming of Christ is the falling stars.' He adds 'No doubt there will be all sorts of fiery meteors at that time, and amongst others, those called falling stars, though they are not considerable singly, yet if they were multiplied in great numbers, falling, as the prophet says, as leaves from the vines, or figs from the fig tree, they would make an astonishing sight.'"—Ibid.

Extracts from the "People's Magazine," Boston, Jan., 1834, on the falling Stars of Nov. 13, 1833.

"The Rockingham, Va., Register," calls it, 'A rain of fire,'—thousands of stars being seen at once; some said, it began with a considerable noise.

"The Journal of Commerce" informs, that "three hundred miles this side of Liverpool, the phenomenon was as splendid there as here;"—and that in 'St. Lawrence Co.' there was a snow storm, during the phenomenon, in which the 'falling stars' appeared like lightning. . . . That in 'Germantown, Pa.' they seemed like showers of great hail.

The "Lancaster, Pa., Examiner," says, 'The air was filled with innumerable meteors or stars . . . hundreds of thousands of brilliant bodies might be seen falling at every moment . . . sloping their descent towards the earth, at an angle of about 45 degrees, resembling flashes of fire.'

"The 'Salem Register' speaks of their being seen in 'Moca, in the Red Sea.'

"The 'Baltimore Gazette' accounts for them, as 'Solid bodies passing through the regions of the atmosphere, with prodigious velocity, producing light by the electricity they excite.'

Some attribute them to 'stones ejected by the volcanoes of the moon, then coming to our earth.' Others to the earth's own volcanoes casting out 'stones to a sufficient height to give them centrifugal force enough to make them revolve round the earth, until from accidental causes, they fall within its atmosphere.'—Others consider them 'so many modifications of electrical agency; a field which fills all space.' Others that they are 'gaseous, and when inflamed by some cause not explained, appear darting through the heavens, generally in various directions.'

Some of the above extracts, from the People's Magazine, written at the time, are important, as they show the strange character of the phenomenon, and its wide extent over the world: but with regard to these clashing theories of their origin, they are doubtless one as good as another—while they all seemingly show their authors as driven to unusual straits, in their hazarding opinions so at variance with sound sense, and the first principles of philosophy.

From Prof. Obnstead, of Yale College.

The following important brief extracts from the observations of this gentleman and distinguished meteorologist, already selected from his many writings on the falling stars, I now copy from the Signs of the Times. He says,—

"The extent of the shower of 1833, was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the East, to the Pacific on the West; and from the northern coast of South America, to undefined regions among the British possessions on the North, the exhibition was visible, and everywhere presented nearly the same appearance.

"In nearly all places, the meteors began to attract notice by their unusual frequency as early as eleven o'clock, and increased in numbers and splendor until about four o'clock, from which time they gradually declined, but were visible until lost in the light of day. The meteors did not fly at random over all parts of the sky, but appeared to emanate from a point in the constellation Leo, near a star called Gamma Leonis, in the bend of the sickle."

This is important testimony, as to the vast extent of the exhibition of the phenomenon, and also of the falling stars all emanating from a single point in the heavens, as represented by the preceding engraving.

"Those who were so fortunate as to witness the exhibition of shooting stars on the morning of Nov. 13, 1834, probably saw the greatest display of celestial fire-works that has ever been seen since the creation of the world, or at least within the annals covered by the pages of history."

"I feel assured that this is no atmospheric or terrestrial phenomenon, but that these fiery meteors come to us from the regions of space, and reveal to us the existence of worlds of a nebulous or cometary nature, existing in the solar system, and forming constituent parts of that system. Nor are these conclusions built on mere hypothesis, but are necessary inferences from certain facts.

"This is no longer to be regarded as a terrestrial, but as a celestial phenomenon; and shooting stars are now to be no more viewed as casual productions of the upper regions of the atmosphere, but as visitants from other worlds, or from the planetary voids."

"Subsequent inquiries have led me to the belief, that the body was so distant as hardly to exhibit any apparent parallax, but was projected on very nearly the same part of the sky, as seen by all observers.—This fact at once shows that the source of the meteors was far beyond the atmosphere, and confirms the preceding conclusion that it was wholly independent of the earth."

According to these just observations, the question being settled that those falling stars so called, were wholly independent of the earth, and had their origin beyond its regions, no where nearer than other worlds, or the "planetary voids," seems at once to put it out of the reach of science to assign a satisfactory, natural cause, for the phenomenon, inasmuch as the exhibition was beyond the reach of the understood laws of matter. Had the sight been positively confined to the atmosphere, a natural cause might seem indeed possible; but if now we attempt to assign such a cause for these "visitants from other worlds," we must needs first become acquainted with the science of matter in those worlds, in order to give the true cause.

GENERAL OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

OBJ. I.—Some have objected to our position, in general, by saying that the foregoing prophecies of "wonders," &c., were figurative, and to be fulfilled in the downfall or darkening of the glory of certain human monarchs, &c., as great political lights; and others that they have had their fulfillment in the darkening of the light of the gospel, or the church, in certain periods of the triumph of infidelity.

But certainly, this is wholly unauthorized by scripture, and based on the gross principle that the foretold scenes of the judgment are not to be literally understood, but rather as prefiguring mere secular or temporal events. And were we to follow this principle out, it would force us at once on to the sweeping rule of interpretation, as already published by many in high stations, that the Old Testament in particular is silent on the subject of the judgment and future state, which principle I must repudiate as a heresy of the worst character.

OBJ. II.—It is objected, that Peter in saying—"This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel," has settled the question that these so called "wonders in the heavens," were all fulfilled in the pouring out of God's Spirit on pentecost day, because as the objector, says, he mentions these "wonders" also, as being what Joel foretold, and were then fulfilled.—Acts, ii, 16-20.

I answer, by saying, that Peter, in affirming that the pouring out of God's Spirit, as then wonderfully witnessed, was what was foretold "by the prophet Joel," did not say that the whole connection of Joel's prophecy which he then quoted, was fulfilled on that occasion. And what reflecting mind would suppose, that Peter in proving simply, that the apostles were not "filled with new wine," as then accused, would attempt to do it, by telling the astonished multitude, that the power of the Spirit which they were then witnessing, was foretold by Joel in the figurative language of "wonders" seen "in the heavens"—"Blood and fire, and pillars of smoke," darkening of the sun, &c. And why should it be necessary at all to foretell that effusion of the Spirit in figurative language, when it was first already most clearly foretold in literal language? And if to be foretold in figurative language, why should figures be chosen, so calculated, as these would be, to deceive the people?

OBJ. III.—It is often objected, that according to the history of JOSEPHUS, these foretold "wonders in the heavens" had a literal fulfillment in such things being actually seen at Jerusalem, shortly before its destruction by the Roman army about forty years after the crucifixion of Christ.

In answering this, I would only say, that admitting the full authenticity of this popular history, it certainly fails of proving the assertion here made in the objection, inasmuch as it does not speak of such sights seen at that time, as those foretold in prophecy, and are since recently fulfilled in history. The "wonders in heaven" spoken of by Josephus, as seen previous to Jerusalem's destruction, were, that "There was a star resembling a sword which stood over the city, and a comet that continued a whole year . . . Chariots and troops of soldiers were seen running about in the clouds, and surrounding cities.

At the ninth hour of the night, a light shone round the altar and the holy house, so that it appeared to be bright day time, which lasted for half an hour."—Josephus' Jewish Wars, Book VI. Chap. V.

These are all the "wonders" seen "in the heavens" before the siege of Jerusalem, which are mentioned in Josephus' history of these things; and they are certainly not the same as quoted from the prophets under the first three general heads of this treatise. These prophecies then, were not fulfilled 1800 years ago, but are recently come to pass.

OBJ. IV.—It has of late, been published in several of our religious periodicals, that many of these phenomena of the heavens have already been seen quite too long—that they have not been seen sufficiently all at once—that they have not been sufficiently seen by all the inhabitants of the earth; and that they have not been sufficiently calculated to impress strong minds with the conviction of their being wonderful, to give them a fitness to be considered as signs of the judgment at hand.

To this I must say, that it is all of it but mere human assertion, and unauthorized by scripture, while positive facts, sound philosophy, and the scriptures, are understood to condemn it. With regard to the necessity of their coming to pass all at once, Christ has rather assured us that they must come to pass gradually or not all at once; in saying, "When these things begin to come to pass," &c. Luke xxi, 28.—and surely their having begun to come to pass in sights of "blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke," more than a hundred years ago, is no more proof that the destruction of the wicked by fire, is not now at hand, than such an argument would be, that the living wicked were not soon to be destroyed by water, when Noah's "120 years" were just out, simply because God had given him so much time, in which to prepare for the coming flood. With regard to their not having impressed strong minds, &c., we see by the foregoing testimony that many among the strongest minds have been impressed and even made to tremble on first witnessing these foretold wonders. And in proof that it so continues, I mention the deep opposing public interest now felt on this subject.

"Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, KNOW that it is near, even at the doors." Matt. xxiv, 32, 33.

I endeavored to keep the Lord's Sabbath for some years, but was moved from that position by J. Turner's arguments, in his discussion with J. B. Cook in the Bible Advocate a few years since, to believe that Sunday was the seventh day. I am now satisfied that it was error, and for several months past have observed the Lord's Sabbath, "rejoicing in hope of the glory of God, so soon to be revealed."

I wish the Review and Herald continued, as I value it more highly than all other papers, and will endeavor to help sustain it.

Yours in hope of the gospel,

ABIJAH THAYER.

Shelbourne Falls, Mass., Sept. 21st, 1852.

From Bro. Sheffield.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—I feel it a duty to say a few words at this time in regard to the position I now occupy towards you and the world.

And, first, let me say, that as we have one Master, even Christ, and all we are brethren, let us show to the world our relationship to each other by brotherly kindness and love to all that are willing to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth; for by this we are to know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. I have been much strengthened by the communications through the Review and Herald. And although I have not participated in any of the former movements of the Advent cause, yet I feel bound to acknowledge my firm belief that it is the work of an Almighty hand. Everything has been done in regular order and in the right time. I know that many scoff, and say that we are fanatics, &c. But why are we called deluded? For this reason, we are willing to place implicit confidence in the testimony of our Lord. But who are they that scoff the hardest and rage the most? My short experience shows that they are generally those that profess to be followers of, and looking for (a great distance in the future) the coming of the same Lord. But our Saviour said, while on earth, that the servant that should say, my Lord delayeth his coming, the Lord of that servant shall come in a day he is not aware of, and appoint him his portion with hypocrites.

If ever there has been a people on the earth that has placed entire confidence in the word of God, and that alone, it has been the believers in the time, as stated by the Prophet. And I can see clearly that it is that confidence in God's word that has led them step by step up to their present position. And I feel to thank God, and say, I know in whom I have believed; and they that put their trust in the Lord shall never be confounded.

Dear brethren, I do not expect to meet you all, until brought into his presence, but praise the Lord, I do hope to meet you then, and the time is not far distant, we all must know, who take Jesus at his word. If we do not believe all that he has said, how can we have all his testimony? The mass of professing Christians at the present day, in order to get rid of the Advent doctrine, try to connect the signs that Christ said should precede his coming, with the destruction of Jerusalem, because he said, "this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." If the signs there spoken of refer to the destruction of Jerusalem only, then it is certain that the Judgment is past, and we are all past the time of redemption; for Jesus said, [Luke xxi, 28,] "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." If, as he says, this generation is not to pass till all is fulfilled, and the generation has reference to those that were then living on the earth, then all things must have been fulfilled nearly 1800 years since. And if so, why are we trusting in Christ for salvation, so long after all things are fulfilled, and the day of redemption past?

The day of the Lord is not past, we all know, therefore it is yet to come, and it must be near at hand.—The time as given by the angel to Daniel is past.—The signs, as given by the Lord himself, are in the past, excepting the sign of the Son of man. Then surely we ought to lift up our heads and rejoice, knowing that our redemption draweth nigh.

May we all who love his appearing, be up and doing, that we may have living faith that works by love and purifies the heart. May we thus be found obedient to his word, looking for our Lord.

E. S. SHEFFIELD.

Fort Atkinson, Wis., Oct. 14th, 1852.

From Bro. Myers.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—I feel thankful that you yet send me the Review. My sympathies are with you. I feel glad for the stand you have taken for the word of God, and the commandments. It also rejoices me to hear from those brethren that I have once loved so well, and those that I have known to be self-sacrificing, and self-denying.

I should be glad to say a word of encouragement to those of like precious faith, for I feel that they have their trials from what I have seen here of the hatred manifested against the Lord's Sabbath, and its kindred truths. There are none here that have fully embraced the Sabbath, excepting myself. One or two are, however, almost persuaded, so much so that they have not of late labored on the seventh day. We have had no lectures here on this subject, only as I have talked with some of the Advent believers, and sometimes in meeting, and it makes me feel, and see from actions, that those who are saved will have to strive to enter in at the strait gate.

I have often wished some of the brethren could have made it so as to come this way and held meetings. O, I should have been very glad to have seen Bro. Case when he was in Wisconsin, or Bro. Bates. Though I am not personally acquainted with Bro. Bates, yet I should have been very glad to have seen one of like faith. It may be that some one with the truth may yet pass this way.

DARIUS MYERS.

Plum River, Ladavies Co., Ill., Oct. 10th, 1852.

From Bro. Phelps.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—The cause here is prospering. I left home at Alden on the 20th, of Sept. Have visited Beloit, Janesville, Spring Valley, Union, Albion, Christiana, Kaskonong, Madison and then to this place. Found some in all these places, except one or two, strong in the truth, and where they are not in the truth they are enquiring for light. I intend to stop here over the Sabbath, and then leave to visit other places on my way home. In some places the evil servants are trying to undo what the faithful servants had done, and they have scattered the seeds of destruction which are found in the no-Sabbath theory. O, when will these deluded men cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord. Acts xiii, 10. Nominal Adventists and nominal professors are all well agreed in this work of death. I feel like keeping on the altar of God, and letting him direct my steps.

Yours waiting for the kingdom, W. PHELPS.

Extract of Letters.

BRO. P. GIBSON writes from London, C. W., Sept. 10th, 1852:—"I do feel thankful for the last message of mercy that has come to us. The Review and Herald came in time to save the little flock from the shepherds that scatter them. I was led to receive the message of the first angel in the fall of 1845. I then commenced to take the Voice of Truth, which gave the cry to God's people to come out of Babylon. I hesitated to come out of a society I loved so well, and had been a member of twenty-six years. They called me a Millerite and cast me out of the Methodist Church. I believed that my Saviour would come in this generation, and rejoiced to suffer a little reproach for his sake.

The paper I was taking ceased to be the voice of truth. The Harbinger was sent me, but it was not the Harbinger of Christ's coming, but of the "Age to Come." The Review and Herald with other pamphlets were sent me free.

I now rejoice in the message of the third angel as in the first. I love the Holy Sabbath, but do not have the privilege of meeting with my brethren on that day. If it would be for the glory of God, we should be glad to have some of the brethren come over and help us."

BRO. T. J. GIDDINGS writes from Nile, N. Y. Oct. 9, 1852:—"We are thankful for the Review and Herald. It is to me as food to the hungry soul. Those of my brethren whose names I gave for the paper, are well satisfied with it. It gives good satisfaction where it is read. The Lord prospers his own cause.

The subject of the coming of the Lord, I hail with more delight than all others. It gives that life to all my devotions, that I can but feel absorbed in this glorious theme.

I have been studying the scriptures for about ten years, to find out in what the saints' rest consisted, and have found that, according to the promise of New Heavens and New Earth, there were joys that the preaching that I was accustomed to, could not afford. O, that the Lord would open the eyes of my brethren, that they may see, and be willing to teach the whole truth, and prepare the way of the Lord. It is very cheering to me to hear of the prosperity of our Advent brethren."

BRO. WHEELER writes from Newport, N. H., Oct. 14th, 1852: "I attended the appointment at Portland, Me., and had a good time with the brethren there.—Baptized four. Spent last Sabbath with the brethren in Washington. The conference has proved a great blessing to the cause. There has been a rising in the church. God's blessing rests upon his people, and they are coming together, striving for the unity of the faith, and the power of the third angel's message."

The Dark Day of May 19, 1780.

A FRIEND recently placed in our hands a letter, written more than seventy years ago by Dr. Caleb G. Adams, of Exeter, N. H., to General Nathaniel Folsom, of that town, who was at the time a member of the Provincial Congress at Philadelphia. In the following passage, that well-known phenomenon, the "Dark Day," which spread alarm, and in some cases, consternation through this part of the country, is described, with details which must prove deeply interesting to many of our readers. The letter is dated Exeter, May 26, 1780: Boston Journal.

* * * * * "We had a very extraordinary phenomenon the 19th day of this month. In the morning it was rainy, till about nine o'clock, when the clouds broke away and the sun appeared, but very red. After nine the clouds grew very thick, with the wind from southwest, in light breezes; at half past ten it was uncommonly dark, the clouds appearing of a yellowish hue. At eleven the public school was dismissed, it being so dark that no person could read or write. It continued to grow darker till twelve, when it was so dark that we could not tell one person from another in a room with three large windows. In short, it was midnight darkness at noon-day! The fowls went to roost, and there was a strong smell of smoke. It had been very dry for a long time before, the wind having been at East for four or five days, which drove the smoke back to the westward, and when the wind shifted it brought it all down in a body, which, together with the dense clouds, caused the darkness, which lasted till three o'clock P. M. before it began to grow light."

"Thousands of people who could not account for it from natural causes, were greatly terrified, and indeed it cast a universal gloom on the earth. The frogs and night-hawks began their notes. At four o'clock the wind shifted to the north-east, which brought the clouds back, and at sunset it was again very dark. At nine o'clock it was darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost everybody who happened to be out in the evening, got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night as it was in the day, as the moon had fulfilled the day before."—Advent Herald.

THE SIGNS OF THE END OF THE WORLD.

BY OTIS NICHOLS.

"AND as Jesus sat upon the Mount of Olives, the disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us . . . what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Matt. xxiv, 3. The answer to this question is recorded in verses 29, 30.

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." See also Mark xiii, 24-26; Luke xxi, 25-27.

These are the signs of the end of the world, and the second coming of Christ. They are distinctly given in their order, "after the tribulation," so that none need be mistaken in their application, nor the time of their fulfillment. The disciples asked our Lord a literal question, and we believe he gave them a literal answer.

The first thing necessary to notice, is the period, and the application, of "the tribulation of those days" that precede the signs. Our Lord in verse 15, has given warning of its approach, and cautioned against a misunderstanding.

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth let him understand,) then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains. . . . For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." Verses 15, 16, 21, 22.

From the expression "them which be in Judea," verse 16, this tribulation was formerly believed (and many still believe it) to refer to the severe afflictions of the Jews in the time of the siege by the Romans, when Jerusalem was destroyed. According to Josephus, "eleven thousand Jews then perished in Jerusalem, and more than two hundred and fifty thousand in other parts of Judea, besides ninety seven thousand captives, and innumerable others who perished by starvation and other means."

It is sufficient to note, (1.) The tribulation spoken of by our Lord referred expressly to the severe afflictions of the elect, Christians, and not to the Jews that perished in Judea. (2.) It did not take place until "the abomination of desolation" stood up in the holy place, the Church, near five hundred years afterwards. What is the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel? Certainly, it was not the sacrificial abominations of the Pagans, called "the daily sacrifice," [Dan. viii, 13,] neither was it the idolatrous standards of the Roman armies that were planted on the walls of the city and temple of Jerusalem, as many think. Nor can it refer to Dan. ix, 27; for that speaks of abominations, plural; whereas our Lord speaks of a particular abomination, singular, and cautions against a misunderstanding. This desolating power is expressly referred to in Dan. viii, 13. It is there called "the transgression of desolation." "They shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate," xi, 31. "From the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up," &c. See margin xii, 11.

Notice this fact. "The daily sacrifice," that is, the Pagan Roman governments and its sacrifices, were first restrained, and taken away; and afterwards "the abomination of desolation" was "placed" or "set up," "in the holy place." The holy place at that time could not refer to the temple of Jerusalem, as some think, for that was destroyed more than four hundred years before this desolating power was set up.

Thus the abomination of desolation could not apply to the Roman armies, or their idolatrous standards at the time Jerusalem was destroyed, neither could it refer to the Pagan Roman governments, nor its sacrifices. The only reasonable application of this desolation, is to the setting up, or establishing the jurisdiction of the Papal governments in the Church, and the Pope of Rome, the supreme executive.

The sanctuary and the host, were first trodden down by the Pagans. After Paganism was restrained, Papacy came into power and made the Church of Christ desolate. Paganism hindered the establishment of the Church of Rome, as long as its governments continued: but it no longer stood in their way, after England, the last of the ten Pagan kingdoms was christianized. Arthur put an end to Paganism among the Britons. He was crowned a Christian monarch of the Britons, by a Catholic Bishop in A. D. 508. [Kippis' and Henry's Biog. Brit. See Hale's reply to Dr. Pond.—Signs of the Times, 1843.]

The Pagans then lost their head in the Western empire of Rome, and the way was open to set up the Papal power in the Church, or "holy place"—"where it ought not," [Mark xiii, 14,] "in the temple of God." See 2 Thess. ii, 4.

Take notice, the Church was called "the temple of God" under the gospel-ministry, and was the holy place, [1 Cor. iii, 16, 17,] where God's law and Spirit should dwell, as the tabernacle of Moses was, under the first covenant. Compare the quotations of 2 Cor. vi, 16, with Lev. xxvi, 11, 12, and Ex. xxix, 43-45, xxv, 8.

Papacy was established in A. D. 538. The Pope of Rome was then constituted the head of all the Christian Churches in the world, and invested with the supreme authority over all in all matters pertaining to religion. The Papal supremacy continued 1260 years from the time it was established, and during this period the saints were given into the hands of this power. Dan. vii, 25, 26; Rev. xiii, 5-7. This was the period that the abomination of desolation stood in the holy place. This was the period of the tribulation of those days, in which the saints suffered under the Papal persecution, which for the magnitude and duration of their afflictions, (in which more than fifty millions of the saints were cruelly put to death,) there was not the like "since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened."

The severity of that tribulation began to be broken before the 1260 days, or years, expired that the Church was to remain in the "mountains," [verse 16,] or "wilderness." See Rev. xii, 6, 14-16. The kings began to make war on that desolating power [see Rev. xvii, 16,] many years before the whole period allotted to it had expired; and thus, the days in the violence of the persecution were shortened, and for the elect's sake, the Church.

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days," &c. Mark says, "In those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened," &c. The history agrees with the prophecy. "In those days," [1260,] allotted to "the abomination of desolation," and yet after the tribulation of the Church, from that power, had passed, the sun was literally darkened. "In 1780, May 19th, the sun rose clear—at ten o'clock the horizon began to be darkened, and at twelve, people had to light candles—laborers left the field—the fowls retired to roost, and a feeling that the judgment day had come, rested upon many minds."

"The moon shall not give her light." "The darkness, not only continued through the day, but the night following, till past midnight, though the moon was at the full. Such was the darkness, that a sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes, was equally invisible as the blackest velvet. An eye-witness says, that when the moon first became visible, it had precisely the appearance of blood. The prophet Joel says; [Chap. ii, 31,] "the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come."—We have seen that this prophecy has been fulfilled.

"The stars shall fall from heaven." This is another sign of the end of the world. In 1833, Nov. 13th, was seen precisely such an appearance as is described in Rev. vi 13. The atmosphere was literally filled with falling stars, shooting in every direction, answering exactly to the description there given.

A sign, that is, an omen of a future event, is frequently a phenomenon of some of the scenes that usher in the event signified; as the appearance of a drawn sword over the city of Jerusalem, and armies fighting in the air, or clouds, were omens of her destruction by the Roman armies. Thus the darkening of the sun and the moon in 1780, and the falling of the stars in 1833, were omens of warning that the great and terrible day of the Lord was near. They were a precursory exhibition of the like scenes that will usher in that day.

There are two distinct classes of prophecies of the darkening of the sun and the moon, which refer to two distinct events. One refers to such as are signs that are fulfilled previous to the event signified. See Joel ii, 31; Matt. xxiv, 29, 30; Mark xiii, 25, 26; Luke xxi, 26, 27. These are omens of warning for the saving benefit of the world.

The other refers directly to the great and terrible day of the Lord, particularly, to the scenes that usher in that day. See Isa. xiii, 9, 10; Joel ii, 10, 11; iii, 15; Rev. vi, 12-17. These latter prophecies of the darkening of the sun and the moon, have evidently their fulfillment at the commencement "of the great day of His wrath." They cannot be omens of warning that will result for the salvation of the enemies of God; then they that are filthy will be filthy still.

The next sign in the order after the falling of the stars is "and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken, and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn," &c.

I understand the shaking of the powers of the heavens to be a literal appearance of the shaking of the heavens. See Isa. xiii, 13; Hag. ii, 6; Joel ii, 10; Heb. xiii, 26. The powers of the heavens can be no other than the sun, the moon, and the stars, "that rule the day, and the night, seasons and years." Gen. i, 14, 18. If the heavens have a literal appearance of being shaken, will not the sun, moon and the stars also tremble? This event is future, and immediately precedes the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and the literal appearance of our Lord in the clouds of heaven.

"This generation," is clearly defined by our Lord. None other can reasonably apply, but the "very generation" that are eye-witnesses to the fulfillment of "all these things," that is, the signs of the end of the world, and second coming of Christ, commencing with the darkening of the sun and the moon in 1780.—Luke says, [xxi, 28,] "When these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads for your redemption draweth nigh." Matthew says, "When ye shall see all these things, know that he is at the doors."

"Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away." Thus we are assured by the testimony of our Lord that a remnant of the very generation that was born nearly eighty years ago will not pass away before they see all these signs, and even the literal coming of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. "Watch, therefore, and be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh; lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto you all, Watch."

ROCHESTER, THURSDAY, JAN. 20, 1853.

THE IMMEDIATE COMING OF CHRIST.

TEN years since there were thousands in this country looking for the immediate coming of Christ, believing beyond all doubt that his coming was "near even at the doors," who have lost their faith and their interest in his immediate coming. They once rejoiced in the doctrine of his soon coming, and the thought of beholding the dear Saviour, descending to this earth, attended by all the holy angels, filled them with joy unspeakable and full of glory. But, alas! they have ceased to look for, and love the appearing of Jesus, have lost sight of the "blessed hope," and have turned to the pleasures and treasures of earth. We should inquire into the cause of this sad change.

WHAT HAS FAILED? If the evidences on which their faith rested have failed, then there are good reasons why they should give up their faith in Christ's immediate coming; but if they have not failed, their faith should now be as strong, and they be as joyous in hope, as eight or ten years ago. In reviewing the subject, we are bound to say, in answer to the above question, that nothing has failed. The believers in Christ's immediate coming have not, it is true, realized all their expectations. But we are confident that it is not a hard task to show the inquiring mind, that their disappointments have not proved the doctrine false, and do not effect the evidences on which their faith then rested that the event was at the doors.

Wm. Miller presented to the world his views of the prophecies of Daniel and John in particular, which aroused men, and called their minds to the evidences of the Advent near. Those evidences were conclusive and overwhelming, and hundreds of Ministers of the gospel left their charges, and went out into the wide field before them, giving themselves exclusively to the proclamation of "Behold he cometh." Hundreds of men of moral worth, who had never preached, then felt called out to publish the glad tidings. And through the free-will offerings of those who had the means, and were satisfied that the period of their stewardship was short, publications on the subject of the Advent were scattered far and wide, and in many portions of our country like the leaves of Autumn.

We will now briefly notice some of the evidences on which the Advent faith rested, and see if we can discover a failure, or find one evidence on which our faith rested with such confidence, that has been affected by the passing of the time.

The Metallic Image of Dan. ii. In this chapter four universal, Gentile kingdoms are brought to view.—Babylon, represented by the head of gold. The Medo-Persian kingdom, represented by the breast and arms of silver. Grecia, represented by the belly and sides of brass. The Roman kingdom, represented by the legs of iron. The ten toes of the image represent the divided state of this fourth kingdom. The next is God's everlasting kingdom. Where are we in this prophecy?

Babylon, the head of gold, long since passed away. The Medo-Persian kingdom, the breast and arms of silver, long since was numbered with things past.—Grecia, represented by the brass, is in the past. Rome in its undivided state, represented by the legs of iron, is also in the past. And for almost fourteen hundred years has the divided state of the fourth kingdom been represented by the feet and toes of the image.

What next? Answer: The destruction of the kingdoms of this world, represented by the stone smiting the image on the feet, when the "iron, the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold, [were] broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors, and the wind carried them away that no place was found for them." And then will God's everlasting kingdom be set up.

We now ask, Has the passing of the time to which the minds of the Advent body were directed for the coming of the Lord, prove that there is no evidence in this chapter for the speedy establishment of God's everlasting kingdom? We answer, that our disappointment does not in the least effect the evidence in this prophecy. The next event is the destruction of earthly kingdoms, and the establishment of God's everlasting kingdom.

The prophecy of the seventh chapter of Daniel is still more definite. Here four beasts are presented, representing the same as the four parts of the metallic image. The lion represents Babylon, the same as the head of gold. The bear represents the Medo-Persian kingdom, the same as the breast and arms of silver. The leopard represents Grecia, the same as the belly and sides of brass. And the fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, &c., represents the Roman kingdom, the same as the legs of iron; and his ten horns represent the ten divisions of the Western empire, the same as the ten toes of the image.

But among the ten horns of this beast there came up another little horn, before whom three of the first horns were plucked up by the roots. It is said of this horn, that "he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time." All agree that this represents the Papal power, which had its 1260 years of cruel triumph, from about 538, to 1798.

But "they shall take away his dominion, says the prophecy. This was fulfilled in 1798, when Berthier, a French general entered the city of Rome and took it. The Pope was taken prisoner, and shut up in the Vatican. The Papal government, which had continued from the time of Justinian, was abolished, and a Republican form of government given to Rome. The Pope was carried captive to France, where he died 1799. Thus his dominion was taken away. He that led others "into captivity," went into captivity, and he who killed with the sword, those whom he pleased to call heretics, was himself killed [subdued] with the sword." We are brought down in the prophecy to within fifty-four years of the present time.—What is the next event before us? Answer. The awful scenes connected with the judgment of the great day, followed by the everlasting kingdom of God. We need not say that the passing of a few years beyond the point of time when so many expected to see the Lord, does not affect the evidence that the judgment is the next event, and should now be expected, for none will fail to see this. Thousands may close their eyes from the light of this prophecy, and fall to sleep in this hour when we are especially commanded to watch, yet this will not affect the prophecy. Time rolls on, and we are being borne on to the judgment, which is the next event in the prophecy, and just before us. We will now leave the book of Daniel for the present, to look at another class of evidences, called the signs.

The special signs of the Advent, mentioned by Christ, are those in the sun, moon and stars. And we would first remark, that it is impossible for man to conceive of any other object that our Lord could have in pointing out signs of his Advent, only that something, at least, should be known of the time of his coming. Whether these signs have, or have not yet been seen, it is infidelity to teach that the church was to be wholly ignorant of the Second Advent, when the Son of God has foretold signs of this event. But our Saviour has said, "when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." Luke xxi, 28. "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh; so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, KNOW that it is near, even at the doors." Matt. xxiv, 33, 34.

The evidence has been presented that the darkening of the sun and the moon occurred May 19th, 1780, and the falling of the stars in 1833. And the Advent body was once agreed in the belief that these signs were then fulfilled. A few, who have since doubted almost everything, have also doubted in relation to the fulfillment of the predicted signs. But what has failed? Our object is at this time to see if any of the evidences on which the Advent faith rested, have failed by the continuation of time beyond our expectations. The evidence that has been presented to show the fulfillment of these signs was fully satisfactory to those who embraced the Advent faith about ten years since, that Christ's coming was near, even at the doors. And, certainly, the passing of a few years does not affect these evidences in the least. If it was our privilege and duty then to KNOW that Christ's coming was near, even at the doors, it is certainly dangerous to doubt now. If we "learn" the parable of the fig-tree as we should, it will banish all our doubts. When we see the trees of the field putting forth their leaves, and the ground beginning to be covered with its green velvet carpet, we know that summer is near. Not the shadow of a doubt remains in the mind relative to the approach of summer. "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, KNOW ye that it is near, even at the doors." Let those who dare to, doubt, we say to all, in the fullness of our soul, believe, and "know" what it is your privilege and duty to know, and watch and be ready. The Lord is coming, and coming speedily.

We now wish to notice another class of signs of the last days. The condition of the mass of professed christians, having a form of godliness without the power, is set forth as a sign. Says the Apostle, "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof; from such turn away." 2 Tim. iii, 1—5. Here let it be understood that these thus described are all professors of godliness, although they deny its power.

It may be true that such have ever been in the professed church of Christ to some extent, and yet this state of things in the last days constitutes a sign. But in order for this sign to be sufficiently plain, it seems necessary that the mass of professed christians should be in the condition described by the Apostle. Ten years since this portion of scripture was applied to the nominal churches by those who taught the Second Advent, with great effect. The application then seemed very proper, and was convincing. But when we come down to the present time and view the condition of the mass of professors, and compare their present condition with what it was ten years since, when the land seemed to be lit up with the blaze of reformation and the glory of God, and behold the sad change in their condition, we see that the language of Paul applies with ten fold more force than it did then. Then we inquire, if any thing has failed here? Was the nominal church reformed, so as to put out the light of this sign of the last days? Certainly it has not. Instead of reforming, and having more of the power of Godliness, nearly the whole mass of professed christians have lost, to all appearance at least, the last spark of vital godliness. And more than this, very many, who once shared largely in the power of the Holy Spirit, have so far sunk in the darkness of the present time that, although they have a form of godliness, "deny the power thereof." "From such," says Paul, "turn away."

But there is another feature in this sad picture drawn by the Apostle to which we wish to call attention. He says, "Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth; men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith." Verse 8. The Apostle here refers to the time when God was about to deliver his people from Egypt, and sent his servants, Moses and Aaron, to Pharaoh to show a sign before him, that he might know that he should let the people go. The sign was given; but Pharaoh called for his magicians, who "did in like manner with their enchantments." Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, with a counterfeit of the power of Almighty God, which Pharaoh, who knew not God, was not able to detect.

Then, in the last days, the truth is to be resisted by that which is a counterfeit of the operations of the Spirit of God. And do any ask what this counterfeit is? We answer, that it is being seen in the spiritual wonders of the present day, in Mesmerism, and Spirit Rappings, in the revival of Necromancy, Witchcraft, &c., &c. And it is a fact that the bewitching excitement relative to these things has arisen since the great Advent movements, eight or ten years since. And it is also a fact that if the plain truths of the word of God be proclaimed at this day, attended by the Spirit of truth, the Holy Ghost, the cry of Mesmerism is raised to fill the hearts of the people with doubts. If the speaker becomes earnest in presenting all-important truths, and feels the perishing condition of his hearers, and if the Spirit of God is poured out, and the unprepared weep, and saints shout aloud for joy, the lukewarm, deceived, hardened Laodicean is ready to call it all Mesmerism, and is joined by the multitude who have a "form of godliness, but deny the power thereof." In this way the truth is resisted. It was the object no doubt, of Jannes and Jambres to make Pharaoh believe that Moses and Aaron were only magicians like themselves.

It is stated in the book of Jasher, that Jannes and Jambres were the sons of Baalam the magician, who said to Pharaoh, referring to Moses and Aaron, "These are none other than magicians like ourselves." And in like manner will Mesmerizers now say, when they witness the effects of truth on the people, especially if they see any display of the power of the Holy Spirit, "These are only Mesmerizers like ourselves." In this way the minds of the people are filled with doubts, their hearts hardened, and the truth of God resisted.

Here, then, is a sign of the last days, of the most startling character. This sign had not appeared to any extent ten years since; but now is seen all around us. Now we may with propriety talk of the perils of the last days being upon us, which was not really the case ten years since.

Again, "when they shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them." 1 Thess. v, 3. It was not so much a time of peace and safety, ten years since, as at the present time. Then men were troubled with fears that the Lord might come; but now fears of the Judgment are gone, a spirit of deep slumber has come over them, the land is filled with peace and plenty, and peace and safety is on every tongue. What may we look for? Answer: "Sudden destruction," after the short work of the third angel is completed. "But ye, brethren," says Paul, "are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief." "Therefore let us not sleep, as do others." O God! In infinite mercy arouse thy drowsy people, and save them from the slumbers of this hour!

The love of this world, its cares, and its pleasures, will sink thousands in perdition. Dear brethren, may God help you to tear away from these things, consecrate yourselves, and all you possess to God, and lay up a treasure in heaven.

LETTER TO W. SHELDON.

DEAR SIR:—As we have been favored with the Advent Harbinger, your peculiar attacks on those who observe the fourth commandment have been noticed by us. Your general course, (which has been to slander and misrepresent this people,) we have not considered worthy of notice. We will say, however, that it has not been calculated to reflect much honor upon yourself, as a professed minister of the lowly Jesus, or that paper in which your bitter remarks have been published. Christians, and we say more; men of common judgment and taste, will not approve such a course. And we should not address you in this manner at this time, were it not for your article in the Harbinger of Jan. 1, 1853, headed, "The Law of Moses" and "The Law of God," which some pretend is unanswerable.

In this article your remarks savor very much of wormwood and gall as usual, and no doubt you express the real feelings of your heart towards those you call "Sabbatarians." You have charged this class of Christians, (without any exception,) who claim the right to do and teach the fourth commandment, with deception, with handling the word of God deceitfully. But why do you not present some better authority than your assertions? Why not cite some paragraph from the REVIEW where such deception exists, if, indeed, it does exist? The brethren are investigating this subject, and will not take any man's bare assertions for proof. You say:

"But by the power of Jehovah's truth we intend to let a ray of divine light shine into their favorite hidingplace, that the honest may discover the fallacy of their theory. We shall prove that the phrases, 'law of Moses,' and 'law of God' are interchangeable expressions, and are both applied to the same thing. Furthermore, we shall prove that that part of the law which Sabbatarians call the 'ceremonial law,' our Bible calls the 'law of God!'"

Mal. iv, 4. 'Remember ye the law of Moses my servant, which I commanded him in Horeb for all Israel with the statutes and judgments.' What does the prophet call this law? Ans. 'The law of Moses.' Where was this law made? Ans. 'In Horeb.' What law was given in Horeb? Ans. 'The ten commandments.' Therefore, the ten commandments are called the law of Moses."

Then after quoting Deut. iv, 10-13; Ex. xxiv, 12, which speak of the ten commandments, you add:

"This is the 'law' which was given in 'Horeb,' and which the prophet plainly calls the law of Moses.—There is no escaping unequivocal testimony!"

To the above we reply as follows:

1. It is true that God says by the prophet Malachi, "Remember ye the law of Moses my servant which I commanded him in Horeb."

2. It is also true that God spoke the ten commandments to Israel in Horeb, and there wrote them on tables of stone.

3. You are fully aware that the law regulating the Jewish system of religion (properly called the ceremonial law) was also given to Moses at Horeb. This, however, you conceal.

4. Therefore you are perfectly aware that there is not the least necessity of applying the phrase "law of Moses," used by Malachi, to the ten commandments; because the ceremonies of the Jewish religion were given at Horeb, where the ten commandments were repeated and written by Jehovah.

5. You ask, "What law was given in Horeb?"—Then you answer, "The ten commandments." We need not tell you that you have not fully and fairly answered this question; for you know very well that after God spoke the ten commandments in the hearing of all the people, he communed with Moses forty days and forty nights, in which time he gave Moses laws of the Jewish nation, and the ceremonies of their religion. Now, why give the false idea that the ten commandments only were commanded in Horeb, and then talk of "unequivocal testimony" that Malachi calls the ten commandments the law of Moses? How much more natural and consistent to apply the phrase "law of Moses" to that which he received while communing with God forty days and forty nights, than to apply it to the ten commandments which God spoke directly to the people.

6. Mark well this phrase in Mal. iv, 4: "Law of Moses my servant which I commanded him." The ten commandments were not commanded to Moses alone, but were repeated in the audience of all the people, while the "hand-writing of ordinances" was commanded to Moses on Mount Sinai, for him to present to the people. Now, in view of your effort to make it appear that the law of Moses spoken of by the prophet is the ten commandments, as though no other law was given in Horeb but the ten commandments, we wish to ask: In charging others with deception, do you not judge them by yourself?

But, for a moment, we will give you your position, that the phrase, "law of Moses," in Mal. iv, 4, which we are to remember, is the ten commandments, and see where it will bring you. We have only to read the fourth chapter of Malachi to learn that it applies, not in the Jewish dispensation, but just prior to the day of the Lord. The chapter commences as follows: "Behold the day of the Lord cometh that shall burn as an oven," &c. The second and third verses speak of the events of the same day. In the fourth verse we are commanded to remember the law of Moses.—The fifth, and the sixth and last verse, speak of the same day. Now if Malachi commands us to remember the ten commandments, as you think, we would inquire, Why should they be remembered? Can you assign any other reason why we should remember them, only to keep them? If you can, we wish you would. Hence your own position, if carried out, would lead you to keep the commandments of God.

But we have shown that there is not the least proof that Malachi refers to the ten commandments, but to the ceremonial law, the hand-writing of ordinances, or if you please, the "law of commandments, contained in ordinances." And do you ask if we should now remember that typical law? We answer we should. And do you ask if those typical services should be observed? We answer. They should not. But those shadowy services should be remembered as a guide to the substance. The Jewish Sanctuary and services were a shadow of the Sanctuary and priesthood of Jesus Christ. By tracing out the type, we are clearly brought to the light of the true tabernacle, and priesthood of Christ in heaven. But it is not possible to show any other reason why we should remember the ten commandments, only to do and teach them. Will you do this? Or will you teach men to break them?

You next refer to Luke ii, 22, 24, 39, which call some portion of the hand-writing of ordinances the law of the Lord, or as Campbell translates, law of God. To this we reply, that no one supposes that the ceremonies of the Jewish religion originated with Moses. The Lord was the author of that law, therefore, properly called the law of the Lord. And as God delivered it to Moses alone, for him to write in a book, and present to the people, it is properly called the law of Moses.

The ten commandments are nowhere called the law of Moses. You cite Mal. iv, 4, but here you have utterly failed. Moses was not entrusted with the utterance of the ten commandments, neither with writing them. They were afterwards placed in an ark, overlaid within and without with pure gold, and placed in the holiest place on earth, in the Holy of Holies, where no mortal entered but once a year, and that was the high priest. The ten commandments were spoken by Jehovah directly to all the people, and engraven in tables of stone, and are properly called the law of God. Though all the written word is God's in one sense, yet the ten precepts of the decalogue alone, are properly called the law of God, as they contain the principles of his moral government.

In an article on the two laws, in the REVIEW for Nov. 25th, you will see that the phrases "law of Moses" and "law of God" are thus qualified. Our mode of expression is, "The law of Moses, or the law of commandments contained in ordinances." See first page, first column. "Law of God, or ten commandments." Second column. God gave to Moses the "law of commandments contained in ordinances," which Paul calls "the enmity," and "the middle wall of partition." He also spoke to the people, without the agency of Moses, the ten precepts of his holy law, which Paul calls, "holy, just and good," and spiritual, A. D. 60, twenty-nine years after the "enmity" was "slain," and the "middle wall" was broken down. Rom. vii.

You next represent Sabbath-keepers as calling the two great commandments, named by Jesus, a part of the ceremonial law. Here you misrepresent them.—Those two commandments are no more a portion of the hand-writing of ordinances, than the entire book of Genesis. Paul says, "Blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances," &c. "Hilkiah the priest found a book of the law of the Lord, given by the hand of Moses," margin, 2 Chron. xxxiv, 14. Now it is very evident that this book of the law was not the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Bible, but that it contained what Paul calls the hand-writing of ordinances. On this point we offer the following reasons.

1. One of the five books of Moses, speaks of this book of the law. "And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book," &c. Deut. xxxi, 24. Therefore, Deuteronomy cannot be that book of the law.

2. Though, in a certain sense, the word law may apply to the whole Old Testament, yet, in the sense of "hand-writing of ordinances," there is no propriety in applying it to the book of Genesis, and a portion of the other books of Moses. Moses wrote the ordinances of the Jewish religion in a book. God wrote the ten commandments on stone. And when the five books of Moses were written, mention was made of the tables of the covenant, [Ex. xx,] and the ten precepts were copied from them. Also, mention is made of the book of the covenant, and its ordinances are also quoted. They were nailed to the cross. And this position no more abolishes the two great commandments, than it abolishes and blots out the history of the Creation or the flood. We have not space to pursue this subject further now; but intend to notice it again.

THE DARK DAY OF 1780.

"THERE shall be signs in the sun and in the moon."

Luke. xxi, 25. "The sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine." Isa. xlii, 10. "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light." Matt. xxiv, 29.

"A something strikingly awful shall forewarn that the world will come to an end, and that the last day is even at the door."—Martin Luther.

"The moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun from whom she borrows her light is turned into darkness she must fail of course and become bankrupt."—Matthew Henry.

The following description of the extraordinary dark day was given by Dr. Adams, on the 27th of May, 1780, eight days after it occurred. He writes:

"We had a very extraordinary phenomenon the 19th day of this month. In the morning it was rainy till about 9 o'clock, when the clouds broke away and the sun appeared, but very red. After nine the clouds grew very thick, with the wind from south-west in breezes: at half past ten it was uncommonly dark, the clouds appearing of a yellow hue. At eleven, the public school was dismissed, it being so dark that no person could read or write. It continued to grow darker till twelve, when it was so dark we could not tell one person from another in a room with three large windows in it. In short, it was midnight darkness at noon-day. The fowls went to roost, and there was a strong smell of smoke. It had been very dry for a long time, the wind having been at the east for four or five days, which drove the smoke back to the westward, and when the wind shifted, it brought it all down in a body, which together with the dense clouds, caused the darkness, which lasted till three o'clock p. m., before it again began to grow light.—Thousands of people who could not account for it from natural causes, were greatly terrified, and indeed it cast a universal gloom on the earth. The frogs and night hawks began their notes. At four o'clock the wind shifted to the north-east, which brought the clouds back, and at sunset it was again very dark.—At nine it was a darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost every one who happened to be out in the evening, got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night, as it was in the day, as the moon had failed the day before."

From Robert Sears' Guide to Knowledge, published in New York, 1844, we extract the following:

"On the 19th of May 1780, an uncommon darkness took place all over New England, and extended to Canada. It continued about fourteen hours, or from ten o'clock in the morning till midnight. The darkness was so great, that people were unable to read common print, or tell the time of the day by their watches, or to dine, or transact their ordinary business without the light of candles. They became dull and gloomy, and some were excessively frightened.—The fowls went to roost. Objects could not be distinguished but at a very little distance, and everything bore the appearance of gloom and night. Similar days have occasionally been known, though inferior in their degree or extent of their darkness. The causes of these phenomena are unknown. They certainly were not the result of eclipses. Many have supposed them to be produced by layers of vapor, some ascending and others descending, so as to intercept the rays of the sun in their passage to the earth. The Winter before the great day above mentioned was the severest Winter ever known in New England. Snow lay about four feet deep the whole time from the middle of November to the middle of April."

I have conversed with two individuals, men of veracity, one a native of Scotland, the other of England, who both testify to the occurrence of this darkness throughout their native countries. All the phenomenon described as attending that memorable day in New England was also witnessed in Great Britain, producing also the same effect and being regarded as a sign of the coming judgment-day. In Scotland it is remembered and referred to as the "Black Saturday."

In 1848, in Thompsonville, Ct., I had an interview with an aged colored man who related that he saw and remembered well that dark day. He was 22 years of age at the time—was then connected with the army and stationed with others at West Point, N. Y. About three weeks previous to the darkness a female in singular attire, and with the demeanor of a prophetess, entered the town announcing coming judgments, and proclaimed everywhere that "the 19th day of May in that year would be the greatest day ever known in North America." The place was filled with officers and soldiers who listened to her warnings, and being very irreligious in their habits, were measurably impressed with a fear of some approaching catastrophe. Avowing that whatever befell the place should also be shared by their mysterious informant, the woman was arrested and placed in custody. Time passed on—the 19th day came and with it the alarming darkness. In the fear which took hold of all, the woman was released. She immediately disappeared from West Point, and was never seen or heard of in the place afterwards, and as none knew her she could not be traced. Such was the tale of our aged Christian friend, who since we saw him has gone from among the living. * * *

I communicate the above to the Herald, thinking it may interest its readers who are looking for the coming of our Lord.—Advent Herald of April 9th.

D. T. TAYLOR.

THE NEW COVENANT.

BY J. H. WAGGONER.

In an article on this subject in the Harbinger of Nov. 16, 1849, the Editor says:

"The new diatheekē, 'disposition, arrangement, institution, dispensation, testament, will or covenant,' is called new, not because the fundamental principles are new, but because the 'arrangement' of those principles into a rule of christian faith was new, and subsequent to the expiring or vanishing away of the old."

Speaking of the Abrahamic covenant he says:

"That covenant must not be overlooked, in learning the character of the New Testament. Take out of that book the promises made to Abraham, or the Abrahamic covenant, and you take out Christ, the inheritance, or heavenly country, the city of God, and the redemption of those who have died in the faith of Abraham.

That covenant we look upon as the grand arch that spans the distance from Abraham to the triumphant day of Abraham's seed, the Lord of glory. The arrangements of the Old dispensation, and of the New, are mere appendages of this covenant; the former vanished away, at the first advent of Christ; the latter will end at his second coming. Then this new and everlasting covenant will award eternal life to all who are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise, or covenant."

After giving some scriptures to prove his position he says:

"This covenant is recognized and made the theme of David's song on bringing up the Ark to Zion. He says: 'Be ye mindful always of his covenant: the word which he commanded to a thousand generations: even the covenant which he made with Abraham, and of his oath unto Isaac: and hath confirmed the same to Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant.' 1 Chron. xvi, 15-17. The same is repeated in the 105th Psalm.

This 'everlasting covenant' is the theme of the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the other prophets."

This covenant embraces, in promise, the blessing of all the nations of the earth, [Gen. xii, 3,] and the heavenly inheritance. Verse 7; Rom. iv, 13; Heb. xi, 8-16. But this last quotation from 1 Chron. xvi, we will examine for a moment by the light of God's word. "Be ye always mindful of his covenant, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations." The word commanded must be distinct and different from the word promised; and if "commanded to a thousand generations," we, in this age, should be mindful of it too. "Even the covenant which he made with Abraham, and of his oath unto Isaac, and hath confirmed the same to Jacob for a law, [rule of action—Webster.] and to Israel for an everlasting covenant." In these verses quoted above, there is no intimation of a blessing on all the nations of the earth, nor the giving of the land, but only a "word commanded"—"a law." The promise is annexed, [verse 18,] "Saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance." By referring to Gen. xxvi, 3-5, we find that the promise was based on the command: "Unto thee, and unto thy seed will I give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father: and I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws." Now we find in the Scriptures, covenants of promises solely, [Gen. ix, 8-17; Ps. lxxxix, 3, 4, 34-36,] and of mutual agreement; [Heb. viii, 9; Ex. xix, 3-8,] but only one covenant commanded the law upon which the promises to Abraham were based. Whatever may be the opinions of men respecting this covenant, the word of God is safer and more satisfactory. 1 John v, 9. In Deut. iv, 12, 13, it is said: "And the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire: ye heard the voice of the words; but saw no similitude, only ye heard a voice. And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments, and he wrote them upon two tables of stone." Ex. xxxiv, 28. For the

THE HOME THE REST AND THE JOY IN HEAVEN.

BY ANNIE R. SMITH.

O, WANDERER o'er life's stormy main,
Who here an exile roam,
O, where is the harbor for thee to gain,
Where peace and happiness e'er remain,
O where, tell me where, is thy Home?
Where thy bark, no more by tempests driven,
Shall anchor where skies are clear—
A sweeter tone to his voice was given,
As he gently answering, said, in Heaven—
'Tis there—but never here.

O, Pilgrim through this vale of tears,
By care and woe oppressed;
Beset with anxious doubts and fears,
Where no repose from toil appears,
O where, tell me where, is thy Rest?
Where the heart no more is sad and riven,
Or weary, with sorrow and fear—
A brighter light to his eye was given,
As he upward gazing, said, in Heaven—
'Tis there—but never here.

O, Christian in this world of woe,
Where pain and sin alloy;
Who a lonely pathway tread below,
And the scorn and frown of the wicked know,
O where, tell me where, is thy Joy?
That may not fade as the hues of even,
And nothing be left to cheer—
A kindlier glow to his brow was given,
As he sweetly smiling, said, in Heaven—
'Tis there—but never here.

O then for that better land I sigh—
That land where all is fair;
Where tears shall be wiped from every eye,
And the saints shall lay their armor by,
A crown of glory to wear.
I fain would leave these shades of even,
On this dreary, and desolate shore—
For a foretaste sweet to my soul is given,
Of the Home, the Rest, and the Joy in heaven—
When we meet to part no more.

THE PARABLE---Matt. XXV.

BY WM. S. INGRAHAM.

In this chapter we have some historical facts in relation to an eastern marriage. Jesus here utters a parable to which the experience of his people is likened. I do not design to enter into all the particulars of this parable, but merely to glance at some of the important points. Perhaps there is not a portion of scripture in God's Word that has been misapplied and mangled more than the one under consideration. In bringing out some important points connected with this parable, it will be necessary to find the chronology of the event, or the time when the experience of the church is to be compared with the parable of the ten virgins.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins which took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom." No one can for a moment suppose that the kingdom, after all its component parts are brought together, is here represented as going forth to meet the Lord. But the church is represented as going forth. Then shall the true church be likened. Here a definite period of time is marked. Then, signifies, at that time. It may be best, in order to make this point plain, to introduce some scripture testimony. Matt. xxv, 16, 24, 34, 37, 41, 44, 45; Dan. viii, 14. We can but see from the texts referred to, that the term, then, marks a definite period of time. If this part of the subject is made clear, we will, as we have already remarked, point out that period of time in which the comparison is to be made.

In Matt. xxiv, we have a connected chain of events, beginning with the apostolic age, and terminating with the coming of the Son of man. From verse 5th down to the 14th, we have a prophetic history of the trials of God's people beginning at, or near the time of Jerusalem's destruction and reaching down to the end of the world. Verse 15, shows when a prophecy spoken by the prophet Daniel in reference to the desolation of Jerusalem would have its fulfillment. The 21st verse begins the great tribulation, which passes through the ten persecutions, and is continued by the Roman Catholic church, nearly twelve hundred and sixty years. The tribulation brings us down to about 1776, closing a short time before the days themselves terminate. Mark xiii, 24. After this, we have the signs of the coming of our Saviour—the darkening of the sun and moon, 1780, and the falling of the stars, 1833. When these things begin to come to pass, we are told by the blessed Jesus, to look up and lift up our heads; for our redemption draweth nigh. We see clearly from what we have already said, that we have come down the track of prophecy to that period when God's dear people may rejoice in expectation of the glory that is soon to be revealed. In the closing up of this chapter, we have a description of two classes of servants, one is giving meat in due season, the other is joining heart and hand with the wicked, in smiting his fellow servant. And, with a hypocritical heart, is saying, my Lord delays his coming.

If this class of servants are sincere, why is their portion given with hypocrites, spoken of in the last verse.

An effort has been made to throw this back upon the churches for a fulfillment. But after a more mature investigation, we see it comes nearer home. In order to have a complete fulfillment of this scripture, we must have a definite point of time to which we are looking for the coming of Christ. The churches have never been believers in definite time; therefore this scripture cannot be applied to them. There could be no propriety in saying, the Lord delays his coming, unless a definite point had been looked to for his coming. If I am right in the position I have taken, we are driven to the conclusion that these two classes of servants are found within the Advent body. At any rate, we find a class there, that bear all the characteristics here mentioned. Look at the lukewarm state of the church, once looking with longing hearts and with glorious expectations for the revelation of the Son of God. Look at the worldly-mindedness, yea, wickedness, of that people who profess to be looking for the speedy conclusion of all earthly scenes, and by their works deny their profession. Look at the once beautiful church, chosen out of the world, rejoicing with songs of gladness, walking by the same rule, minding the same thing, and with one mouth glorifying God. Let the contrast be drawn; compare their condition now, with their standing in 1844, when unitedly they were crying with a loud voice, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him."

Like the sow that was washed, they have returned to wallowing in the mire. And notwithstanding they have declared their freedom before the face of all people, a Babel must be built, a fabric reared like those of the nations around. And instead of the glorious proclamation of the speedy coming of our King, another message is given, and that which is holy must be given to dogs. The three angels of Rev. xiv, commissioned by the great Jehovah to warn the world of the approaching storm of wrath, must stand rebuked as being out of their place, and take their position in the Age to come. And this is not all. It is said by some, that, "Adventism is but in its infancy." If these things are so, this generation to which Jesus says, "look up," may expect to go to their long home, and their bodies be mingled with the dust. We see from the above that we are brought down this side of 1844, for the smiting time, mentioned in Matt. xxiv, 48, 49.

Once more, in remarking on this subject, we would say, in order to compare the experience of God's people with the parable of the ten virgins, both histories must be complete. All the points necessary to explain the Advent movement, down to the tenth day of the seventh month, 1844, are clearly brought to view in the parable. The proclamation of the coming of the Lord, has had the effect to start out a people to meet the bridegroom. Their expectations are not realized, and they are brought into a position described in verse 5th.

"While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept." Have we seen any thing in the Advent movement that may be compared with this part of the parable? If we have not, we never shall. These footsteps are too plain to be doubted or denied. After passing 1843, it was proclaimed by the Advent host that we were in the tarrying time spoken of by the Prophet. Hab. ii, 1-4. "Though the vision tarry, wait for it." The Lord save us from denying that truth that was begotten in our hearts by the Holy Spirit, and shone so clearly from his Word. The virgins during the tarry, were to slumber and sleep. Look at our condition after definite time apparently failed: On time we went out to meet the Lord. Our disappointment came, and we went to sleep; not literally, but so far as time was concerned, we were slumbering and sleeping; for we had none.

At midnight there was a cry made, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him." Here is another item to which the cry in 1844 may be compared. At midnight there was a cry made. This part of the subject is perfectly clear. When this cry began to be made, the mistake we made with relation to the ending of the 2300 days was clearly seen. In commencing the days in the beginning of the year 457 a. c., we made a mistake of about half a year, as the decree did not go into effect until about the middle of the year. This is clear when we take into consideration the time consumed in going up to Jerusalem, and the preparation necessary to begin the restoration. This being the case, we were carried down to the Autumn of 1844, and instead of the 2300 days ending in the Spring of the year, as we supposed, we were obliged to look to the Fall of the year for their termination. About mid-way of this tarry, the cry began. Here is a nail driven in a sure place. And those who have proclaimed the coming of Christ every year since 1844 have not been able to remove it.

What I have stated brings us to an investigation of other points in the parable. Verses 7, and 8. "Then all those virgins arose and trimmed their lamps.—And the foolish said unto the wise, give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out." No distinction is seen between the virgins until they all begin to feel the searching power of this mighty cry. The foolish being aroused, and seeing the condition of their lamps, and their lack of oil, immediately make a demand on the wise for help. But by them are pointed to another source. When the cry was made, it seems there was help for the foolish. But instead of making speedy application to the great fountain of life, they remained careless and indifferent. Too much like the class spoken of in Prov. xxvii, 22. "Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a mortar, among wheat with a pestle, yet will his foolishness not depart from him." Thus it was with the foolish virgins. Instead of heeding the counsels of the wise, and going to them that sold, they went where they could not obtain help.

"While they went to buy, the bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut." In the last quoted text, we have a number of important facts stated, by our Saviour, to which other points, connected with the church, are to be compared. We did suppose the coming of the bridegroom, in verse 10, to the marriage, represented the coming of Jesus Christ to this earth in all the glory of his Father. Here is an important point to be settled, in order for a further investigation of this subject.

We would ask the question, what does the marriage represent? Surely no one can deny that it represents a union consummated between Jesus Christ, the bridegroom, and his bride. But what is the bride? Not the church. If the church is the bride, who are represented as going in with Christ to the marriage? But it may be persisted, that the church is the bride. But stop a moment, and settle a few questions if you please. If the church is the bride, who are the guests? Matt. xxii, 10. Once more: If the church is the bride, who are those seen by John, and called to the marriage supper of the Lamb? Rev. xix, 9. (The supper must be after the wedding.) Let the word of the Lord settle this question. Rev. xxi, 9, 10.—"And there came unto me, one of the seven angels which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me, saying, come hither and I will shew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife. And he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God."

Did the angel fulfil his promise? If he did, when he showed the great city to John, he showed him the bride. It is written that "they which be of faith, the same are blessed with faithful Abraham." What did Abraham look for? Did he look for a church?—Heb. xi, 10. "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." Gal. iv, 26. "But Jerusalem which is above is free which is the mother of us all." If the Jerusalem above is our mother, it must be the Lamb's wife. If we take the view that the church is the bride, we find ourselves in difficulties which cannot be surmounted.—But take the Bible view of the subject, and all is harmonious and plain.

When we look at other scripture testimony we see at once the marriage here spoken of cannot represent an event to take place after the second Advent of our Lord. Read Luke xii, 35-36. "Let your loins be girded about and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord when he will return from the wedding, that when he cometh and knocketh they may open unto him immediately. It is perfectly evident that if we are to wait for our Lord's return from the wedding, the marriage must take place before he comes.

If the marriage is to take place after God's people pass through the gates into the city, when shall we witness the fulfillment of scripture as represented by the parable of the marriage of the king's son?—Matt. xxii, 11-13. If the above scene is to be witnessed after the saints are caught up into the heavenly city, some of the wicked must be caught up with them. If this is a correct view of the subject, what can we do with the testimony of John Rev. xxi, 27. "And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." But this is not all. We not only contradict the testimony of John, but we labor under other difficulties. Matt. xxii, 11, "And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding garment. And he said unto him, friend, how camest thou in hither not having a wedding garment? and he was speechless. Then said the king to the servants, bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." If all this is to be accomplished after the saints enter the city, surely there will be war in heaven!

A man, not belonging to the flock, in his flight for refuge, mistakes his own company, and finds himself speechless in the midst of an immortal band in the golden city! No wonder he is speechless; for he has not kept the commandments and has no right there. And he is taken by the saints and hurled down to earth again! But when we compare scripture with scripture, it is manifest that the marriage takes place before Christ comes to earth. If this point is admitted, on the same ground we must admit the shut door before he comes. But says the objector, I cannot agree with you in relation to the shut door. If you cannot agree with us can you with the Bible? Will you take the position that the door will not be shut (or the event represented by the shut door in the parable) is not to take place until after the Lord comes. If so, when do the foolish knock for admittance? Surely, not after the Lord comes; for then they will cry for rocks and mountains to fall on them. Rev. vi, 16. But says one, I believe the door will not be shut until after the marriage, and the Son of man takes his position on the white cloud. But wait a moment, my Bible don't read so. It reads, "They that were ready went in with him to the marriage and the door was shut."—When? At the time he went to the marriage. But I hear many saying, "Away with your shut-door theory, and no-mercy doctrine. But not quite so hasty! If you should move under the influence of a wrong spirit in opposing the shut-door, if our merciful High Priest should open another, in your haste you would not be likely to discover it. Perhaps no point has been more bitterly opposed than what some call the shut-door, and no-mercy doctrine. If we believed in the no-mercy system, our opponents would have some cause to reproach us. That we do believe in a change in the priestly office of our great High Priest, Jesus Christ, as represented in the parable, we do not deny. That our High Priest at the termination of the 2300 days in 1844, did end his daily ministration in the first apartment of the heavenly Sanctuary, and remove to the most Holy Place to complete his priestly work, we do fully believe. And that the saints that were interested in the Advent movement, and had their sympathies and feelings all absorbed in this solemn move, did, by faith, follow Jesus beyond the second veil we cannot for a moment doubt.

It is believed by some that we hold to a shut door that does really and forever debar the sinner from coming to Christ. Let me ask such a question.—

What does this parable have to do with those who were not brought under the influence of the Advent movement? It is true that the class represented by the foolish virgins have something to do with it: this is manifest from the fact that they were participators in the work. I have yet to learn that the relation those sustained to Christ who were not tested by the preaching of the speedy coming of Christ was in the least effected when Jesus closed his daily ministration in the heavenly Sanctuary.

That there is an open door for such as did not reject the glorious news of our soon coming Lord as proclaimed in 1843 and 1844, is evident from God's word. (And it is just as evident to my mind that a certain class have been rejected. Compare Matt. xxv, 10 with Luke xiv, 17-24.)

In Isa. xxii, 22, we have presented to our view an open door and also a shut door. In Rev. iii, 7, we have a parallel. Let these texts of scripture be compared one with the other. According to our faith in 1844, which I believe to be correct, the church of Philadelphia, or brotherly love, was in its glory; about the tenth day of the seventh month, after we had left the nominal churches, and had become united under the influence of truth. "I know thy works, behold I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." We can fix the chronology of the open and shut door here brought to view by John, no where but in 1844. We present an open door to all that have ears to hear. But those that have closed their ears to the proclamation of the last message of mercy, must answer for it in the day of accounts.

Again, in the language of holy Inspiration, as found in Rev. iii, 13, we would say, "He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches."—For further light on this subject, I would recommend to you an article written by Bro. J. N. Andrews for the Review on the Sanctuary and 2300 days.

Much more might be said on this subject; but I have written more than I anticipated when I commenced. When I review the past my heart is full, and swells with gratitude to God for all the way he has led us.

Dear brethren and sisters, we can raise our minds to heaven and thank God for the light that shines. Let confusion trample on the heels of confusion; blessed is the name of the Lord, all is well with those who have followed down the track of prophecy, and have walked in the truth as it has continued to shine from the Word. All who give up their past experience in the Advent movement, ought to expect nothing but perdition, according to the apostle Paul. Heb. x, 39.—By reviewing our past experience, we see that we have been brought down step by step, until we find ourselves in the patient waiting time, waiting for the Son of God from heaven. The Lord is soon coming. Quickly he will send his angels after his people.—Are you all ready? And your robes spotless and pure? Can you stand in the day of battle? O get ready, for Jesus will soon come. Let every stroke tell for heaven. Rise and shake yourselves from the blood of souls, that in the final winding up of all earthly scenes, you may be free. I hope to meet all in the kingdom.

THE SABBATH AND THE LAW.

BY C. MONROE.

THE agitation of this question, in these last moments of time, not only among Adventists, but the sects, some of them, seems to rank itself among "the signs of the times;" and the Lord in connection with the Sabbath reform, seems, if I mistake not, to be preparing a people, however unpopular and despised, for his speedy coming, and kingdom. Let neither the writer, nor the reader, disdain, if need be, to be ranked among that poor, despised people; for to be evil spoken of, is no certain sign of being in the wrong,—all manner of evil not excepted. Matt. v, 11.

The introduction of this mooted question, will, likely, expose me, as it has others, not that I would provoke or protract controversy, to be roughly handled,—in case the article is deemed worthy of notice.—Nevertheless, where duty calls, we must go, fearless of consequences;—evil report or good report! Neither sophistry nor abuse, however, will be taken for argument on any side, where candor or good sense are venerated. No good cause, much less a bad one, can be honored or advanced in this way. Long as I have lived in the world, some sixty years, has not yet been long enough, to see any one convinced, or converted by hard names, or abusive language. No man of moral worth, it seems to me, can thus stoop and defile himself. The man who has argument, or grace, has no room for "slang," or ridicule. It has been well said, "if we would catch birds or flies, we must neither pole the bushes, nor use acids." "Wisdom is profitable to direct."

The question at issue, is, not what I believe or disbelieve, or what you believe or disbelieve; that is a matter comparatively unimportant; but, what is the truth, the truth of God? Here we have it. Here is the mighty question, in which we are both, are all, alike, deeply concerned. But how, and where shall we find it? In the Bible, of course. To find, then, the truth, in relation to the Sabbath question, just take that plain, common-sense Book, calling "no man master," as the poor Indian took the Testament on the subject of baptism, "without note or comment." The result of which was, a call to his minister, to take him away to the river, and baptize him there. "No," said the minister, "that is not the right way. Immersion was once the way of baptism; but now it is Again: A man may keep the letter of the law, and be no Christian; but he cannot be a Christian, as we think, without keeping the law; that is, the commandments of God; for this is the plain duty of man; and a condition of his entering into life. Eccl. xii, 13; Matt. xix, 17. Again: What sort of a Christian is that, who, in his ostensible zeal for the gospel, tramples under foot the law, which the Apostle pronounces "holy, just and good?" As "faith without works is dead," so works without faith, are dead also. All works are dead, that assume to be meritorious; or present claims for salvation, or eternal life.—This is the gift of God through Christ, free and unmerited. But if obtained by the deeds of the law, then, sure enough, Christ is dead in vain. Gal. ii, 21.

The grand difficulty about the law of commandments,—not to the exclusion of the ceremonial, even—against which the Apostle labors so hard to warn his brethren, lies, not in keeping them; but keeping them with selfish motives; or with a view of justification, or salvation by way of works, or merit. If we can merit salvation by the deeds of the law, or any other deeds, then we take the crown from the head of Jesus, our Great High Priest the King of Glory, and place it on our own guilty head! If so, alas! alas! for that Great and Good Being: He has died in vain; and we can hardly thank him for his labors of love, sufferings, and death! But no; glory to God in the highest! JESUS SHALL WEAR THE CROWN, —Hallelujah! He is worthy. Worthy, worthy, is the Lamb. I place it there with both my hands; and all my soul; and with streaming eyes and melting heart, throw my unworthy self down at his feet, and like one of old, wash them with my flowing tears! In this way, and this alone, do I expect a crown hereafter among the unnumbered throng; and with them swell loud the song of Jubilee and of love, while God lives, and ages roll! Amen.

Once more: "Christ is become of none effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace." Gal. v, 4. Though the law is, not was, our school-master, to bring us to Christ, Christ must have the sole honor of saving us, or we are not saved. Nevertheless, a man never so well keeps the law of commandments, as after he has embraced the gospel. A man is never so moral before, as after his conversion; from the fact, that the greater and better, controls or perfects, the lesser, and inferior. So the law is perfected not abolished by the gospel. So of his morals, they are no longer gross, or selfish. They are improved, not abandoned, perfected, not abolished. They are purer, as they must be; and of a finer, sweeter cast.

He feels a conscientiousness, a responsibility, unfelt before; and yet, depends less upon morality, his "good deeds," than before. Nay, more, he renounces all possible merit of his own; and depends on Christ alone for salvation. Thus he comes out into clear light; and stands upon a rock, the Rock of Ages firm as the pillars of Heaven. His views are clear; his love, his faith is strong. He wants no meritorious help from the deeds of the law, either moral or ceremonial. They are void, and powerless. He has given all for Christ, and Christ is all to him.—Free, free grace, will furnish him a rich, and sweet a precious song of gratitude and love, to him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever. Amen and Amen.

"PRAISE ye the Lord, Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, that delighteth greatly in his commandments." Ps. cxii, 1.

"Rivers of water run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law." Ps. cxix, 136.

"Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wonderful things out of thy law." Verse 18.

"It is time for thee, Lord, to work; for they have made void thy law." Verse 126.

THE REVIEW AND HERALD.

"Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

ROCHESTER, FIFTH-DAY, JUNE 9, 1853.

WESTERN TOUR.

THE readers of the REVIEW generally, will be anxious to learn the state of the cause in the West, and will probably expect a brief statement of those things of interest, connected with our Western Tour. We shall, therefore, give a statement of facts, that the true state of the cause, and its progress may be known.

The calls from Michigan for help, especially for nearly one year past, have been urgent. The brethren have often written like this, that if we could not come, to send some one of the eastern brethren. But no one has seen his way clear to visit this field, since Bro. Bates was here last Summer, till Bro. Loughborough came into this State a few weeks since. During this period, however, Bro. Case and Cornell have been active, and labored ardently, and God has blest their efforts.

May 20th, we left the friends at Rochester, to fill our appointment at Mill Grove, N. Y. At Wende Station we found our aged Bro. Cottrell, waiting to convey us to the place of meeting.

Bro. Cottrell is nearly eighty years of age, remembers the dark day of 1780, and has been a Sabbath-keeper more than thirty years. He was formerly united with the Seventh-Day Baptists; but on some points of doctrine has differed from that body. He rejected the doctrine of the trinity, also the doctrine of man's consciousness between death and the resurrection, and the punishment of the wicked in eternal consciousness. He believed that the wicked would be destroyed. Bro. Cottrell buried his wife not long since, who, it is said, was one of the excellent of the earth. Not long since, this aged pilgrim received a letter from friends in Wisconsin, purporting to be from M. Cottrell, his wife, who sleeps in Jesus. But he, believing that the dead know not anything, was prepared to reject at once the heresy that the spirits of the dead, knowing everything, come back and converse with the living. Thus truth is a staff in his old age. He has three sons in Mill Grove, who, with their families are Sabbath-keepers.

Our meetings in the place were well attended.—Several came eight and ten miles to hear, and manifested a good interest. But there is evidently a lack of real faith in the brethren in that vicinity. Their experience in the Advent faith has been short. A little more than two years since, they first heard of Advent Sabbath-keepers, by a notice of the REVIEW in the Sabbath Recorder. Since that time they have increased in numbers, and have grown stronger in the Advent faith. We ardently desire that those dear brethren may all be fully settled on all points of present truth, and share largely of the blessings of the gospel of Christ.

According to appointment we met with the brethren in Tyrone, Mich., the 27th, 28th and 29th ult. The meeting was held in a barn, well prepared for the occasion. We were happily disappointed to find so many friends of the Lord's Sabbath present. About twelve brethren and sisters came from Locke in one wagon, drawn by two yoke of young oxen, a distance of twenty-eight miles. One of them was the Sister Avery who wrote the excellent letter to W. Sheldon, recently published in the REVIEW. This will give a correct idea of the interest on the part of many to hear the truth in this new country.

Some portion of the time of this Conference was a season of labor. There is a class of people in this region, called "Believers," who profess to have much of the Holy Spirit; but it is very evident that some of them are influenced by a spirit that is decidedly unholy. Quite a number of them have recently embraced the Sabbath, and were at the meeting. We regard them as perfectly honest, and believe that God has led them to see the truth; yet they have much to learn, and some of them present at the meeting evidently knew not of what spirit they were of. They were happily but plainly corrected, and we are glad to say that they generally received reproof like Christians. The cause here has been in great danger through fanaticism, coming from the above named class; but if a strait forward course is taken, and those who still hold on to their false impressions and strange exercises are disfellowshipped by the brethren, the unholy leaven will soon be entirely purged out.

We had good liberty in preaching the Word. Some of our social meetings were very interesting. The last evening was a season of great interest. By this time the fog was cleared away, and the Spirit of God came down, melting the hearts of the people, and causing them to rejoice. And many, as they look back on that season, can say as did the two disciples when on their way to Emmaus. "Did not our heart burn within us?" &c. It was very clear to all, that strange exercises in the hands, arms, &c., was not the result of the Holy Spirit; but some strange spirit that would lead anywhere but to the kingdom. And while the very atmosphere seemed as sweet as heaven, and the dear saints were meekly praising God in a calm, weeping, humble manner, with their hearts filled with love to God, false spirits were viewed in strong contrast. We hope that all present will ever remember the seal that God set to the truth of this matter.

Bro. H. S. Case we had seen before. His face is still set towards Mount Zion. We have formed a happy acquaintance with Bro. M. E. Cornell. He is active in the cause, and his labors have been much blest. All the efforts of the Harbinger to crush him have only served to open the way before him, while he has humbly followed on in the work of his Master, and success has followed.

The cause of truth, as far as we can now judge, is advancing gloriously. The brethren are growing stronger, souls are almost daily added to the church, and an interest is awakened all around to hear. There are brethren here who feel that they are the Lord's stewards, and that he calls on them to help sustain the cause with their means.

Our Conference in this place is at hand. Bro J. N. Loughborough will be with us. It is expected that an effort will be made at this meeting to do something for the cause in Wisconsin, Indiana and Illinois.

JAMES WHITE.

Jackson, Mich., June, 1853.

Bro. Monroe's Article.

THIS interesting and instructive article, on another page, was accompanied with the following note:

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—You see the fate of my communication on the "Sabbath and the Law," as found in the Harbinger for May 14th, 1853. It was rejected on the ground, as we think, that it would be no benefit to their side of the question, and possibly do it harm. Be that as it may, we shall not be likely again to trouble journals that can thus decline the publication of pieces, written with candor, and concern for the good of souls, and in favor of the Sabbath; more especially, after publishing so many hard and bitter things, both against the Sabbath, and Sabbath-keepers. No wonder such a paper is found panting for life.

I felt it a duty from the Lord, to write for the benefit of his dear children—two classes of them. First those laboring under a mistake in relation to the Sabbath question. Second, to confirm those already in the truth on this subject. I sent it to the Harbinger because I thought it most needed there. And though it is now rejected I am clear; and whether joined to idols or not, I must let them alone. If but one precious soul can be benefited by it, or established in the truth of the Sabbath, I shall not esteem it lost labor. Would that it might be blest to the benefit of many. This would be an over-payment, for my feeble labors of love.

Waldo, Me., May 29th, 1853.

Ye ~~old~~ Waste Places, who delight to hold
In sullen gloom your solitary reign—
Enjoy your cheerless work while yet you may;
For soon your places shall be known no more.
Ye hosts of Evil Passions, who have reigned,
Offspring of Sin, within the hearts of men—
A little space is left you yet, to rule;
To urge men on in wickedness; but lo,
Your days are numbered, and your tomb prepared.
In the great, final day, all these shall die
A death that has no hope of life again.

So will earth's Great Restorer renovate,
And overturn and purify, till not,
In all his wide domain, one lingering scar
Of Death's defacement stays, or mark of Sin;
They with their works for ever, now, destroyed,
And in the universe renewed, for them
Will ne'er a secret lurking place be found.
Thus will at last, the dire effects, in full,
Of man's first disobedience, be repaired,
And all that then was lost, doubly restored;
God's great design fulfilled, that earth should be
The bright abode of man sinless and pure;—
For then will all, all the redeemed of men,
Through Christ the Son, to God be reconciled,
And never more, in word or act displease;
But crowned with songs, and everlasting joy
Upon their heads, reign with their glorious King;
For in his beauty, as he is, shall they
Behold him there, and to his glorious form,
Fashioned, be like him then. Corroding fear,
On perfect joy that every bosom swells,
Wages no war; for Peace, in heavenly garb,
Wide o'er the earth her holy wings shall spread.
Blood thirsts no more for blood, nor enemy,
Crouches to man in beast or serpent now.
The poisonous tooth and deadly sting, shall here
Be known no more; and on the asp's den,
The infant child unharmed shall gleeful play.
Peace with her golden scepter rules the world:
The lamb fears not to see the wolf approach;
The leopard with the kid shall calm lie down;
The calf, the fawning, and the lion young,
Together; and a little harmless child
Shall lead them all; for nought shall there destroy
In all my holy mountain, saith the Lord.

Hail Earth renewed! Celestial Paradise!
Fit dwelling place, with all thy loveliness,
Thy long reproach for ever wiped away,
And fairer now than when at first thy God
Pronounced thee good—fit dwelling place, so pure,
So beautiful, so adorned with smiling peace,
For all the saints, all the redeemed of men;
Who through thy gates, immortal City fair,
Thy gates of pearl, will freely enter in,
Where violence and riot never come,
And walk thy bright and dazzling streets of gold;
And to the stream of life, the crystal stream
Fast by the throne of God, have access free;
And from the tree of life, high arching o'er,
Pluck the eternal fruit and eat and live;
And in thy gladning smiles, O King of saints!
Glory unspeakable possess; for in Thy presence bright, there fullness is of joy,
At thy right hand, pleasures for ever more.

Lift up your heads, and shout aloud for joy!
Ye heirs of glory! your redemption comes!
Your day of glorious triumph draweth nigh!
Ye on whose brow already care has worn
His furrows deep, fresh courage take; for soon,
A crown of life shall shed its lustre there.
Let hope spring up anew to cheer you on;
For you are taking now the last sad steps
Within this wilderness of darkness drear.

O Church of Philadelphia! Christ hath said,
Before thee have I set an open door,¹

¹Rev. iii, 7-13.

And none can shut it; for thou yet hast left
A little strength, and thou hast kept my word
And not denied my name; Jo I will make Them of the synagogue of Satan, who Profess that they are Jews, while they are not;
And they shall come and worship at thy feet.
And that thou hast my word of patience kept,
Therefore will I preserve thee from the hour,
The strong temptation hour, which soon shall come,
On all the world to try the sons of men.
Lo! I come quickly! Hold fast what thou hast
That no man take thy crown; for unto him
That overcometh, will I grant to be
A pillar in the temple of my God.

Then lift your voices loud and sing ye saints!
Sing honor, praise, and glory unto God,
Who gives us foretaste of the coming joy
To cheer our weary way; who grants so great,
So precious prize to crown so short a race.
Soon in the holy City shall we strike
Our golden harps, to glory's anthems tuned.
Earth's toil will then be done, earth's care all o'er,
Its woes, its griefs, its passions and its tears,
All gone and all forgotten; while we raise,
With seraphim and high arch-angel joined
In silver tones our hallelujahs, loud,
Wide o'er the fields of bliss; and Heaven shall ring
With high hosannas, and sweet notes of joy;
While we ascribe, glory, and power and might,
All power, all glory, and all majesty,
Blessing and honor to our God, and to
The Lamb, who hath redeemed us by his blood,
To reign with him in glory evermore
And share his blessing, ages without end.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

BY THE EDITOR.

"CAN ye not discern the signs of the times?"—Matt. xvi, 3.

Our Lord asked the Pharisees and Sadducees this question, at a time when they came to him tempting him for a sign from heaven. It was a reproof to them for their unbelief in the signs mentioned by the Old Testament writers, which they professed to believe, and which were actually fulfilling before their eyes, yet disregarded by them. They could tell the weather for the morrow, but had no skill in those prophecies that pointed to that time. "When it is evening, ye say it will be fair weather, for the sky is red; and in the morning it will be foul weather to-day, for the sky is red and lowering. O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times."

We will here name some of the signs which the Jews had as evidence of Jesus being the true Messiah.

SIGNS OF THE FIRST ADVENT.

1. The star that appeared, to guide the wise men to the place of the infant Saviour, [Matt. ii, 2, 9.] prophesied of in Num. xxiv, 17.
2. He was born of a virgin, [Matt. i, 18-25.] spoken of in Isa. vii, 14.
3. Bethlehem was his birth-place, [Matt. ii, 1.] mentioned in Micah v, 2.
4. Herod slaying all the children in Bethlehem, from two years old and under, [Matt. ii, 16-18.] prophesied of in Jer. xxxi, 15.
5. His forerunner, John. The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord, &c. Isa. xl, 3. All Judea and Jerusalem saw this sign when they went out to be baptized of John. Matt. iii, 1-6.
6. The gospel preached. When Jesus stood up in the synagogue to read, he opened the book and read where it is written, [Isa. lxi, 1.] "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel," &c. The eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened upon him. And he said unto them, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." Luke iv, 16-21.
7. His humility when on trial. "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth. He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." Isa. liii, 7.

8. The manner and circumstances of his death. "They gaped upon me with their mouths as a ravening and a roaring lion. I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint. My heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels. . . . They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture." Ps. xxii, 13-18. This prophecy had an exact and literal accomplishment at the crucifixion of Christ, and the Jews saw it. Read Matt. xxvii, 35.

9. The fulfillment of the seventy weeks of Dan. ix, 24-27. The Jews understood this, or might have understood it. Caiaphas, being high priest that year, said to them, "Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. And this spake he not of himself, but being high priest that year, he prophesied [or taught the prophecies,] that Jesus should die for that nation, and not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad." John xi, 49-52. We might add to these signs the miracles of Christ, his resurrection, the pouring out of the Holy Ghost on the day of pentecost, and still others which were distinctly spoken of by the prophets.

But notwithstanding all this scripture was fulfilling before the faces of the rulers of the Jews, and all these signs were actually accomplished in a little more than thirty years, and they themselves had to acknowledge that notable miracles had been done, yet they believed not.

Well may it be said by this generation, that the Jews deserved wrath, and God was just in destroying their nation and place. But how is it with the professed people of God at this day? Do they believe in that Word which they blame the Jews for rejecting? The Jews were looking for a temporal kingdom, and overlooked the signs of Christ's first advent. The nominal church, as a body, is looking for a temporal millennium, and overlook the signs of his second advent, which are, as we shall show, more numerous and forcible than those of his first advent. Then if the signs of Christ's second coming are doubted and rejected by the professed people of God of this generation, the sin of unbelief will rest upon them heavier than it did upon the Jews, in proportion as they reject greater light.

SIGNS OF THE SECOND ADVENT.

1. The dark day of May 19th, 1780. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," &c. Matt. xxiv, 29. The first question to be settled is, what days of tribulation are referred to? We answer, the 1260 days [years] of tribulation on the church, prophesied of in Dan. vii, 25; Rev. xi, 2; xii, 6; xiii, 5, which commenced 538, and ended in 1798. "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." Verse 21. For the following reasons, we apply this to the tribulation of the church, which closed with the 1200 years of Papal persecution, and not of the destruction of Jerusalem.

(1.) It was the greatest tribulation that the church has ever suffered. Fifty, and some writers say, one hundred millions of Christians were put to death by the rack, flame and sword, and by every other engine of cruelty that wicked men and devils could invent. It was a greater tribulation than the church will ever suffer. For in the time of trouble, such as never was on the world, that is to come when Michael [Christ] shall stand up, [Dan. xii, 1.] the saints will not be put to death. God has promised to deliver "every one" of them.

(2.) This tribulation cannot apply to the destruction of Jerusalem; for that trouble on that nation was not so great as that of the cities of the plain, when God rained fire and brimstone from heaven on them; or the destruction of the old world by the flood. Neither was it so great as the day of God's anger will be, when the last vials of his wrath shall be poured out.

(3.) If this tribulation be applied to the Jews, or any other class of unbelieving men, it cannot be harmonized with Dan. xii, 1, which speaks of the time of trouble such as never was, when Michael shall stand up. Certainly, there could not be two times of trouble, at different periods, greater than ever was, or ever would be. Therefore we apply the "tribulation" spoken of in Matt. xxiv, 21, 29, to the saints during the 1260 years, and the "trouble" mentioned in Dan. xii, 1, to the unbelieving world, to be experienced by them in the future.

Then, "immediately after the tribulation of those days" of Papal persecution, the sun was to be darkened. Mark this: It does not say, after those days; but "after the tribulation of those days." The days reached to 1798, eighteen years this side of the dark day; but the tribulation of the days ceased before the sun was darkened in 1780. The days of tribulation were shortened for the elect's sake. Verse 22. "The reformation under Martin Luther modified this tribulation and continued to restrain the rage, and consume the power of Papacy until 1700; since which time, according to all church history, there has been no general persecution against the church." Mark xiii, 24 makes this point very plain. "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened." That is, before the 1260 years shall close; but after the tribulation, or martyrdom of the saints shall cease, "the sun shall be darkened."

"A something strikingly awful shall forewarn that the world will come to an end, and that the last day is even at the door."—Martin Luther.

In May 19th, 1780, there was a remarkable fulfillment of the predicted darkening of the sun; and in reference to the facts and date, there can be no doubt; for, besides the historical accounts, which all agree, there are many now living who witnessed it, and can testify to it.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived: 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man; for his lamp was trimmed, and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society—Life of Edward Lee.

"The 19th of May, 1780, was a remarkable dark day. Candles were lighted in many houses. The birds were silent and disappeared. The fowls retired to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of judgment was at hand. The Legislature of Connecticut was in session, at Hartford, but being unable to transact business adjourned."—President Dwight, in Ct., Historical Collections.

"Dark day of May 19th, 1780.—The sun rose clear, and shone for several hours; at length, the sky became overcast with clouds, and by 10 o'clock, A. M. the darkness was such as to occasion the farmers to leave their work in the field, and retire to their dwellings; fowls went to their roosts, and before noon, lights became necessary to the transaction of business within doors. The darkness continued through the day."—Gage's History of Rowley, Mass.

"Anniversary of the Dark Day.—The Dark Day, May 19th, 1780, is thus described by Mr. Stone, in his History of Beverly:

"The sun rose clear, but soon assumed a brassy hue. About ten o'clock, A. M. it became unusually dark. The darkness continued to increase till about one o'clock, when it began to decrease.—During this time candles became necessary. The birds disappeared and were silent, the fowls went to their roosts; the cocks crew as at day-break, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. The alarm produced by this unusual aspect of the heavens, was great."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20th, 1843.

"In the Dark Day, May 19th, 1780, the heavens were covered with a dense cloud for three or four hours During this time, the clouds were tinged with a yellowish or faint red, for hours, for which no satisfactory cause has been assigned. I stood and viewed the phenomenon, but had not any fear that the world was coming to an end."—N. Webster, L. L. D.—New Haven Daily Herald.

"The following description of the extraordinary dark day was given by Dr. Adams, on the 27th of May, 1780, eight days after it occurred. He writes:

"We had a very extraordinary phenomenon the 19th day of this month. In the morning it was rainy till about 9 o'clock, when the clouds broke away and the sun appeared, but very red. After nine the clouds grew very thick, with the wind from south-west in breezes: at half past ten it was uncommonly dark, the clouds appearing of a yellow hue. At eleven, the public school was dismissed, it being so dark that no person could read or write. It continued to grow darker till twelve, when it was so dark we could not tell one person from another in a room with three large windows in it. In short, it was midnight darkness at noon-day. . . . Thousands of people who could not account for it from natural causes, were greatly terrified; and indeed it cast a universal gloom on the earth. The frogs and nighthawks began their notes."

Says D. T. Taylor, as published in the Advent Herald of April 9th, 1853, "I have conversed with two individuals, men of veracity, one a native of Scotland, the other of England, who both testify to the occurrence of this darkness throughout their native countries. All the phenomenon described as attending that memorable day in New England was also witnessed in Great Britain, producing also the same effect and being regarded as a sign of the coming judgment-day. In Scotland it is remembered and referred to as the 'Black Saturday.'"

In the same Herald, the Editor gives the following note:—"The dark day in New England was Friday. There was no record that that darkness was seen in England. The dark day there was on Saturday."

"From Robert Sears' Guide to Knowledge, published in New York, 1844, we extract the following: 'On the 19th of May, 1780, an uncommon darkness took place all over New England, and extended to Canada. It continued about fourteen hours, or from ten o'clock in the morning till midnight. The darkness was so great, that people were unable to read common print, or tell the time of the day by their watches, or to dine, or transact their ordinary business without the light of candles. They became dull and gloomy, and some were excessively frightened. The fowls went to roost. Objects could not be distinguished but at a very little distance, and everything bore the appearance of gloom and night. Similar days have occasionally been known, though inferior in the degree or extent of their darkness. The causes of these phenomena are unknown. They certainly were not the result of eclipses.'"

2. The night following the dark day, May 19th, 1780. "And the moon shall not give her light." Matt. xxiv, 29.

"The moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun from whom she borrows her light is turned into darkness, she must fail of course and become bankrupt."—Matthew Henry.

"The night succeeding that day (May 19th, 1780) was of such pitchy darkness, that, in some instances, horses could not be compelled to leave the stable when wanted for service. About midnight, the clouds were dispersed, and the moon and stars appeared with unimpaired brilliancy."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20th, 1843. Extract from Stone's History of Beverly.

"The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes, was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."—Mr. Tenney of Exeter, N. H., quoted by Mr. Gage, to the Historical Society.

Dr. Adams, speaking of the dark night, says:—"At nine it was a darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost every one who happened to be out in the evening, got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night, as it was in the day, as the moon had full the day before."

3. The falling stars of Nov. 13th, 1833. "And the stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. xxiv, 29.

We are aware that some view that phenomenon an exhibition of meteors, and not of stars, and therefore no fulfillment of this sign. But what kind of a star guided the wise men to the birth-place of the Saviour? Surely, no planet, or fixed star. And how many planets think you, could fall from heaven on to this earth without producing its destruction? It is evident that this sign must have a shower of meteors, or small stars for its fulfillment. And that the falling stars of 1833 fully exhibit the sign, the following extracts will show.

"At the cry, 'look out of the window,' I sprang from a deep sleep, and with wonder saw the East lighted up with the dawn and meteors. The zenith, the North, and the West, also, showed the falling stars, in the very image of one thing; and of only one, I ever heard of. I called to my wife to behold; and while robing, she exclaimed; 'see how the stars fall!' I replied, 'that is the wonder;' and we felt in our hearts, that it was a sign of the last days. For truly 'the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. vi, 13. This language of the prophet has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday it was literally fulfilled. The ancients understood by aster in Greek, and stella in Latin, the smaller lights of heaven. The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore, the idea of the prophet, as it is expressed in the original Greek, was literally fulfilled in the phenomenon of yesterday, so as no man before yesterday had conceived to be possible that it should be fulfilled. The immense size and distance of the planets and fixed stars forbid the idea of their falling unto the earth. Larger bodies cannot fall in myriads unto a smaller body; but most of the planets and all the fixed stars are many times larger than our earth. They cannot fall unto the earth; but these fell towards the earth.

"And how did they fall? Neither myself, nor one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy before quoted. 'It rained fire!' says one—another, 'It was like a shower of fire!' Another, 'It was like the large flakes of falling snow, before a coming storm, or large drops of rain, before a shower.' I admit the fitness of these for common accuracy; but they come far short of the accuracy of the figure used by the prophet. 'The stars of heaven fell unto the earth:' they were not sheets, or flakes, or drops of fire; but they were what the world understands by 'falling stars,' and one speaking to his fellow, in the midst of the scene, would say, 'see how the stars fall!' And he who heard would not pause to correct the astronomy of the speaker, any more than he would reply, 'the sun does not move,' to one who should tell him 'the sun is rising.' The stars fell 'even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet. The falling stars did not come as if from several trees shaken, but from one: those which appeared in the East fell towards the East; those which appeared in the North fell towards the North; those which appeared in the West fell towards the West; and those which appeared in the South (for I went out of my residence into the Park) fell towards the South. And they fell not as the ripe fruit falls. Far from it; but they flew, they were cast like the unripe fruit, which at first refuses to leave the branch; and when under a violent pressure, it does break its hold, it flies swiftly, straight off, descending; and in the multitude falling, some cross the track of others, as they are thrown with more or less force, but each one falls on its own side of the tree. Such was the appearance of the above phenomenon to the inmates of my house."

The second extract is from Prof. Olmstead, of Yale College, a distinguished meteorologist.

"The extent of the shower of 1833, was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the East, to the Pacific on the West; and from the northern coast of South America, to undefined regions among the British possessions on the North, the exhibition was visible, and everywhere presented nearly the same appearance.

"In nearly all places, the meteors began to attract notice by their unusual frequency as early as eleven o'clock, and increased in numbers and splendor until about four o'clock, from which time they gradually declined, but were visible until lost in the light of day. The meteors did not fly at random over all parts of the sky, but appeared to emanate from a point in the constellation Leo, near a star called Gamma Leonis, in the bend of the sickle.

"Those who were so fortunate as to witness the exhibition of shooting stars on the morning of Nov. 13, 1833, probably saw the greatest display of celestial fire-works that has ever been seen since the creation of the world, or at least within the annals covered by the pages of history.

"I feel assured that this is no atmospheric or terrestrial phenomenon, but that these fiery meteors come to us from the regions of space, and reveal to us the existence of worlds of a nebulous or cometary nature, existing in the solar system, and forming constituent parts of that system. Nor are these conclusions built on mere hypothesis, but are necessary inferences from certain facts.

"This is no longer to be regarded as a terrestrial, but as a celestial phenomenon; and shooting stars are now to be no more viewed as casual productions of the upper regions of the atmosphere, but as visitants from other worlds, or from the planetary voids.

"Subsequent inquiries have led me to the belief, that the body was so distant as hardly to exhibit any apparent parallax, but was projected on very nearly the same part of the sky, as seen by all observers. This fact at once shows that the source of the meteors was far beyond the atmosphere, and confirms the preceding conclusion that it was wholly independent of the earth."

This is important testimony as to the vast extent of the falling stars, and also of their emanating from a single point in the heavens. It was the greatest display of celestial fire-works recorded on the pages of history. It was no atmospheric, or terrestrial phenomenon, common to the upper regions of the earth; but a display of the Divine Power, baffling the science of man.

After our Lord names these three signs; first, the sun darkened; second, the moon not giving her light; and, third, the stars falling from heaven, also the scenes closely connected with his second advent, [Matt. xxiv, 29-31.] he gives the parable of the fig-tree.

Here, dear reader, our Lord has stated the object of these signs, which is, that we may know when his coming is at the doors. But we are told that the church is never to know anything of the period of Christ's second advent. Then we inquire, why did our Lord give signs of the event? Are they given to deceive us? to lead the honest christian to look for Christ's coming, when, in fact, nothing is to be known of the time of the event? Certainly not. The fact that Christ foretells signs of his coming, and then states the object of those signs, that the church might know when the event should be near, even at the doors, is sufficient proof that it was the design of Heaven that the church should understand the period of the Second Advent.

It is true that our Lord has said, "of that day and hour knoweth no man." Mark adds, [Chap. xiii, 32,] "no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." But if this proves that all men are to be perfectly ignorant of Christ's coming till he suddenly descends from heaven, then it also proves that the angels who are to attend him, and Christ himself, will have no knowledge of the event till it takes place, and they find themselves in this world. This makes the text prove too much; therefore we must take another view of it. The text does not state that man shall never know the day and hour of Christ's coming. Rev. iii, 3, is good evidence that even the day and hour will be known by the watching ones. "Remember therefore how thou hast received and heard, and hold fast, and repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee."

The testimony of the Apostle is also to the point. "But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you; for yourselves know perfectly, that the day of the Lord so cometh [on the unbelieving world] as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them. . . . But ye, brethren, are not in darkness [as to the time of Christ's coming] that that day should overtake you as a thief." 1 Thess. v, 1-4.

We do not profess any knowledge of the day and hour of the Second Advent, neither the year; but from the signs, we know that it is near, even at the doors. It is the opinion of critical scholars that the text should read, "of that day and hour maketh known no man," &c. It would then teach that no man, neither the angels, nor the Son is to make the day and hour known; but the Father will do it. This is in perfect harmony with Rev. iii, 3; 1 Thess. v, 1-4. Read also Eze. xii, 21-28, and mark particularly verse 25.

Reader, do you doubt the fulfillment of the signs in the sun, moon and stars? If you do, then how would you have them fulfilled? It is sometimes stated that "when these signs are fulfilled, they will be so plain that no doubt will remain respecting their fulfillment. All men will then believe." But if this should be so, then how could it be as it was in the days of Noah? "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man." Noah knew the period of the flood, and preached it to the world, and prepared the ark.—In doing this, he condemned the world, and saved himself and family. But the people doubted and scoffed, and were destroyed. "So shall it be also in the days of the Son of man."

God has never revealed his truth to man in a manner to compel him to believe. Those who have wished to doubt his word, have ever found a wide field in which to doubt, and a broad road to perdition. While those who have wished to believe, have ever found everlasting rock on which to base their faith.

The parable of the fig-tree, is probably the most forcible one that could be employed by our Lord. When the trees of the field begin to put forth their leaves, and the tender grass begins to spring up, and the ground is being covered with its green velvet carpet, we know that Summer is nigh. If one should doubt, and talk of the season changing back to cold Winter, he would be thought insane. It is a certainty with us that Summer is coming when we see these signs in nature. We know that Summer is nigh. "So likewise ye," or with the same certainty, know that Christ's coming is at the doors when the signs in the sun, moon and stars are fulfilled.

A dear friend of ours, who had long been absent, might be coming, yet a thousand miles off. He might be near, yet twenty miles from home; but with what interest should we watch his approach to the door, and special care would be taken to be all ready to receive our long absent friend.

That Christ will come again has been gospel truth for more than 1800 years. He says, [Luke xxi, 28,] "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." When these signs begin to come to pass, redemption is drawing nigh; but when they come to pass, then know that Christ is at the doors. Reader, this is our true position; Christ is at the door. Are you prepared to welcome him? If you are not, delay not one hour. Make haste and get ready!

The shaking of the powers of the heavens, sign of the Son of man, and the mourning of the tribes of the earth, are events closely connected with the Second Advent, but are not given as signs to be presented as evidence that the event is near. A little while before Christ comes, every man's case will be unalterably fixed. It will then be said, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Rev. xxii, 11. As proof that this is a short period before the Advent, read the next verse. "And behold I come quickly," &c. He has not come, although the destinies of all are then fixed. In this short period of time, these events will take place: not to be preached to the world; for salvation's hour to them will then be past: not to inspire faith in the saints; for their faith will then be perfected.

4. The prophecy of Daniel unsealed in the time of the end, many running to and fro and knowledge increased. "But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end." Dan. xii, 4.

Here it should be noticed that the book is not to remain shut up and sealed till the end; but "to the time of the end." This period, called the time of the end, evidently commenced about 1798. In Chap. xi, 32-35, the 1260 years of Papal supremacy are referred to. "And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end." Verse 35. In 1798, the 1260 years, in which the Papacy had power to put the saints to death, closed, marking the commencement of the time of the end. Since that time, great light has shone upon the book of Daniel. This prophecy, which before had been considered obscure, and was hardly read, has become one of the plainest books of the Bible, and the attention of the people has been called to it.

"And knowledge shall be increased." This does not mean general knowledge on all subjects; but it must be limited to the one great subject presented to Daniel by the angel. The book of Daniel contains chains of prophecy which reach down to the end of earthly kingdoms, and the Judgment scenes. Chapters xi and xii are one chain, reaching down to the time when Michael shall stand up, the time of trouble such as never was, and the resurrection of the just, which, of course, embraces the second coming of Christ. Chap. xii, 1, 2. In verse 6th, one says to "the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" Mark this: The end of the wonders are the scenes connected with Christ's second coming. In the next verse the answer is given by the man clothed in linen, with a most solemn oath, with both hands raised to heaven. He swears to time. But says Daniel, [verse 8th,] "I heard, but I understood not; then said I, O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?"

The Prophet here makes his earnest inquiries relative to the scenes connected with the Second Advent; for these were the end of the things shown him. Now read the angel's reply. Verse 9.—"And he said, Go thy way, Daniel; for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end." That is, the prophecy of Daniel that definitely points out the period of the Second Advent, was closed up and sealed till the time of the end.—What shall then take place in this period called the time of the end? The answer is given in the next verse. "Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand." The truly wise, those that fear the Lord, will listen to the voice of instruction, and will understand that the day of the Lord is coming, and hasteth greatly, and will prepare. They will be purified, made white and tried. Or, as the Apostle says, [2 Pet. iii, 14,] "Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless." Again, "What manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness." Verse 11.

"But the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand." While the wise understand by the opening prophecies that Christ is speedily coming, believe, prepare, and rejoice in the blessed hope, the wicked doubt, scoff and do wickedly.

The great object of the prophecy of Daniel seems to be to bring us down to, and distinctly point out the period, and events connected with the Second Advent. The book, then, was given more for the benefit of the generation that should witness Christ's coming, than for any other in past time. Hence the propriety of its being closed up and sealed to past generations, till the time of the end. Then when the generation that is to witness the scenes of the last day is on the stage of action, the prophecy is unsealed, knowledge in regard to it is increased, and many join to warn the world that Christ is coming.

"Many shall run to and fro." This was to be fulfilled in the time of the end, when the prophecy of Daniel should be unsealed, and knowledge should be increased relative to the end of the wonders.—With this knowledge, which is the truth relative to the coming and kingdom of Christ, many of the servants of God have, for the last twelve years, run to and fro in the land to proclaim the glad tidings that Christ was coming. In 1843 and 1844, there were several hundred ministers from the different churches, devoting their whole time to this subject; besides as many more who had never before preached, who left their farms, shops and stores to proclaim the coming of the Lord. And as they went out on their heavenly mission from city to city, and from town to town, they crossed each other's track, as they "ran to and fro" to sound the alarm.

It is the day of God's preparation. Behold the facilities of traveling now existing, unknown before the time of the end. Says the Prophet, "the chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation; . . . they shall run like the lightnings." Nahum ii, 3, 4. What men have named the "Lightning Train" of cars carries passengers over the road from Rochester to New York city, a distance of about four hundred miles, in eleven hours. We were indeed reminded of this prophecy of Nahum, on our return from Michigan in June, while riding over the road in the lightning train, forty miles in less than fifty minutes by the watch. In some cases the cars run more than one mile a minute. Mails move rapidly by the power of steam, so that publications may be sent thousands of miles in a few days. The way, then, is prepared, and the prophecy is being fulfilled.

Said God to Job, "Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, here we are?" Men of this generation can answer, yes, we can.—Doctor Beman, of Troy, remarked in a sermon lately, that if Franklin tamed the lightning, Professor Morse taught it the English Language.

The Magnetic Telegraph is here referred to, by which news is communicated hundreds of miles in a few seconds. These things are looked upon by very many, as sure tokens of future good; forerunners of a bright, golden age, when all will be converted from sin to holiness, which some vainly think already dawning. And know not that the day of vengeance hasteth greatly, and that these things are foretold signs of the coming of the Son of man, plainly fulfilled before their eyes.

Where is the evidence that the world is growing better? It cannot be found. While art and science advances, man becomes proud, forgetful of God, and adds sin to sin. And while some view the race improving, and rising almost to perfection, it is in fact sinking in darkness and becoming corrupt, ripening for the sickle of Him that is soon to put on the garments of vengeance, and ride forth upon the white cloud to reap the harvest of the earth.

Why talk of the world growing better in this mortal state? The scriptures speak of the perils of the last days, of wicked men waxing worse and worse, and the wicked doing wickedly, and none of them understanding. The scriptures plainly teach that man is to become more and more corrupt, and ripen for the day of wrath as that wrath approaches. Look at the metallic Image of Daniel, second chapter, given to illustrate the four universal kingdoms, preceding God's everlasting kingdom. Why was not the head of clay and iron, its breast and arms of brass, its belly and sides of silver, and its legs and feet of gold? It would then much better illustrate the view of many that the world has been growing better, and that even now we are entering the golden age. Those who talk of this being the golden age, have this Image turned topsyturvy, standing on its golden head. But let it stand upon its feet, and the diminution of the value of metal from head to feet, is a fit emblem of the gradual apostasy of man since he left Eden.

That there is a period when the church of Christ is especially to look for the Second Advent, is evident. Many, however, take the ground that it was right for the early christians to look for Christ's second coming in their day, that it has been scriptural for the followers of Christ, ever since to expect his coming in their day, and that nothing more, in this respect, is required of the church at this time. But the fact that the signs of Christ's second coming are given, shows the error of this view. How absurd for past generations to expect the event, before the signs were fulfilled.

That some of the early church received the idea that Christ would come in their day, we do not deny. And it is evident that the Thessalonian church thus believed, from the fact that St. Paul in his second epistle to them, corrects this error. The Apostle says:—"Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God," &c. 2 Thess. ii, 1-4.

From this testimony of the Apostle, we conclude that there were those who taught the Thessalonians to expect the Second Advent in their day.—But Paul told them not to be troubled with this idea, and warned them against being deceived by it. He then stated that the day of Christ would "not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin [Papacy] be revealed," &c.—He points the church of Christ over the period of the apostasy and 1260 years of Papal supremacy, down to 1798, and guards all the way with his warning against being deceived with the idea that Christ might come during that period. And why did his warning cease there? Answer; At that point, the time of the end commenced, when the prophecy of Daniel was to be unsealed, knowledge on the subject of Christ's coming was then to increase, and many run to and fro.

What a beautiful harmony here is in the testimonies of the angel and Paul. The angel said to Daniel, "the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end." Paul said to his brethren, "Let no man deceive you, . . . that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed." The Apostle's warning reaches down to the time of the end, where the words were to be unsealed, and no farther.—This plainly shows that the last half century has been the period for the subject of the time of the Second Advent to be brought out, and this the only period that the church of Christ could scripturally look for the immediate coming of the Lord.

The signs in the sun, moon and stars have been fulfilled, the last, only twenty years since; the book of Daniel unsealed, and the Apostle's warning ceased; therefore, the way is fully prepared for the solemn warning to go forth to the inhabitants of the earth to prepare to meet the Lord.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—I want to say through the Review, that in reviewing my labors in the cause of Christ, for a few years past, and reflecting upon some occurrences by the way, and from recent light from the Lord through his Word, and from the admonitions of faithful brethren, I see some things (which I have not seen clearly till of late) said and done by me contrary to the Spirit of the gospel of Christ which call for a confession on my part, which indeed is humiliating but shall be freely and frankly made, the Lord helping.

First, under other influences than the meek Spirit of Jesus, I have at times spoken hastily and acted accordingly, and thus hurt in a measure the cause of God. I have not at all times possessed enough of the mind of Christ and have been left to a hurried, overbearing, oppressive spirit, and to deal out rebukes sometimes that were not dictated by the Spirit of the Lord. I have not exercised the patience toward opposers that I ought to have done. I have not had at all times, that forbearance toward enquirers after truth that I should have had. I have not had all that long-suffering toward erring brethren that Jesus has had toward me. (And he is my example of character and suffering.) I have thought more of my opinion than I have of the opinion of some of my brethren. I find selfishness in my own heart which must be crucified. I have not always "in honor preferred my brother." I have not at all times manifested the humility that I should. I have come short of the glory of God in many things. As I feel now, I would rather confess (if necessary) from this time till Jesus comes than have a stain of sin on my garments, or the frown of God upon my soul, after our High Priest shall leave the Sanctuary. I would heartily repent of these faults and wrongs, and do deeply regret that I have been left to grieve the Lord and his people, or to lay a straw in the way of any one's coming to Christ. I am sorry indeed that I have digressed (though it may have been ignorantly, and through temptation) from the highway of holiness, trod by Christ and the prophets, and to mar or wound the cause of the dear Lord and Saviour, which cause I most ardently love.

I would ask all whom this may concern, to forgive me wherein they have seen me err from the holy religion and Spirit of Jesus, and pray that this confession may serve as an everlasting barrier against my ever giving away in the future to any unchristian emotion of soul. Paul said "be patient toward all men." Again, he said, "Preach the word; be instant in season, and out of season, reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine." I think I shall try to obey this injunction of the Apostle. I crave the blessing of God upon my labor, and hope the saints will pray for me, that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified.

Though I fall, yet shall I rise again, and God will bring me forth to the light, purified as gold tried seven times. Your unworthy brother in Christ,
July 23d, 1853. S. W. RHODES.

THE following letter came to us, not post-paid. It may be thought by some that we are very rich, and able to send out the Review gratuitously, and pay postage out of our own means. It is proper to state that we are entirely dependant on the brethren, who are generally poor, for means to publish. And that brethren who work by days' works for a livelihood, have done much to support the paper, and in the publication of Tracts. But we cheerfully send the paper as ordered below, and hope that many will have the privilege of reading it.

MR. JAMES WHITE, SIR:—We understand you furnish the Advent Review gratis. If so, we should be very much obliged to you, if you would send each of us a copy for one year; and we will read and circulate. We should be glad to send you some money; but our means are very limited. Please direct to Frederick S. Smith, and Hiram Reed, Rosendale, Fond-du-lac Co., Wis. Yours respectfully, the third angel's message. Situated as I am, I know not but my opportunities for learning the truth relative to these charges are as good as any brother's in the State.

Your remarks relative to the brethren's meeting together the day previous to the commencement of the Sabbath on conference occasions, is correct. This has been the case as far as I have any knowledge where conferences have been appointed, and the brethren came from any considerable distance. We have been more or less in the habit of going from town to town on the Sabbath; as these towns are six miles square we frequently travel from five to ten miles to meet our brethren. I think if Elder Himes had been in the habit of riding after a team of his own, as we are accustomed to, he would not have made the statement that we rode from twenty to forty miles to attend meetings on the Sabbath. The brethren of Vermont do feel that there is great importance attached to keeping the seventh day holy. We would therefore cheerfully invite Elder Himes, and all who see us in danger of transgressing the fourth commandment, to admonish us.

As to the charge of chopping wood when at home on the Sabbath, I have not heard, to my recollection, of a case of the kind among all the Sabbath-keepers who are in fellowship with the body. One case where an individual is said to have cut wood and cleaned clocks on the Sabbath, the person has not certainly for a year professed to be with us.

If any thing can be said to clear Elder Himes from falsehood in making the declaration that believers in the third angel's message generally made the Sabbath a day of visiting, I would gladly do it. I would say that some apology might be made if possible, that Sabbath-keepers often get together on that day to worship God where there is but few of them; but have never heard of any Sabbath-keepers visiting their neighbors generally, much less that the body of Sabbath-keepers are in the habit of visiting.

As to the assertion that Bro. S. W. Rhodes has been, and is now deep in spiritual wifery, I never heard of anything of the kind until Bro. Everts informed me that Elder Himes charged him with it. Of the many reports and accusations put in circulation in Vermont, against believers in the third angel's message, Bro. Rhodes has had to bear his share, as he has occasionally been in the State. We have often heard of his being harsh, severe and uncharitable, and sometimes abusive to his opponents; but must confess that the charge filed in against Bro. Rhodes, by Elder Himes is unlike what we have taken to be his character.

We would in all good feeling call upon Elder Himes for his evidence of the truth of these charges. We wish him to call the names of individuals. If the charges will stand against the body, they may be sustained against individuals. We hope no degree of delicacy will prevent plainness on this subject, that we may find where these Sabbath-breakers are, and where those are who hold to "spiritual wifery." Certain it is that these charges preferred against us will do us no good unless they enable us to find the transgressors. We hope if these sins have not passed under his immediate view, but if he has relied upon his friends in Vermont for information, he will not for this excuse himself, but will mention the names of his informants, that we may inquire of them; for we who believe in the third angel's message, here, even in Vermont, do desire to search out all our sins that we may get rid of them. We want the truth that we may be sanctified through the truth. "Thy word is truth." Nothing else will satisfy us but light from the word of God. We do verily believe that when the third angel ceases sounding, mercy to hypocrites and sinners is gone forever.

Waterbury, Vt., Dec. 1st, 1853.

A True Solace.

WHEN the shadow of this world is deep, and the heart is sad through unspoken grief, it is a solace to know that Jesus is near. When wasting care makes life a burden, and heavy thoughts oppress the spirit, how priceless is the truth that we shall soon be changed, and caught up to be for ever with the Lord. When we are hopelessly separated from those we love, and the chill of worldly friendship surrounds us, how inspiring is the expectation of the return of Him whom our soul loveth. When the sleep of death enchains the lovely and the cherished, and the tomb answereth not the wail of the mourner, how sweet is the voice from heaven, "Behold I am the resurrection and the life, and I come quickly." Yes, the precious promise of the immediate coming of Jesus is the true and only solace of these degenerate times, and the balm for every wound. It is the hidden spring of peace within many a weary breast, and supports the trembling feet of those who are ready to perish through oppression and woe. There is no path so dreary, no cup so bitter, and no cell so dark with despair, but that this glory can illuminate and sweeten with a joy unspeakable. Who then among the weary children of earth will not hail such a hope? Who will not exult in such a prospect, and lift up the head and rejoice, because redemption draweth nigh? —Mid. Cry, 1844.

Distinction between the Sabbath of the Lord and the sabbaths of the Jews.

BY WILLIAM MILLER.

[THE following remarks are from the pen of Wm. Miller. Bro. M. was an advocate of the change of the Sabbath, though he took this for granted, without attempting to show any divine precept in its favor. But his views respecting the perpetuity of the Lord's Sabbath and its distinction from the sabbaths of the Jews are none the less truthful for that.]

"I say, and I believe I am supported by the Bible, that the moral law was never given to the Jews as a people exclusively, but they were for a season the keepers of it in charge. And through them the law, oracles and testimony, have been handed down to us: see Paul's clear reasoning in Rom. ii, iii, iv, on that point. Then, says the objector, we are under the same obligation to keep the sabbaths of weeks, months and years, that the Jews were. No, sir; you will observe that these were not included in the decalogue; they were attachments, added by reason of transgression, until the seed should come, to whom the promise of one eternal day, or Sabbath of rest, was made. "Therefore there remaineth a keeping of a Sabbath to the people of God." Only one kind of Sabbath was given to Adam, and one only remains for us. See Hosea ii, 11. "I will cause all her mirth to cease, her feast days, her new-moons, and her sabbaths, and all her solemn feasts." All the Jewish sabbaths did cease, when Christ nailed them to his cross. Col. ii, 14-17. "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross; and having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it. Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new-moon, or of the sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ." These were properly called Jewish sabbaths. Hosea says, "her sabbaths." But the Sabbath of which we are speaking, God calls "my Sabbath." Here is a clear distinction between the creation Sabbath and the ceremonial. The one is perpetual; the others were merely shadows of good things to come, and are limited in Christ."—Miller's Life and Views, pages 161, 162.

"Neither on the Sabbath-day." Because it was to be kept as a day of rest, and no servile work was to be done on that day, nor would it be right for them to travel on that day. Christ has in this place sanctioned the Sabbath, and clearly shows us our duty, to let no trivial circumstance cause us to break the law of the Sabbath. Yet how many, who profess to believe in Christ, at this present day, make it a point to visit, travel, and feast on this day! What a false hearted profession must that person make who can thus treat with contempt the moral law of God, and despise the precepts of the Lord Jesus! We may here learn our obligation to remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy." Exposition of Matt. xxiv, p. 18. Sec. Ad. Library, Vol. I.

Influence of the Sabbath upon true Religion.

1. Its ministrations are the most effectual of all agencies in setting and keeping before the minds of men, that grand, essential element of all piety, the character of the living and true God.

2. By separating a portion of time to sacred uses, it furnishes ample opportunity for that contemplation of Divine truth, and that public and private worship of God, which is so much needed by men, and which most effectually promotes the cause of true religion.

3. The holy Sabbath itself, as an institution of God, is a constantly recurring symbol of the divine authority, and by its regular return impresses a sense of that authority on the minds of men, and thus keeps in view the character and government of God.

4. Clear apprehension of the will and claims of God are indispensable to the nourishment of true piety in the soul. The Sabbath furnishes it by its services, which constantly press on men's attention the duties they owe to their Maker.

5. The Sabbath furnishes constant and abundant fuel for the fire of piety in the heart, by the great variety of religious instructions it provides, such as those from the pulpit, in the family circle, in the Sabbath School; and the opportunity it gives for the study of the holy Scriptures, and other religious works.

6. The Sabbath, by its sacred stillness and repose, shadows forth the eternal rest of heaven, and powerfully attracts the thoughts of men to that blessed world, and thus aids the soul in its preparation for it.

7. No fact is better established than that a faithful and conscientious observer of the Sabbath has always been accompanied by a flourishing state of piety, and the spirit of sincere and heartfelt devotion to God.

8. On the other hand, it is no less true, that with a declining regard for the Sabbath, there has always been a decline in the spirit and power of vital piety; the withered and decaying graces of Christianity showing that one of the grand agencies of their nourishment and strength has been taken away. A Sabbath-breaking community has always been characterized by mournful violations of other of the laws of God, and is most obviously a stranger to the spirit and power of true piety.

9. Multitudes of the most distinguished saints have recorded their experience of the well kept Sabbath's powerful influence in sustaining the life and the vigor of piety in their minds, affirming that laxness, or fidelity to Sabbath obligations, has depressed or raised the tone of religious emotion in the soul.

10. That the Sabbath powerfully sustains the cause of vital piety, appears from the fact that all who are enemies to such piety, are hostile to the Sabbath, and spare no pains to level in the dust that holy institution, because of its power to sustain and promote true religion; just as dear to us as are the interests of pure and undefiled religion in our world, so dear should be the holy Sabbath of the Lord. Vital godliness lives and flourishes with the honored Sabbath; languishes and dies with the disregarded day of the Lord.—Boston Traveler.

THE ADVENT, THE NEXT PROPHETIC EVENT

BY S. BLISS.

1. From the fulfillment of the prophecies.

"THEY are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come. Wherefore, let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." 1 Cor. x, 11, 12.

1. History informs us that Babylon, Media-Per-sia, Grecia and Rome, the four universal empires, symbolized by the gold, silver, brass and iron, of Nebuchadnezzar's image, [Dan. ii.] have successively arisen as predicted; so that we are now at the very toes of the image, which symbolize the divided state of the Roman empire, in the days of which, the God of heaven will set up a kingdom, symbolized by the stone smiting the image on its feet, and dashing it to pieces, and which will destroy all those kingdoms and stand forever.

2. History not only shows a fulfillment of the predictions of these great kingdoms, which are also symbolized in the 7th of Daniel by four beasts,—a lion, bear, leopard, and nondescript beast, but also the fulfillment of the more minute predictions in that chapter respecting them; the division of the Grecian empire into four kingdoms, and the division of the Roman into ten, with the coming up of the Papal horn among the ten, which subdued three of them, and has continued its time: so that we only wait for the judgment to sit, when these kingdoms will be given to the burning flame, and the saints of the Most High will take the kingdom, to possess the kingdom forever and ever.

3. History shows the fulfillment of the same events predicted in the 8th of Daniel; so that we are only waiting for the exceeding great horn to be broken without hand.

4. History shows a fulfillment of all the events to precede the judgment predicted in the 11th and 12th of Daniel; so that we only look for the standing up of Michael, the time of trouble, the resurrection of the dead, and the glory which is to follow.

5. History shows the fulfillment of all the events predicted in the 24th of Matt. to precede the sign of the Son of man in heaven; so that we only wait for Christ to come, as the lightning shining from the east even unto the west.

6. History shows the fulfillment of the events predicted by St. Paul, in 2 Thess. ii, to transpire before that day—the falling away, and the revelation of that wicked one; so that we only wait for the Man of sin to be destroyed by the brightness of Christ's coming.

7. We find, by the historical fulfillment of the events predicted in Rev. i, ii and iii, that we are living in the Laodicean state of the church, which is to be spewed out of the mouth.

8. We find by the historical fulfillment of the events predicted in Rev. viii v, and vi, that we are living under the sixth seal, at the close of which, the wicked will call upon the rocks and mountains to fall upon them, to hide them from the wrath of the Lamb.

9. We learn by the historical fulfillment of the events predicted in Rev. viii, ix, x, and xi, that we are at the close of the sounding of the sixth trumpet, when the seventh is to sound quickly; and when it shall begin to sound, the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ.

10. We find by the historical fulfillment of the events predicted in Rev. xii, xiii, and xiv, that we only wait for the angels to reap the harvest of the earth, and to cast the wicked into the great wine-press of the wrath of God.

12. We learn by the fulfillment of all the discursive prophecies but those which have reference to the scenes of the last day and the glory to follow, that the Advent of Christ is the next expected event.

11. THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES ADMONISH US THAT THE LORD IS AT THE VERY DOORS.

"But can ye not discern the signs of the times?" Matt. xvi, 3.

1. The gospel of the kingdom is now being preached in all the world; which was to be a witness to all nations that the end should then be. See Matt. xxiv, 14.

2. Many are running to and fro, and knowledge respecting the end is being increased, as was predicted it should be at the time of the end. Daniel xii, 4.

3. The increase of riches, and heaping up treasure together, which was to be done "for the last days." James v, 1-3.

4. The unwillingness to hear sound doctrine, and the substitution of fables. 2 Tim. iv, 1-4.

5. The multiplicity of scoffers, who walk after their own lusts, and say, Where is the promise of his coming? 2 Peter iii, 3, 4.

6. The perilous time spoken of in 2 Tim. iii, 1-7.

7. The departing from the faith, predicted by Paul, 1 Tim. iv, 1-3.

8. The multiplicity of false teachers who make merchandise of the gospel. 2 Pet. ii, 1-3.

9. The abundance of mockers who walk after their own ungodly lusts. Jude iv, 19.

10. The universal cry of peace and safety. 1 Thess. v, 2, 3.

11. The prevalence of wickedness, so that it is indeed as it was in Sodom and before the flood. Luke xvii, 26-29.

12. The absence of faith that Christ will ever make his personal appearance. Luke xviii, 8.

13. The wonders seen by this generation in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire and pillars of smoke. Joel ii, 30.

14. The darkening of the sun May 19th, 1780, and of the moon the night following. Matt. xxiv, 29.—Rev. vi, 12.

15. The falling of the stars, Nov. 13, 1833, as a fig-tree casteth its untimely figs, when shaken of a mighty wind. Matt. xxiv, 29. Rev. vi, 13. * * *

Advent Tract, No. IV, PUBLISHED IN 1843.

ENDURANCE.

"He that endureth to the end shall be saved."

SEEMING that there are many of our dear brethren and sisters who, in keeping the commandments of God, have to endure a great deal of opposition and persecution, I thought to say a few words to such, by way of encouragement. Brethren, we are confident that we are living in the time when the kingdom of God is about to appear, and we desire to inherit it; but do we expect to find the way in which we are to walk, in order to gain admittance into this kingdom, a smooth way, without any briars or thorns in it? If we do, we will find our mistake; for "we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God;" [Acts xiv, 22;] and if we think we shall enter the kingdom without tribulation, we need not expect to be of that great number. which John saw stand before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; for "these are they which came out of great tribulation," &c. Rev. vii, 14. Do we think that merely to believe that we ought to keep all the commandments will secure for us an inheritance in this kingdom?

Let us see what our Lord says: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me." Luke ix, 23. What is it to follow Christ? When is one person said to be following in the footsteps of another? Is it not when he does the same works that the other did? Christ testifies that he kept his Father's commandments; [John xv, 10;] and if we would follow him, we also must keep the commandments. For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous. 1 John v, 3.

Again our Lord says, "He that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me." John x, 38. And the apostle James says, "Though a man say he hath faith, and have not works, it doth not profit: faith cannot save him." Again faith without works is dead. James ii, 14, 17, 26. Thus we see that though we believe in keeping the Sabbath, yet we must keep it whether we are persecuted for so doing or not; otherwise our faith is dead and cannot save us. Do we expect to become heirs of the kingdom, by violating God's holy commandments, for the sake of keeping peace in our house? I tell you nay! "Think not that I am come to send peace on the earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me." "If any man come to me, and hate not his father and mother, and wife, and children, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." Matt. x, 34-37; Luke xiv, 26. He rewe are taught that we must, (if need be,) forsake all, even our nearest friends, for the sake of following after Christ.

Brethren, do we prize the inheritance of the saints so highly that we are prepared to make such a sacrifice as is here required of us? If we do not, let me tell you, we are not Christ's disciples. Do we suppose that to keep the the commandments for a while, and then when persecution and oppression rage, to turn back, is going to secure this blessed inheritance for us? If we do, we will find our calculations to come very far short. Paul says, "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance, seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame." "For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries." "Now the just shall live by faith, but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul." Heb. vi, 4-6; x, 26, 27, 38, 39. Peter says, "For if, after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning. For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them." 2 Pet. ii, 20, 21. May the Lord help us to persevere unto the end. Says Jesus, "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." Rev. ii, 10. "Behold I come quickly, hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." Rev. iii, 11. Brethren, if we turn from the "holy commandment," we are sure to lose our crown, and some one else will take it.

Let us now see what we can find to encourage us to suffer patiently while on our pilgrimage in the enemy's land. There are very many promises that are precious to the true child of God. The Lord help us to lay hold of them with full assurance of faith.—Matt. v, 10-12. "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Rejoice and be exceedingly glad, for great is your reward in heaven; for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you." Rom. viii, 18. "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."

2 Cor. iv, 17. "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

2 Tim. ii, 12. "If we suffer, we shall also reign with him." 1 Pet. iv, 12, 13. "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy."

Matt. x, 22. "But he that endureth to the end shall be saved." 1 Pet. iii, 14. "But and if ye suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye; and be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled."

Luke xviii, 29, 30. "Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come, life everlasting."

By looking at these few promises contained in the Bible, we see that there are great inducements held out to encourage us. Our blessed Lord has gone to prepare a place for us, and he says, "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself: that where I am there ye may be also." John xiv, 3. O heart-cheering promise!—Jesus is coming for us. Yes, soon we expect to see have charged you, as well as me, to watch. There are many, however, who seem not to suspect danger of being unprepared; these do not watch with reference to the coming of Christ. Some make light of "going up." They may not have read with attention, that some who mocked at Elisha for saying that Elijah had "gone up," were cursed, and made a monument to the impious in after ages.

God has given us one illustration, in each dispensation of the revealed truth, that his people shall be "caught up to meet the Lord in the air." Enoch in the patriarchal, Elijah in the prophetic, and Jesus in the Christian; yet many make a mock of it. Though ministers may have read, they seem not to believe that even children were destroyed, who mocked at Elisha, for saying that Elijah had gone up. It was mocking God, who caused Elijah to go up. So now, it seems plain to me, that all who make light of second advent believers' "going up," mock God. One minister says that he had as lief be found fighting the doctrine of the second advent when Christ comes as not; but I forbear. "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." If my service be not accepted of the brethren, it will be, I trust, a relief to myself. I was constrained to write, and though I have written amid the interruptions occasioned by the sale of furniture and "breaking up," yet here are some of my convictions stated—some of my feelings portrayed.

As to spiritual influences, are they not what has been foretold? What cause can be assigned for Brother Brown's primitive experience? There are, I presume, thousands who have had an experience strongly resembling his. A ministering brother has just told me of a pious woman, who had essentially such an experience as Brother Brown's, and she was brought by nothing but the Word and Spirit to just those views I now entertain. She was deemed crazy, but the Spirit of God wrote this whole second advent doctrine on her soul; she has it all without human agency. If there are to be in the last days instances of remarkable outpourings of the Spirit, where are we to find them, if not among second advent believers? A child of six years old, when converted, told me the most interesting experience I ever heard; her whole soul was quickened, and she was a believer in her Lord's speedy coming. Now I should like to hear some of those who feel and act as if the Lord could not come yet, account for these spiritual influences, on any other principles than those by which "the rulers of the synagogue" accounted for Paul's experience—for the miracles of Jesus, &c. Account for them, my brethren, if possible, on any other principles than those by which Universalists and Infidels account for ordinary conversions. If insanity, mental imbecility, or the devil, be the cause of our experiences of truth, what is the cause of revivals? My brethren, let those engaged in them be your judges. This is a solemn truth. I feel awfully in view of the necessary conclusion to which these premises lead. You cannot justify opposition to that agency which cuts the soul loose from the world and fills it with the second advent, as well as "glory and God," except you virtually justify the Jewish rulers in opposing the apostles. Therefore, it is my solemn conviction, that you need beware, lest ye only behold, oppose and perish. It is true that there were miraculous powers attending Paul; but observe that is not the basis of my argument. The church has long regarded the argument derived from Paul's conversion, (it being sustained by the same kind of conversion in all parts of the world,) as a strong one. It has been urged as if irrefragable. If it be a good argument in any case, why not in the one before us? You observe that the argument is based only on spiritual influences. Every effect has an adequate cause; every direct spiritual effect has not only its adequate cause, but a cause of its own nature; as it is written, "Satan is not divided against Satan," nor can Jesus "deny himself." These eternal truths are not recognized by wicked men when they oppose the Holy Spirit's agency in the experience of the saints; nor do you, my brethren, when trifling with the same sort of agency in writing the second advent on the hearts of many. This Spirit is "not of the world;" if it was of the world, the world would love its own; but seeing it is not of the world, "therefore the world hateth it." All ministers who believe in the Lord's coming at hand, must be hated, or at least neglected. Those who believe, cannot, therefore, have the ordinary impulses to action, which worldly men have; they must have higher, holier impulses, derived from the Holy One, to separate from the spirit of this world, and wait, on scriptural principles, for the coming of Jesus to judgment.

Jesus solemnly inquired, "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Yet the masters in Israel are making the verification of this dreadful truth a reason for their continued unbelief. When unbelief is predicted to be a fearful token of his coming, many ministers, with an unbelieving world co-operate to create that token. Surely I have not mistaken the application of my text. Beware, lest in unbelief ye only wonder to perish.

Even though a definite period had not been named for the coming of the day of God, such are the general admonitions to be ready, to wait for, look for, and love his appearing, that no one can disregard them without infinite peril. Beware, then, beware, lest that come upon you which is spoken in the prophets.

Did you ever learn the whole name of Jesus? Rev. i, 8. "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come." The last clause, literally rendered, may read, The coming One. Faith respects him in his whole character. Many have spoken to me about preaching the gospel, not seeming to know that the gospel is the good news of the kingdom to come when Jesus shall appear. The gospel dispensation is not his kingdom, except in embryo in the hearts of his people, because, [Luke xix, 11-13,] "He spake a parable to them, because they thought the kingdom should immediately appear." The disciples were expecting the kingdom. Acts xvi. It shall be set up at his appearing; [2 Tim. iv, 1,] and we know, on the highest authority, that it cannot come till after the resurrection. 1 Cor. xv, 50. Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. No one will ever enter that glorious, everlasting kingdom, but by the resurrection, or a change equal to it.

Some want me to preach Jesus Christ and him crucified. Such, probably, do not know that he, who was the crucified One, is now The coming One. If we, my brethren, preach, and the people believe in Jesus as he is revealed, we shall both preach and have the people believe in the coming One. Beware how you omit to preach the coming of Jesus! By the terrible splendors of the Day of God, I charge you to preach the coming of Jesus. By your past remissness, I charge you to preach the coming of Jesus. By the doom of the unfaithful watchman and the unfaithful servant, I charge you to preach the coming of Jesus. To all, I say, in view of the opening judgment, repent, be baptized and believe in Jesus, the coming One. Amen!

THE DANGER.—At present, the greatest danger we can see among our friends, is that of slumbering while the Bridegroom tarries—imperceptibly falling into an awfully dangerous slumber, just before the Master appears. The symptoms of this slumbering, which may be more safely discovered in ourselves than in others, ought in itself to be hailed as the very last sign of the Bridegroom's sure approach. Are your prayers faint and feeble? Does your confidence begin to fail you? Is your voice tremulous, and lacking in energy? Do your footsteps reluctantly mark the way to the place of prayer? Are you slow to catch and send forth with increased life, the notes of praise falling from others' lips? Are you saying, "We trusted that it should have been?" Jesus that would have delivered his people ere this? If such are your exercises, and such your feeling, O hear His voice! "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken!" These very exercises of yours are recognized by the prophets, and by them, in connection with accompanying evidences, we may know the Bridegroom is near. See! O, see! that you are treading upon the last sands of probation. Arouse thee! Tarry not!—

THE REVIEW AND HERALD.

"Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

ROCHESTER, THIRD-DAY, JAN. 10, 1854.

"My Lord Delayeth His Coming."

AN evil servant says this, in his heart. "But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming," &c. Matt. xxiv, 48. The case of this evil servant has been supposed to apply to those religious teachers who entirely rejected and opposed the doctrine of the Second Advent, as taught by Wm. Miller, and held by the Advent body. It has been the unanimous opinion of those looking for the Lord's second coming, that the prophetic discourse of Matt. xxiv, touches the important events with which the church of Christ is connected, from the First Advent down to the Second. First, the destruction of Jerusalem; second, the 1260 prophetic days of tribulation to the church; third, the signs of the Second Advent, in the Sun, Moon and Stars; and, fourth, the two classes of servants; one giving meat in due season; the other smiting his fellow-servant, &c. This position, in the main, is certainly correct.

But we think there has been a mistake in the application of the case of the evil servant. He does not represent those ministers who have never looked for the second coming of Christ. Those who have not expected Christ's coming, would have no occasion for saying that he delayed his coming. But those who have looked for him, and have been disappointed as to the time of his coming, and are brought into a state of severe trial of faith, are certainly in great danger of acting the part of the evil servant. We do not see good reasons for applying this text to those teachers who have not expected the Lord; while the application to those who have in heart backslidden from the Advent faith, is natural, and evidently correct.

Luke xii, 42-45, is good proof that the evil servant was once wise and faithful. "But and if that servant [who had been giving meat in due season] say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming," &c. This evidently illustrates the case of those who once fed the flock of Christ with the doctrine of the Advent in its purity, but have since lost their faith, zeal and love. Again, the unfaithful servant smites a fellow-servant. This clearly illustrates the case of those who have been fellow-laborers in the Advent cause, but are now backslidden in heart. What they say in the heart is seen by their acts.

The Advent message, in fulfillment of the first angel, [Rev. xiv,] arrested the attention of a goodly number of the Lord's ministers, who went forth with the glad tidings of Jesus' coming, cheering the hearts of many, and with this bread of heaven, fed the flock. The time of expectation passed, and a period of severe trials has followed, in which many have lost their faith. Some profess faith in the Advent, whose acts show that they are saying in their heart, My Lord delayeth his coming. But a portion have held fast the Advent movement, as the work of God. And as they have moved down the track of prophecy from the first and second messages to the third, they now see the best of reasons why they should still hold fast the Advent movement, and look for the Lord's soon coming. The Son of man on the white cloud to reap the harvest of the earth is the next scene in the prophecy. To keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus is clearly shown to be present duty. While the event to occur at the close of the 2300 prophetic days of Daniel, is shown to be, not the burning of the earth, but the finishing work of salvation by our Great High Priest in heaven, the nature of our disappointment is clearly seen, and the past movement with its disappointment, is explained. This view harmonizes with the past and present, and gives certainty to the glorious future. Those who take this position can say with full assurance; The Lord is coming. Such can feed the Lord's household with meat in due season. Where, we inquire, may the faithful servant be found, if not among such?

But it is a painful fact that a large portion of the Advent people, and Advent ministers, have lost their faith in the soon coming of the Lord. They may still cherish the doctrine of Christ's personal Advent, the literal resurrection of the just, prior to the millennium, and the true inheritance of the saints; but faith in the immediate coming of the day of God, they have lost. The past Advent movement they consider a mistake, and one after another of the pillars of the Advent faith they have pulled down. This apostasy has been a gradual, deceptive work, so gradual, and so carefully managed by the Advent papers, that the brethren who have lost their faith can hardly tell how and where they lost it, yet it is gone.

For several years these unfaithful servants have been saying in their hearts, "My Lord delayeth his coming," as their acts have denied their profession of faith in his immediate coming, and they have been overturning one strong point after another of the "original Advent faith." They have continued their profession of faith in the immediate Advent of Christ, while their acts have shown that they were saying in their hearts, "My Lord delayeth his coming." More recently, however, they have been speaking it out in unmistakable terms. Under the head of Original Advent Faith, the Advent Harbinger for Dec. 24th says:

"Two prominent items of this faith were the darkening of the sun, A. D. 1780, as a fulfillment of Matt. xxiv, 29; and the connection of the 70 weeks of Dan. ix, with the 2300 days of Dan. viii.

"In answering L. T. Cunningham's inquiries relative to the connection of the 70 weeks with the 2300 days, Mr. Bliss remarks:

"We argued their connection as evidence that the longer period would expire in 1843-4. If those periods commence at a common epoch, it can no more be denied that the longer one ended at the time named, than that the sun rose this morning. But the event predicted to follow at that end not having transpired, it follows that the supposition of their connection was an error. . . . The passing of ten years has demonstrated that it [the 70 weeks period] was not cut off from the 2300; and therefore the supposition that it was, has been disproved as sophistical."

"By the abandonment of this last item of the 'original advent faith,' its fundamental principle is given up; for the connection of these two periods was the distinguishing point between Mr Miller's faith and that entertained by other more common theories on the prophetic periods. And the abandonment of the dark day in 1780 as a sign of the Lord's near coming we also consider a wide departure from the 'original advent faith.' . . . We hope the Herald will continue its departures from the 'original advent faith,' until it shall be freed from error, and become an herald and defender of the whole truth."

As the Harbinger has renounced the Advent faith, why should it longer profess to be the Advent Harbinger? Why not take some appropriate name, and not profess to be what it is not? Its readers were once Advent believers. Has their faith been gradually taken from them, in the downward course of the Harbinger, so that they have not strength to resist the temptation to renounce the faith altogether? We fear for many. May God have mercy, and save the sincere.

The Advent Herald has taken a fearful position relative to the 2300 days and the Sanctuary of Dan. viii. The assertion that "the passing of ten years has demonstrated that" the 70 weeks "was not cut off from the 2300 days," is untrue and presumptuous. If it could be shown that the Sanctuary is the earth, and that its cleansing is the burning of the earth, then the assertion might be correct. But as the Sanctuary is the true tabernacle of God in heaven, the passing of ten years demonstrates no such thing. It has led us to search and see that the oversight was in the event to occur at the end of the days, and not in the time.

We like the remark of the Herald, that, "If those periods [70 weeks and 2300 days] commenced at a common epoch, it can no more be denied that the longer one ended at the time named, [1843-4.] than that the sun rose this morning." And we would remark that the Herald, in supposing that the Bible teaches that the Sanctuary is to be cleansed by fire when Christ comes, is as certainly in error as that the sun will set to-night. Let the Herald take the scriptural view of the Sanctuary, and it will not be under the necessity of throwing down this main pillar of the "original Advent faith."

The position of the religious press, in shutting out the doctrine of the Advent, was considered fearful ten years since; but that of Advent papers, in shutting out the truth of the Sanctuary, which harmonizes the past, seems a hundred fold more fearful. Rather than to advance one step on this question, which, when taken, brings one to the full light and confidence of the Advent faith, the Herald seems to choose to draw back, and overturn every strong point of the "original Advent faith." How can its downward course lead otherwise than to perdition? May God open the eyes of his fainting, dying people to the course of these unfaithful servants, lest they be led to draw back finally to perdition. Heb. x, 35-39.

There are two more particulars relative to the unfaithful servant which we here notice. First, he smites his fellow-servant who is attending to his duty to the household. This, in a most striking manner, illustrates the cruel and wicked opposition of unfaithful Advent ministers, and Advent papers, to those who adhere to the main principles of the "original Advent faith," and also teach the observance of all the commandments of God. Second, he eats and drinks with the drunken. This also illustrates the condition of those ministers who have backslidden from the Advent faith, and are now united with the world in spirit, and in opposition to the present truth. They were once separate from the spirit, customs and love of this world, and called loudly to the flock to come out from these things; but many of them have gone back, and are leading the flock down to death. They are united with those who are drunken with the spirit of the world in opposing the most sacred truths of God's word. From the Advent minister, down through various classes, to the veriest drunkard, you will hear the Lord's Holy Day reproachfully called, The Old Jewish Sabbath! And its observers are reproached and beaten, because they teach and observe the fourth commandment.

Many of the selections, as well as original articles, found in these Advent papers show their union with those drunken with the spirit of this age of apostasy. For an illustration of this fact, see the article entitled, New York City Asleep, in the Harbinger for Jan. 7th, taken from the Tribune.

If the Harbinger was what it professes to be, the Harbinger of the Advent, and if it wished to present a sign of the last days, by showing that the spirit and moral taste of this wicked and adulterous generation is as in the days of Lot and Noah, then it might give the article from the Tribune. But for aught we can learn, the Harbinger gives it as a choice selection to suit the taste of its readers.

KEEP AWAKE.

It may seem almost unnecessary, to those who are unacquainted with the devices of the great enemy of the christian, to warn those who profess to be expecting the revelation of him who will appear to the surprise and eternal ruin of all who have not their loins girt about with truth, and watching earnestly, steadily, and patiently for his appearing, of the fearful danger of falling asleep. Would to God it were unnecessary. But painful facts convince us that even Adventists need the gospel tocsin continually sounding in their ears. We live upon enchanted ground, where none can boast of security; but those whose aim is eternal life, are incessantly exposed to the wiles of a malicious and subtle foe. There is not so much danger of falling before the attacks of the open, avowed enemies around us, as of yielding to the pleasing allurements, and being overcome by the deceptive stratagems of him, who transforms himself into an "angel of light." And in view of this imminent peril, we are solemnly bound, as we discover the snares laid for the feet of our fellow pilgrims, to raise the warning voice lest their blood be required at our hands. Feeling this, duty requires me to point out what appear to be a few of the dangers to which the lovers of Jesus' appearing are exposed.—A few only can now be touched upon, but they are seen to be traps in which some unwary souls have been, it is to be feared, already ensnared. Heaven grant such a speedy deliverance!

1. Beware of resting easy with a theoretical knowledge of what you confidently believe to be truth, without reducing it to constant practice. This is a rock upon which many an ill-fated bark has split. To know the truth will only aggravate our guilt, unless its life and energy is experienced in the soul. We must act as well as talk truth.

2. Beware of supposing yourself in a safe state, because you are associated with many holy souls, and are fellowshipped by them.—Is there not great danger here? Let us remember that others may think we are in a fair way to heaven, when God sees we are in the broad road to perdition! In a spiritual meeting, through sympathy, we may catch the fire of those around us, and so be led to believe that our own hearts are right in the sight of God. Look out for deception!

3. Beware, when listening to a searching truth, of applying it en masse! Would it not be better to inquire, "Lord, is it I?"

4. Beware of supposing that because we live so near the close of time, it is of no use to employ our talents, property, &c., in trying to diffuse light and truth. Jesus says, "Occupy till I come."

5. Beware of excusing yourself for not being more zealous in God's cause, by saying, "It is such a trying time that it is hard to live a christian life. Such can only be the language of blind unbelief. "As thy day is, so shall thy strength be."

6. Beware of being overcharged with the cares of this life. In this business age, carefully avoid imbibing its spirit. Satan may present what may appear to be a plausible motive, for striving after the 'filthy lucre' of this world. He may suggest the idea that with it you can spread light; but it may prove but a passage way to death.

Thus a few sources of danger have been presented. There is one rule by which we can determine the nature of any idea that may be brought before our minds. The inquiry should be instituted, what effect does it produce upon the life? What are its legitimate fruits? If it gives license to slumber, if it takes our eye from the present truth, the immediate coming of Jesus, it is most evidently one of Satan's opiates. His main endeavors will now be to induce the child of God to slumber. Let us keep upon the watch! It is no time for the christian mariner to slumber, while tossed upon the tempestuous wave, and the black clouds around, filled with fury, are just ready to beat upon his little bark! It is no time for the gospel soldier to close his eyes, and fold his hands, when the battle rages the most fiercely, and more especially in the final, decisive struggle. If we sleep now, it is to be feared, we shall never again awake, until the shrill trump which will startle into life the pious dead, shall break upon the affrighted ear.—Selected.

— "Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him.

"But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul." Heb. x, 28, 39.

From Bro. Cornell.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—I have been laboring in this Village a short time past with good result. There is a large congregation of seventh-day Baptists here. They kindly opened their meeting-house for lectures on the prophecies. There was a general attendance, and great interest manifested. Many are searching diligently. Some have already decided "that these things are so." I have not seen in any place a more general inquiry, and so many warm friends of truth, since I have been in the message. There has been calls for lectures in five different neighborhoods since I came here, not far from this place. When will all the present calls be supplied? O Lord speed the work! I expect to spend five or six weeks more in this State. I am now about starting northward in search of the lecturing brethren.

As ever, onward in the truth.

From Bro. Hutchins.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—Since my last I have returned to Potter Co., Pa., and find that the cause of truth is still progressing here. The interest manifested by the friends to learn the evidences of our faith, when here before, appears to increase. Several requests for meetings have been sent us, where we have not yet had time to go. "The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few." Our meetings last Sabbath and First-day were held here. The brethren came in from this vicinity, and our hearts were greatly encouraged on meeting with several of the dear brethren and sisters who have recently embraced the Sabbath truth. O may the Lord strengthen their hearts, and prepare them for a glorious and triumphant victory over the enemy of all righteousness. Quite a number of attentive hearers were also present.

Ten or twelve have already given their names for the Review, which I think is read with prayerful attention, and we have reason to believe is accomplishing much good.

Many of our publications (books and tracts) which you afford at so small an expense, are taken by those desirous to read on the subject of the message of the third angel.

I now dispose of more books than when gratuitously distributed, and I am confident with as great, if not greater satisfaction on the part of those who purchase them.

Bro. Ingraham I expect will be here this week.

Yours in hope,
Ulysses, Pa., Feb. 21st, 1854.

A. S. HUTCHINS.

From Bro. Hebner.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—I have thought what a blessing it was from God to us, who are so widely separated from those of like precious faith, and have not the privilege of the gospel ministry of the messengers of God, who are proclaiming the third angel's message, that he has opened another way by which his truth can be communicated to us. The Review comes a welcome messenger, laden with truth, and communications from the dear saints scattered abroad. I do rejoice that God has said, "And I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you face to face. Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord God. And I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant." Eze. xx, 35-37. His reason for bringing ancient Israel into the wilderness, he says, was to try them. "And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments or no." Deut. viii, 2. God is about bringing us into the wilderness of the people to try us and to prove us and to know what is in our hearts, and to know whether we would keep his commandments or no, taught in the third angel's message—the last message mixed with mercy that ever will be proclaimed to this world.

The church here have been under severe trial, but we feel thankful to God that we have been able to confess our faults to one another, and thus fulfill the law of Christ. The church, we trust, will become more healthy and again begin to breathe the free atmosphere of heaven. We all join in the Macedonian cry, praying the Lord of the harvest to send laborers into his harvest; for the harvest is great and the laborers are few.

There seems to be quite an interest existing in the minds of some individuals in this place, with regard to the Spirit Manifestations as they are increasing quite fast here. There seems to be quite a number who appear to manifest a desire to hear for themselves, and it seems to me that if some of God's servants could feel it duty to come and present the truth, and the whole truth, before the minds of the people, that some would be added to the commandment-keepers—such as shall be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. May the Lord speed the messengers, in my sincere prayer.

Yours striving to be an overcomer through the blood of the Lamb and the word of my testimony.

From Sister Bovee.

DEAR FRIEND:—I have enclosed one dollar, and wish you to continue sending the Review. I have taken the Advent papers from the first, until I came here which was six years since, and then I knew no way to get them. Last Fall, my beloved Neice, Urasa Bucklin, returning from the west, called on me, and said I should have them six months. They have come and the time is run out. It is nothing new that I believe we live in the last days. I can truly say, "Thy kingdom come." I believe the time is near when Christ will take his weary children home. I should be glad to say much, but age and infirmities prevent. You will defer all criticisms when I tell you I shall be eighty-five years of age, next May. I was eleven years old the dark day. I feel it will be a joyful day when Christ takes his redeemed children home. I have a strong hope I shall be one.

May the Lord strengthen his saints while here to do his will, is the prayer of your unworthy friend and well-wisher.

MARY BOVEE.

Euclid, N. Y., March 1st, 1854.

From Sister Strong.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—We are living in a time when the enemy is on the alert, deceiving and drawing away God's children, just now in the sealing time, and all who are not found watching are liable to be drawn away, and to be taken captive by him at his will. Among the fables of the last days, the New-Time theory is presented before the weak and unwary, and they are falling a prey to the powerful deceptions of the adversary. But the Lord has promised that when the enemy comes in like a flood, that the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him. Yes, bless the Lord, he is soon going to say to the weak, Be strong, and to him that is of a fearful heart, Be of good courage; for his salvation is near to come, and his glory to be revealed, when the light of the moon shall be as the sun, and the light of the sun shall be seven-fold.

Now brethren and sisters, let us gird on the whole armor, and be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace. There is no time now to delay. It is no time now to be living at the halves. If Baal be god serve him; but if the Lord be God serve him. The separating work is now going on. The dividing line is being drawn between the righteous and the wicked, and between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not.

May the Lord set to his helping hand is the prayer of your unworthy servant.

FRANCES STRONG.

Milton, N. Y., Feb. 27th, 1854.

From Sister Ford.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—Since the Stowe Conference, last Autumn which I attended, I have been striving to obey God in keeping all of his commandments. For months previous to that meeting, I was firmly convinced that the seventh day was the only Sabbath of the Bible; but still I could not make up my mind to bear the reproach of keeping it.

Perhaps it would not be out of place, to give you a brief history of my experience, and the manner of my coming to a knowledge of the truth. Nearly two years ago, I received intelligence that some relatives of mine, residing in Vermont, had changed their views in regard to the Sabbath, and instead of keeping the first, had commenced keeping the seventh-day. I was surprised, and could hardly credit the report; but yet I had a desire to know something about it. They were friends that I loved, and respected, and I thought that there must be some strong reasons for their embracing so strange a belief. I visited them shortly after, they pointed out the reasons of their faith, and asked me to read my Bible more, and see if their views and the word harmonized. I read my Bible, but with the expectation of finding sufficient proof to overthrow their belief. But I found myself sadly disappointed. It seemed to me that every word I read, went to prove that they were right. I left them, and returned to this place again; but I could not forget the poor, despised Sabbath-keepers. Up to this time I had never made a profession of religion; but I began to think of the importance of having a hope in Christ as never before. I commenced going to church, prayed to God for forgiveness of past sins, and thought that I experienced a change of heart. But I was not happy as I thought the young converts ought to be. When I read my Bible the commandments would come up, and I could not feel right. I was taken on trial in the Methodist church. I saw so much pride, popularity, and fashion among the professed Christians, as to cause the inquiry sometimes to arise, Are they the true disciples of Jesus: I had always thought that religion, instead of making persons popular, would cause them to be more humble, meek, and lowly. I was truly desirous to become a true-hearted Christian: yet I felt so unhappy, that I doubted the sincerity of my own heart. I prayed to God to direct me aright, and thanks be to his name, he heard my prayer. I was called very suddenly to return to Vermont with a sister of mine who was dangerously ill. Once again amongst the Sabbath-keepers, I could not longer withstand the truth. The more I investigated the subject, the brighter the light shone on the Sabbath. I attended several meetings, all of which tended to strengthen my views, especially the one at Stowe. What I there witnessed confirmed me in the truth of the position we occupy. I resolved by the grace of God assisting me, to strive to keep the commandments, that I might have a right to the tree of Life. And never have I regretted it, though I have met with temptations, and trials on every side. Friends have reproached and entreated, yet the grace of God has enabled me to stand. I know of no one of like faith in this place, and brethren and sisters, I claim your prayers; O when you kneel at the throne of grace forget not the Lambs of the flock. Remember their youth and inexperience, and pray the more earnestly for them.

From your sister striving for the Kingdom.

ELIZABETH H. FORD.

Lowell, Mass., Feb. 19th, 1854.

From Sister Wheeler.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—As I have been much comforted by reading the communications in the Review, I would like to say to the dear brethren and sisters scattered abroad, I am still trying to keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus. And hope to overcome by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of my testimony.

Within the last year I have passed through some severe trials; but I feel to thank and praise our dear Heavenly Father that he has led me on thus far, and not forsaken me; and for the sweet peace I enjoy in trying to keep his commandments. And says the Apostle, by this we may know that we love the children of God, when we love God and keep his commandments. I do feel to rejoice that I know that I love the children of God; and that I have chosen to suffer affliction with the people of God rather than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. But I feel solemn, in view of the time in which we live. The third angel's message is sounding. The last message without any mixture of mercy. Our Great High Priest is finishing his work in the Sanctuary, and he will soon put off his priestly attire, and take his seat upon the white cloud; and then, O then is the solemn declaration, he, that is filthy let him be filthy still, and he that is holy let him be holy still. In view of what is before us, my heart cries out, shall I be able to stand. Blessed are the pure in heart (says our dear Saviour) for they shall see God. O praise the Lord for his sure promises. He will never leave nor forsake us. If we do his commandments, we may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.

There is a little band of Sabbath-keepers in this place, who are striving to overcome and gain the kingdom. There has been much opposition and prejudice here, against our views; but I feel to rejoice that some are beginning to search to see if these things are so. Within a few weeks, four have decided to keep the Sabbath of the Lord. We were favored with the labors of Brn. Sperry and Buck, according to their appointment, and we trust their labors will not be in vain in this place. Prejudice appears to be removed, and we are satisfied that a number are convinced of the truth. It is a matter of great consolation that the Lord has set his hand to the work of gathering the remnant of his people, and I can truly say,

"O how I long to see that day,
When the redeemed shall come
To Zion, clad in white array,
Their blissful, happy home."

Yours striving for the kingdom.

THE REVIEW AND HERALD.

"Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

ROCHESTER, THIRD-DAY, MAY. 2, 1854.

Go Thou and do Likewise.

BROTHER and sister R. called on us the other day, as they were on their way to Alden, Ill. They told us that they made no profession of religion until they heard the present truth preached; and that in a short time after they received the truth, they dismissed tobacco, tea and coffee, and resolved to give to support the cause of truth, as much as they usually paid for these things. They recently sent us $5, for the Review, and left $5, more, which is but a part of what they have done for the cause, and if we understood them, they think they have now given about as much as it usually cost them for these needless things.

Many of our readers have laid aside these idols, especially the filthy weed; but others still cling to them. Some are so very poor that they cannot hand the messengers of truth even a few shillings, or pay for their own paper; but they contrive to raise from five to fifteen dollars a year for tobacco, tea and coffee!

What looks better on a Christian's table for common use than a glass of cold water! What can be better! This pure bounty of heaven can be enjoyed by the poor as well as the rich; and received without injuring the constitution, or mind. Reader, you can but admire the course pursued by Bro. and Sr. R.; well, go thou and do likewise.

THE SECOND ADVENT.

It is important that we should believe the testimony of the Holy Scriptures on this as well as on other subjects. But their testimony is one thing, and the opinion of commentators another thing, often very different. It has not pleased the Holy Ghost to give us prophecy, generally plain and easy to be understood. Thus it is written, Dan. xii, 10, "None of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand." The apostles were solicitous of their Lord, after his resurrection, of the prospect before them; but he rather seems to rebuke their curiosity, saying, "It is not for you to know the times, or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power." Acts i, 7. Daniel seems not to have understood much of his own revelations. I would not undervalue prophecy, nor the proper study of the prophets. But a wise man will here be very solicitous, for the wisdom that cometh from above. He will remember that God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. So far as I can understand, the second advent or coming of Jesus Christ, must have taken place in the time of the generation that lived when Christ came in the flesh; for Matthew, Mark and Luke record the most positive assertion of Jesus Christ that that generation should not pass, till all those things should be fulfilled, among which was his coming "in power and great glory." He saith not "in flaming fire taking vengeance," &c. Lo I am with you, said he to his apostles; and wonderful works followed their ministry. Multitudes were converted. The most formidable strong holds of Satan were demolished. The pride of the Jews was laid in the dust and the gospel preached and believed by many, in every known part of the world. Holy martyrs, (the seed of the church,) were multiplied and new converts took their place for Christ to live or to die. Happy time! Stephen saw the Lord at the time of his martyrdom, and doubtless many thousands that died for the testimony of Jesus Christ, found the same Jesus Christ, a present help in time of trouble. Then religion was the business of believers, and persecution and death no very unexpected or unwelcome visitants.

But there seems to be another advent, another coming of the Lord. 2 Thess. i, 7, 8; 2 Pet. iii, 4-10; 1 Cor. iii, 13, 15. This advent is generally thought to be future, and at the end of the world, and close upon the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men. All this may be correct. I will not dispute about it at least. But there seems to be evidence in prophecy, that the human family are to continue multiplying, till at least a thousand generations shall have existed. See Deut. vii, 9; 1 Chron. xvi, 15; Ps. cv, 8. Luke reckons, from Adam to Christ, only some 76 generations, and from that time till now, can hardly be more than 100 generations. There then remain some 800 generations yet to come, and how many more I learn not. I would entreat disciples of the blessed Jesus, not to be wise above that which is written, nor to be over curious to know what is hidden in futurity, nor to give an undue proportion of attention to a point that is not of a practical nature, and on which many good men may think differently. WAITSTILL PHILLIPS.

Cuba, Fulton Co., Ill., March, 1854.

Remarks.

It is not unfrequently the case that any attempt to gain information on the subject of the Second Advent, and to learn the period of its approach, seems like striving to search into the hidden things of futurity, and like being wise above what is written. But from this charge we are abundantly vindicated by the Word of God. And the very chapter which is often brought forward to support this charge, contains an express command that we should know when Christ was near even at the doors. See Matt. xxiv, 33; Mark xiii, 29; Luke xxi, 31. Perhaps one of the most precious promises to the weary pilgrim, who would know when "these things shall be, and what shall be the sign of Christ's coming, and of the end of the world," is the one given to Daniel; viz., "The wise shall understand. None of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand. Who are the wise? Are they those who are wise in this world's wisdom? Says the Apostle, "Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool that he may be wise. For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. 1 Cor. iii, 18, 19. See also the following scriptures: Job v, 13; Prov. iii, 7; Isa. v, 21; Matt. xi, 25; 1 Cor. i, 17; ii, 4; 2 Cor. i, 12; Jas. iii, 15. Who then are the wise? "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding." Job xxviii, 28. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments." Ps. cxi, 10. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will shew them his covenant." Ps. xxv, 14. Those then are "the wise," who fear God and keep his commandments; his secret shall be with them; then he shall show his covenant; and they shall understand.

The writer of the above article remarks that the Lord seems to rebuke the curiosity of the apostles by saying, "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." Acts i, 7. What was the question which was here asked? It was this: "Lord wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Verse 6. This question he did not see fit to answer directly; though it is implied by his telling them that they must be witnesses unto him, both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth. But when the disciples inquired concerning the signs of his coming and the end of the world, [Matt. xxiv,] the case was very different. Mark with what precision he answers their inquiries. There are two questions here asked: 1st, concerning the temple, and 2d, concerning his coming and the end of the world. He first carries them down to the destruction of Jerusalem, then through the 1260 years of Papal persecution, in which there should be tribulation to the church such as never was, and comes finally to the time when the Son of man should come as the lightening shineth from he east to the west, &c. In verse 29, he begins again and gives additional particulars in regard to his coming. He informs us of the signs in the sun, moon and stars; he describes more fully in verses 30, 31, his advent, with the scenes connected with it, and then gives the parable of the figtree and tells us to know when these things are just at hand.

But let us notice the idea that the second coming of Christ took place "in the generation that lived when he came in the flesh." This seems to be founded on the declaration of Christ that that generation should not pass away till all these things should be fulfilled; among which was his coming "in power and great glory." Here finding a difficulty in regard to those passages which represent him as coming in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, &c., [2 Thess. i, 8; ii, 8; 1 Thess. iv, 16; &c.,] the writer says that there appears to be another, or third, coming. 'Tis true in Matt. xxiv, the Lord "saith not 'in flaming fire taking vengeance,' &c;" but he does say that "then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven." Have all the tribes of the earth yet seen the Son of man coming? No. He says that he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. Have the angels yet been sent and the elect gathered? No. He says, The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Matt. xvi, 27. Has every man been yet rewarded according to his works? Not yet. But mark the similarity between this coming and what Bro. Phillips is pleased to denominate "another advent or coming." At the one "all the tribes of the earth shall mourn;" at the other he comes "taking vengeance;" at the one he comes "with a great sound of a trumpet;" at the other he comes with "a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God." At the one he sends his angels and gathers his elect from the four winds of heaven; at the other the dead are raised, the living changed and caught up to meet him in the air. If all these passages do not refer to one and the same coming, between the two there must be a wonderful similarity.

The power and wonderful works which attended the apostles are brought up as proof that Christ had then come; and it is said that Stephen saw the Lord. But how did he see him? as one who had come the second time? No; but in heaven, standing on the right hand of God. Acts vii, 55, 56. When Jesus led his disciples out as far as Bethany and was taken up from them, they were promised by the "men in white apparel" that he should "so come in like manner." Such was to be his second coming. Says Paul in his epistle to the Hebrews, [ix, 28,] Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second (not the third) time without sin unto salvation. This epistle was written about A. D. 64. Christ had not then come, according to Paul, the second time; nevertheless those manifestations which Bro. P. regards as signs that he had come, were fulfilling years before.

Christ, then, did not come in the days of the apostles; and he has not come yet; for those events which were to attend his coming have never taken place. But it may be asked, What will you do with "that generation?" Well, let us see whom Christ was addressing. "When ye shall see all these things, &c." Who does Christ mean by ye? He could not mean the disciples; for they were not to see all these things; as the signs in the sun, moon and stars have only been fulfilled within the last century. The sun and moon were darkened, May 19th, 1780. The stars fell, Nov. 1833. There would be no propriety in calling it the generation of the saints; for the generation in that sense would never pass, and there would be no force in the language used; but when ye shall see all these things; it must refer to the generation living when these things should be fulfilled; and the generation now on the stage did witness the sign in the stars, 1833. "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled."

It is said there are yet some 800 generations to come; but if the passages referred to, where God promises to keep covenant and mercy with them that love him to a thousand generations, prove anything definite, they would prove that at the end of that time God would no longer keep covenant and mercy, but that is not so; for his mercy endureth forever; [Ps. cxxxvi;] it is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him. Ps. ciii, 17. We are not to take the promise that God would keep his covenant to at least a thousand generations, as a definite prophecy that the world would stand for that length of time; for heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away. Matt. xxiv, 35. Much are we commanded to watch, lest that day come upon us as a thief, and lest coming suddenly our Lord shall find us sleeping. And Christ says to the church, [Rev. iii, 3,] If therefore thou wilt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee. But ye, brethren, says Paul, [1 Thess. v, 4,] are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief. Therefore let us not sleep as do others; but let us watch and be sober. And [1 Pet. v, 4] when the chief Shepherd shall appear we shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away. u. s.

THE SABBATH.

POPULAR OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

FIRST OBJECTION.—The Sabbath cannot now be observed as the Jews were required to keep it. The law required them to remain in their houses on that day. "Abide ye every man in his place, let no man go out of his place on the seventh day." Ex. xvi, 29.

ANSWER.—Probably there is no reader of the Holy Scriptures who really believes that God required the whole Jewish nation, for 1600 years, to remain in their houses through the entire Sabbath of twenty-four hours, yet this objection is often repeated. We will here state a few facts:—

1. The text quoted [Ex. xvi, 29] is no part of the great Sabbath law written with the finger of God in the tables of stone. Ex. xx, 8–11.

2. The text had direct reference to the children of Israel going out to gather manna on the Sabbath, after they had been told that on the seventh day none would be found in the field. Ex. xvi, 23–29. And it is decidedly wrong to quote this by-law, given to the Israelites under such circumstances, as the great law of the Sabbath.

3. The law that came from God through Moses required them to go out of their houses on the Sabbath. First, they observed all the offerings on the Sabbath that they did on the other six days, also two lambs, with a meat-offering and a drink-offering. Num. xxviii, 9, 10. Second, they had on the Sabbath a "holy convocation" or religious assembly, [Lev. xxiii, 3,] therefore they could not remain in their houses on that day.

Now we ask, Did the law which God gave to the Jews, relative to ordinances, oblige them to break his holy Sabbath? Never! It would make God the veriest tyrant in the universe to cause Sabbath-breakers to be stoned to death, and at the same time give the Jews a system of religion that compelled them to break the Sabbath!!

4. After the children of Israel had passed over Jordan, they went round the city of Jericho with the ark of God seven successive days. One of those days was the Sabbath. It is evident, then, that Ex. xvi, 29, referred only to the case of the manna. The act of going round Jericho on the Sabbath with the ark, was not a violation of the Sabbath law contained in the ark.

SECOND OBJECTION.—The Jews were not allowed to gather sticks to kindle a fire on the Sabbath, and it is not possible to keep the day as strictly as they were required to.

ANSWER.—The great universal Sabbath law, the fourth commandment, does not mention gathering sticks, or kindling fires. We have the account [Num. xv, 32–37] that "while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the Sabbath-day;" but we are not told for what purpose he gathered them.

The Israelites were commanded to cook on the sixth day the manna to be eaten on the seventh. To have kindled fires on the Sabbath to wash their clothes or cook their manna, would have been doing on the Sabbath the work of one of the six laboring days. They had no need of fires on the Sabbath. They were in a mild climate; their food was rained down from heaven, and their clothes were miraculously preserved. "There was not one feeble person among their tribes." Ps. cv, 37. For them, under such circumstances, to have kindled a fire on the Sabbath, would have been an open violation of the Sabbath law.

We are differently situated. We live in an age when the race has become comparatively feeble, and in the cold season of the year we would kindle a fire on the Sabbath as an act of mercy and necessity, the same as we would water an ox or a horse, or lift a sheep from a pit. Such acts, the "Lord of the Sabbath," pronounced "lawful." But it is evidently wrong, and a violation of the Sabbath, to neglect to make those necessary preparations for the rest of the holy Sabbath which can be consistently made on the sixth day. The Sabbath law forbids our doing on the seventh day that which can be done on the sixth, and also what is not really an act of mercy and necessity. The Sabbath law did not oblige the Jews to suffer either cold or hunger; neither does it us, for "the law is holy, just and good."

THIRD OBJECTION.—The law of the Sabbath required that the Sabbath-breaker should be stoned to death; and the same penalty should now be inflicted if the law exists.

ANSWER.—We call attention to the following facts: 1. The fourth commandment does not mention stoning the Sabbath-breaker.

2. Temporal death never was the full and final penalty for breaking the law of God. For if it was, then he who murdered, blasphemed, or broke the Sabbath, under the Jewish economy, only had to be stoned to death to satisfy the law. And in the judgment his sin cannot appear against him; for the law was fully satisfied when he suffered temporal death. But the penalty of God's law was, and still is, Eternal Death. "Sin is the transgression of the law," and "the wages [penalty] of sin is death."

3. Temporal death was also inflicted upon the Israelites if they transgressed others of the commandments of God beside the fourth. Read Lev. xxiv, 11–16. Here the son of the Israelitish woman "blasphemed the name of the Lord, and cursed," and the Lord said, "Let all the congregation stone him." He broke the third commandment. And it will be seen by comparing Num. xv, 32–36, with Lev. xxiv, 11–16, that he who broke the fourth commandment, and he that broke the third, shared the same fate. Is the third commandment still binding? "Certainly," says the objector, "the commandment, 'Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain,' is binding with all its force." We ask, Should the blasphemer now be stoned to death? The objector will have to acknowledge that although the third commandment is binding in this dispensation, the gospel does not inflict temporal death on the blasphemer. In the Jewish dispensation there was no atonement that could reach his case, therefore he was stoned to death, and removed from Israel. But under the gospel, the atoning blood of Christ can reach his case, and wash away the sin of blasphemy, so mercy now pleads for the transgressor of the third commandment, that he may be spared, that he may repent of the sin of blasphemy and live. This is just the position we would take in regard to the fourth commandment. And we may now see why the Apostle called the gospel covenant the better covenant. Mercy now pleads for the Sabbath-breaker, that he may be spared, turn from his sin, find pardon and live. In this respect the ministration of God's law under the gospel, far excels [2 Cor. iii] the ministration of condemnation and death, under the Jewish economy.

FOURTH OBJECTION.—Deut. v, 2, 3, shows that the Sabbath was made for the Jews alone. "The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day." If the covenant mentioned here is the ten commandments, then the Sabbath was not made for the fathers, but only for the Jews.

ANSWER.—Let us see if this view of the text does not prove too much for the objector. Admitting that the ten commandments are this "covenant," therefore the duty to keep the Sabbath was not binding on the fathers, does it not prove that the duties enforced by the other nine commandments also were not binding on the fathers? Abraham, then, could disregard the seventh day, because the covenant was not made with the fathers, and Isaac and Jacob could have other gods, bow down to graven images, take the name of the Lord in vain, kill, commit adultery, steal, bear false witness and covet, for the same reason, that the covenant was not made with the fathers!!!

Thirty days before the children of Israel saw Mount Sinai, where the covenant was made, God gave the following rebuke: "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws? see, for that the Lord hath given you the Sabbath." This shows that God's commandments and laws, embracing the Sabbath, existed before this covenant was made in Horeb, therefore Deut. v, 2, 3, proves nothing against the Sabbath. The covenant referred to was the mutual agreement between the children of Israel and the Lord, [Ex. xix,] the ten commandments [Ex. xx] being the moral conditions of the covenant.

FIFTH OBJECTION.—The word Sabbath is not found in the Bible until after the account of the children of Israel leaving Egypt; so it was not instituted at creation, but at Sinai when the law was given.

ANSWER.—The entire record of about 2500 years from creation is contained in the first fifty-two chapters of the Bible. Only the most important events from creation to the deliverance of Israel from Egypt are noticed, therefore it is no marvel that we do not find the word Sabbath. But what seems really remarkable is that at a later period, even when the Sabbath-breaker was stoned to death, we do not find the word Sabbath in the Sacred Record for more than 500 years.

It is recorded [Gen. ii, 2, 3] that God rested on the seventh day, and that he sanctified and blessed his Rest-day. The fourth commandment points back to what God did on the seventh day, and to the seventh day, as the only reasons why the Sabbath was instituted. But this fact alone, that God and Moses speak of the Sabbath in a familiar style one month before Israel saw Sinai, is perfectly destructive of the idea that it was instituted at the giving of the law.

SIXTH OBJECTION.—Christ is our example, and he broke the Sabbath.

ANSWER.—We will first notice the Sabbath law. "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work," that is, labor necessary to this life. "But the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work;" that is, cease from the toil of the six days, and engage in the special service of God. It may be said of the priests who offered unto the Lord on the Sabbath all the usual daily offerings, and two lambs extra, that they labored; but what God required them to do on the Sabbath was not what the fourth commandment calls "labor," and "thy work." When Christ was accused of Sabbath-breaking he justified himself on the ground that what he did on the Sabbath was "lawful." His merciful acts on that day cannot with the least propriety be classed with what the Sabbath law calls "labor," and "thy work;" but rather, let those acts be classed with the ministration of the priests in holy things on that day. It is true that Christ declared his disciples "guiltless" in plucking the corn and eating it on the Sabbath. But it is said of them that they "were an hungered;" and where has God forbidden eating on the Sabbath to satisfy hunger? Nowhere.

Christ said to the impotent man whom he healed on the Sabbath, [John v, 8,] "Rise, take up thy bed and walk." Two of the Prophets speak against bearing burdens on the Sabbath; but they refer to burdens of merchandise, such as "sheaves, wine, grapes and figs," [Jer. xvii; Neh. xiii,] which were brought into Jerusalem to sell. Now let the objector compare conveying burdens of merchandise to market to sell for worldly gain, with the healed man with his bed praising God, and he may see the difference. One was labor for worldly gain, while the other was for the glory of God. One was a violation of the Sabbath law, but the other was an act of mercy which manifested the power of God.

SEVENTH OBJECTION. The commandment to keep the Sabbath is not given in the New Testament, therefore it is not a Christian duty to keep it.

ANSWER.—It is true that the fourth commandment is not given over a second time in the New Testament; neither is the second, but this falls far short of proving that Christians are released from the duties enjoined by those commandments. If it be said that we have in the New Testament that which is equivalent to the second commandment, then we cite Matt. xxiv, 20; Luke xxiii, 55, 56; Acts xiii, 42, 44; xvi, 13; xvii, 2; xviii, 4, where the Sab-

THE THREE ANGELS OF REV. XIV, 6-12.

BY J. N. ANDREWS.

At the present time, no portion of the Holy Scriptures more deeply concerns the church of Christ than Rev. xiv. At whatever period in the history of the church, the proclamations contained in this chapter are made, they must from their very nature constitute the grand, absorbing theme of that generation. Whenever the angels of this chapter are commissioned by God to announce to the nations of the earth that the hour of his judgment is come, or to proclaim the fall of Babylon, or to utter against the worshipers of the beast the most dreadful threatening which the Bible contains, no man can disregard their work, or treat their warnings as nonessential, except at the peril of his soul. If it were merely possible that these warnings were addressed to ourselves, it would become us to examine this subject with serious attention. But if this point can be proved by decisive testimony, it is certain that we cannot too carefully attend to the warnings here uttered.

It was but a few years since that all Advent believers were united in applying this prophecy to the present generation. But in the long period of trial and patience that has followed their disappointment, many of them have, to a great extent, lost sight of their original faith. A considerable number now contend that these angels are to utter their voices of warning in the future age; that is, in a period subsequent to the Second Advent. Another class attempt to show that they had their fulfillment many ages in the past: the first angel beginning in the days of the apostles, the second in the time of Luther; and the third at a period somewhat later.

As proof that these angels belong to the future age, the fact is adduced that John saw them flying through the midst of heaven immediately after having seen the Lamb stand upon mount Zion with the 144,000. As the latter event is future, it is concluded by some that the angels of this prophecy must be future also. If it were a fact that the events predicted in the book of Revelation were there given in consecutive order, there would be some force to this argument. But it is evident that that book is made up of many distinct views, usually introduced by the expression, "And I saw," or something of that kind, as in Rev. xiv, 6. The series of events, which begins in chapter xii, with the dragon, evidently extends through the work of the beasts in chapter xiii, and ends with a view of the remnant in their glorified state [Rev. xiv, 1-5] upon mount Zion. Then begins a new series of events with the angel of chapter xiv, 6.

The following reasons forbid the application of this prophecy to the future age:

1. This view would make the angel with the everlasting gospel to every nation, kindred and tongue, an angel from heaven with another gospel. Gal. i, 8. For the apostolic commission extended only to the harvest, which is the end of the world. Matt. xxviii, 19, 20; xxiv, 14; xiii, 24-30, 36-43. Paul participated in this commission, [1 Tim. i, 11.] and he thus declares its import: that God "now commandeth all men everywhere to repent; because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness." Acts xvii, 30, 31. The apostolic commission extended only to the end—the day in which God shall judge the world by Jesus Christ. A gospel preached in that day, would be another gospel than that preached by Paul, and one that has no Saviour in it. This would indeed show that the angel of Rev. xiv, 6, 7, was the very being on whom rests the curse of Paul in Gal. i, 8.

2. The second angel announces the fall of Babylon. Verse 8. After this proclamation a voice is heard from heaven, saying, "Come out of her, my people." Rev. xviii, 1-4. Now that the absurdity of placing this transaction after the Second Advent may be seen, please read 1 Thess. iv, 16, 17. It is there plainly stated that at the coming of Christ, his people shall all be caught up to meet him in the air, and thenceforward be forever with the Lord. Will the Lord take his people to Babylon when he comes? Never. He says, "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." John xiv, 2, 3. Then the Lord will not have occasion to call his people out of Babylon after the Second Advent; for from that time onward they are to be forever with him.

3. Let us now see whether the third angel's message can be applied to the future age with any propriety. Those who will compare Rev. xiv, 9-12; xiii, 11-17, will see at once that the warning voice of the third angel relates to the fearful scene when the two-horned beast is to act its part in oppressing the saints of the Lord. But if the third angel's proclamation relates to the period which follows the Second Advent, then the work of the two-horned beast must also transpire in the future age. And what a scene must the future reign of the saints present, if Rev. xiii, 11-17, is to be fulfilled in that time! But by turning to Rev. xx, 4-6, it will be seen that the period for the triumph of the beast and his image, and for the reception of his mark, precedes the thousand years' reign of the saints. And when the reign of the saints commences, the triumph of the beast is past.

The beast doubtless represents the Papal power. Rev. xiii, 1-10; Dan. vii, 8, 20, 21, 25, 26. But by turning to 2 Thess. ii, we learn that the Papacy is to be destroyed by the brightness of Christ's coming. Further, we learn from Rev. xix, 19-21, that the final overthrow of the beast and false prophet, or two-horned beast, takes place in the battle of the great day of God Almighty, in immediate connection with the Second Advent. By these plain testimonies we establish the fact that the beast will be destroyed at the Second Advent. Therefore we ask, what danger will there be that men will worship the beast at a time when there will be none for them to worship? God will never send an angel to warn men against the worship of the beast when he does not exist.

The language of verse 12, "Here is the patience of the saints," is sufficient of itself to overthrow the application of these messages to the future age. The following scriptures clearly teach that the patience of the saints refers to the present time, and not to the period of their future glorious reward. "Ye have heard of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise." Heb. x, 36. "In your patience possess ye your souls." Luke xxi, 19. "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord." James v, 7. Will the saints have need of patience in the kingdom of God? Will they have to possess their souls in patience after they have received the promise, even life everlasting? 1 John ii, 25. It is tribulation that worketh patience. Rom. v, 3; James i, 2, 3. Are the saints in tribulation after they are made immortal, and crowned with everlasting joy? No, never. Isa. xxv, 8, 9; xxxv, 10; Rev. vii, 13-17. But the saints are in their patience when the third angel's message is given. Hence that message does not belong to the future age.

But verse 12 concludes thus: "Here are they that keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." It is evident that this refers to the period when the remnant are keeping the commandments of God, while exposed to the wrath of the dragon, [Rev. xii, 17,] and that it does not refer to the period when the commandment-keepers shall have entered in through the gates into the Holy City; Rev. xxii, 14; and that it refers to the period when the saints are living by faith, [Heb. x, 38, 39,] and not to the period when they shall have received the end of their faith, the salvation of their souls. 1 Pet. i, 9.

But verse 13, which pronounces a blessing on the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth, that is, from a point of time as late at least as the third angel's message, presents a testimony which cannot be evaded. It demonstrates that this part of John's vision relates to a period prior to the first resurrection; for the saints cannot die after being made immortal. 1 Cor. xv, 51-56. Our Lord testifies that they can die no more, but are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Luke xx, 36. If any are still disposed to locate these angels' messages in the day of God itself, let them carefully read the following scriptures. Matt. xxiv, 37-39; Luke xvii, 26-30; Gen. vii, 21, 22; Luke xxi, 35; Ps. ii, 6-9; Rev. ii, 26, 27; xix, 11-21; xxii, 11, 12; 2 Thess. i, 6-10.

The next inquiry relates to the past. Have not these messages met their fulfillment in the history of the church in past ages? We think not. Our reasons for this conclusion are, in part, the following:

1. No proclamation of the hour of God's judgment come, has ever been made in any past age.

2. If such a proclamation had been made many centuries in the past, as some contend, it would have been a false one.

3. The prophecies on which such a proclamation to men in a state of probation must be based, were closed up and sealed to the time of the end.

4. The Scriptures plainly locate the message of warning respecting the judgment in a brief space immediately preceding the advent of our Lord; thus directly contradicting the view that locates these messages in past ages.

We now offer proof in support of the foregoing propositions. If they are sustained, they establish the fact that the present generation is that one to which the angels' messages are addressed. We earnestly invite all who wish the truth to weigh this part of the argument with especial care. No truths of greater moment than God's voice to us at the present time, can engage our attention.

1. Has the proclamation of the hour of God's judgment come been made in any past age? If such a proclamation has never been made in past centuries, there is an end to controversy on this part of the subject. No persons have ever been able to show any such proclamation in the past. The apos-ties did not make such a proclamation. On the contrary they plainly inform us that the day of the Lord was not then at hand. Martin Luther did not make this proclamation, for he thought the judgment about three hundred years in the future. And finally the history of the church presents no such proclamation in the past. Had the first angel preached to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, that the hour of God's judgment had come, the publicity of such a proclamation would be a sufficient guaranty that the history of the world would contain some record of the fact. Its total silence respecting such a proclamation, is ample proof that it never was made, and should put to silence those who affirm that it has been made.

2. We are on firm ground, also, when we say, that had such a proclamation been made to the world in past ages, it would have been a false proclamation. Four reasons sustain this statement. 1. There is no part of the Bible on which such a message, centuries in the past, could have been based. Hence, had such a proclamation been made, it would have been without scriptural foundation, and consequently not from heaven. 2. It would have been in direct opposition to those scriptures which locate the judgment, and the warning respecting its approach, in the period of the last generation. The scriptures which sustain these two reasons we shall presently cite. 3. The history of the world amply evinces that the hour of God's judgment had not come ages in the past. 4. Nor would it be true of past ages, if limited to Babylon. For Rev. xviii, 8-10 clearly shows that the hour of Babylon's judgment is yet in the future. It is certain, therefore, that the angel with the proclamation respecting the hour of God's judgment, has not given it at a time when it would not only be destitute of scriptural support, but would absolutely contradict their plain testimony.

3. The prophecies which give us the time of the judgment, and which present the succession of events leading down to that great crisis, were closed up and sealed till the time of the end. We refer particularly to the prophecies of Daniel. See chap. viii, 17, 26; xii, 4, 9. Hence it is evident that God reserved the warning to that generation who alone need it. Noah's warning respecting the flood, was alone applicable to those who should witness it; thus also the warning respecting the judgment is alone applicable to that generation which lives in the last days.

4. The Bible locates these messages in the period which immediately precedes the Second Advent, and plainly warns us against the proclamation of the judgment at hand, prior to that time. Here we join issue with our opponents. Instead of finding that the apostles gave this proclamation, as some teach, we shall find indubitable evidence that they located this warning far in the future, and that they admonished the church to heed none that should precede a given time. If we recur to the book of Acts, we shall find Paul preaching before Felix, of the judgment to come; and before the Athenians, that God hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by Jesus Christ. Acts xxiv, 25; xvii, 31. But that book nowhere intimates that Christ was immediately coming to judgment. Peter points his hearers to the future, saying, that the heavens which had now received Christ, must retain him till the times of restitution. Acts iii, 21.

The first epistle to the Thessalonians may seem to teach that the apostles expected the coming of Christ to judgment in their day. Indeed, it is evident that such an idea was received from it by the Thessalonian church. Hence it was, that in his second epistle to them, Paul found it necessary to speak explicitly on the point. He tells them that the coming of Christ to the judgment could not take place until the great apostasy. And as the result of that apostasy, that the man of sin should be revealed, showing himself that he is God, and exalting himself above all that is called God or that is worshiped. That this mystery of iniquity, is the great Romish apostasy, none but a Papist will deny.

Paul reminds them that he had told the church of these things when he was yet with them. And where could Paul have learned this fact, which he had thus conversed upon to the Thessalonians? He was accustomed to reason from the Scriptures, and not to deal in assertion. Hence it is very evident that he refers to the prophecy of Daniel, who in his seventh chapter has given the successive events which intervened between his time and the judgment. In this series of events he has with wonderful precision described the power to which Paul has referred, as the man of sin. No Protestant will deny the identity of Daniel's little horn and Paul's man of sin. And as Daniel has brought it into a series of events which ends with the judgment and the setting up of the everlasting kingdom, it was an easy matter for Paul to tell where in this series of events he stood, and whether the judgment was its next event or not. The Apostle, therefore, plainly tells them that that day was not at hand. For the man of sin, or little horn, must arise and perform his predicted work, and when that should be accomplished the coming of Christ should transpire, to consume "that Wicked" with its brightness.

Now when was the little horn to arise? Daniel was told that it should arise after the ten horns upon the fourth beast; or in other words, after the fourth empire should be divided into ten kingdoms, which was accomplished about five hundred years after Christ. The judgment therefore could not come prior to that time. But how long was this little horn to have power to wear out the saints? Daniel informs us that it should be for "a time and times and the dividing of time." How long is this period? Rev. xii shows that it is 1260 prophetic days, or years. Verses 6, 14. It follows therefore, that the Apostle carries the mind forward five hundred years to the development of the man of sin, and thence 1260 years for his triumph, before the judgment could be preached as an event immediately impending. Whoever will carefully read Dan. vii, will get the original of Paul's argument in 2 Thess. ii, and will without fail see the force of his statement.

The Papal supremacy began in 538 and ended in 1798 with the overthrow of the Pope's temporal power. The warning of Paul against a false proclamation respecting the judgment at hand, therefore, expires at that time, and not before. For we have then reached the point of time where the last important event in Dan. vii, before the judgment has transpired. An angel from heaven preaching the hour of God's judgment come, many years in the past, would be giving a different gospel from that preached by Paul. Those who locate the angel of Rev. xiv, 6, 7 in past ages, virtually place upon his head the anathema of Paul in Gal. i, 8.

And what is of very deep interest, the point of time at which Paul's warning expires is the commencement of the time of the end—the very point to which the visions of Daniel were closed up and sealed. Compare chap. xi, 33, 35; vii, 25, and the fact that the 1260 years persecution of the saints terminates with the commencement of the time of the end will appear obvious. How gloriously does this view of the subject make the truth of God shine out! For the warning of the Apostle against a false proclamation of the judgment at hand, expires at the very point where the seal is taken off those prophecies which show when the judgment sits. And it is respecting this period, the time of the end, that it is said, many shall run to and fro, and knowledge (on the very subject which was before concealed) shall be increased. Then the time of the end is the period in which the judgment-hour cry, and the subsequent messages are to be given. Dan. viii, 17, 26; xii, 4, 9.

Another important argument on this point is found in what our Lord has said relative to the signs of his Second Advent. The church was to understand when his coming was at hand, by the fulfillment of certain promised tokens. Until these should be seen, the church was not authorized to look for the immediate Advent of the Lord. But when the signs which our Lord promised began to appear, his church might then know that his coming to judge the quick and dead was at hand. It is an interesting fact that Christ has marked the time in which these signs were to begin to appear. Consequently the messages in question could not be delivered prior to that time. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." Matt. xxiv, 29. "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken." Mark xiii, 24, 25. We think there can be no mistake that in these scriptures our Lord refers to the Papal tribulation of Daniel the prophet. The signs of his second coming were to commence "in those days," but "after that tribulation." In other words, the 1260 prophetic days should not be quite over, but their tribulation should be ended, when the sun should be darkened. The sun was darkened in 1780, and the tribulation of those days was then past, but the days did not expire till 1798. Thus we have the signs of our Lord's immediate Advent just opening upon us, as we come down to the time of the end, the period when the vision should be unsealed and many run to and fro with the word of warning to a perishing world.

The parable in Matt. xxii, 1-14; Luke xiv, 16-24, furnishes an important testimony on this subject. Matthew gives a particular account of the first part of this parable, but merely states in a word the final calls to the guests. Luke on the contrary omits the first part of the parable, but gives its concluding features with peculiar distinctness. We think the identity of the parable in Matt. xxii, and Luke xiv will be seen by every one who will compare those scriptures together. It is evident that Matthew by the calls to dinner, represents the calls which were made to the Jews at the First Advent. It is to be observed that the general work of inviting the guests had preceded these calls. For these are a special announcement to those that had been bidden, that the dinner is ready. These we understand to refer to the work of John the Baptist and others at the time of the First Advent. And we understand that the destruction of the city and people in the parable refers to the destruction of Jerusalem and the rejection of the Jews.

The call to the dinner, proving of no effect, the king turns to another people. We understand this as we do the text in which our Lord tells the Jews that the kingdom should be taken from them and given to a nation bringing forth the fruit thereof. Matt. xxi, 43. This part of the parable Matt. has given in a word, that the servants in obedience to the command of their Lord were enabled to furnish the wedding with guests. But Luke has taken up this part of the parable with minute accuracy. The dinner indeed was past and the people to whom it was offered unworthy of sharing it as guests, but the purpose of the king was not to be made void. At supper time, says Luke, a message was sent forth to announce to those that had been bidden that supper was ready. We understand that this call to the supper is made to the Gentiles and that it is in immediate connection with the Second Advent. For we think that none will deny that the supper of Luke xiv, 16 and that of Rev. xix, 9, is the same. Thus we see that there was to the Jews the general work of bidding the guests, and the special call at dinner time; and that to the Gentiles there is the general work of the gospel in bidding, and then at supper time the special call to the marriage supper.

These three calls to the marriage supper [Luke xiv, 16-24] we understand to be the same as the three messages of Rev. xiv, 6-12. The first call to the supper is "at supper time," and the first angel announces that "the hour of his judgment is come." None will dispute the fact that the judgment and the marriage supper are in immediate connection with each other. Rev. xix, xx. The three calls are not the general work of the gospel in bidding; they are made at supper time, that is, at the close of the day. And the three proclamations in Rev. xiv, in like manner are not the general work of the gospel, but special warnings addressed to the world as the great work of our High Priest is closing up.

The book of Nahum furnishes a very striking testimony on this subject. The chariots are to seem like torches, and to run like the lightnings, in the day of God's preparation. Chap. ii. Now we may learn the event for which this day of preparation is appointed, by reading the first chapter of this proph et. That the sublime scenes of the Second Advent and the day of God are there portrayed, we think few will be disposed to deny. The day of God's preparation is therefore, for this very event. Now it is evident that the hour of God's judgment cannot precede the day of his preparation for the judgment. Hence the day of God's preparation, is the time for the warning respecting the judgment, and the associated proclamation to the inhabitants of the earth. And how strikingly have we seen the sign which marks the day of God's preparation fulfilled before our eyes! Since the time of the end commenced, in which the prophecies relative to the judgment were to be unsealed, and many were to run to and fro, and knowledge to be increased, chariots running like the lightnings have made their appearance in almost every part of the civilized world. We think this a demonstration that we are now in the day of God's preparation, and that consequently this is the period of time in which the three proclamations of Rev. xiv, are to be made. For the day of God's preparation for the Second Advent, must be the time for the world to be warned respecting that event.

If we read the message of the second angel with care, and the more full reference to the subject in Rev. xviii, we may also gather some important ideas relative to the chronology of these messages. The people of God are called out of Babylon, that the plagues which God is about to inflict upon her, may not fall upon them also. These plagues are enumerated as, death, mourning and famine, and utter destruction by fire. And it is said that these shall come upon her in one day. It is evident that these plagues have not yet come upon her. The hour of Babylon's judgment, when the kings shall mourn over her for fear of her torment, is yet future. The warning therefore respecting Babylon must of necessity relate to that generation that shall live when her plagues shall come upon her. The warning respecting the flood, or the destruction of Sodom, belonged to that time which should witness those events. And the warning respecting the judgments on Babylon must relate to that generation that shall be alive when these judgments shall be inflicted.

The third angel presents a fearful warning against the worship of the beast and his image and the reception of his mark. It must be evident to every person that this warning must relate to the time when men shall be required to worship the image on pain of death. That this work of the two-horned beast, as recorded in Chap. xiii, has as yet been accomplished but in part, is certain. See verses 13-15. Hence it is a great error to locate this proclamation in any past age.

The following extract from the correspondence of the Central Christian Herald shows that the Roman Catholics of this country, as well as those of Europe, regard the Sunday as a mere festival, not at all entitled to be kept with the strictness of the Bible Sabbath. What a pity that these Protestant reformers, who no doubt feel a real zeal for the sabbatic institution, should stand directly in their own light by trying to make a Sabbath out of a popish festival day. The state of things which they regard as so sad will certainly grow worse and worse while they continue to occupy this strange and inconsistent position. The correspondent in question says:—

"It is an occurrence by no means uncommon, as I am informed, in this city, (St. Louis) especially upon the grounds adjoining their churches, to see upon the Sabbath both the clergy and laity engaged at the sports of the season, bat and ball, marbles and the like. With a friend I visited one of these churches, on Sunday afternoon. We entered the inclosure—a church in the center of the city—and to our dismay witnessed the priests and a large number of youths thus engaged, disturbing the neighbors by their boisterous confusion and noise. I recollected how Cataline sought to corrupt the youth of Rome, and I could not but exclaim, These are the Catalines of America—the disturbers of our peace the corrupters of our youth the plotters of the ruin of the Republic!

"The effect of this anti-Sabbath policy upon the masses is exhibited, as indeed it is in all our cities in the extensive patronage bestowed upon the numerous pleasure gardens with which the city is environed, and which, immediately after vespers, are thronged by them, and where drunkenness and revelry, to a greater or less extent, on every Sabbath, abound.

"O, can the eye of the American patriot not see in all this an augury of danger to our national character and permanency? And shall we sleep over this subject? What is true of St. Louis is equally so of Cincinnati and most of our cities; and our youth, aye, our people, are being contaminated by it. State Sabbath conventions, County Sabbath Conventions, City Sabbath Conventions, Presbyterian, Methodist, Episcopalian, and Baptist Sabbath Conventions, should he held all over our land; and means decisive and prompt, be resorted to, that, under God, our Sabbath and nation be preserved."

From Bro. Barr.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—I wish to say to the saints scattered abroad that although unworthy I rejoice through the mercy of God that I have the light of the third angel's message to guide me through the darkness and perils of time's last hours, and have also the privilege of sharing in the trials and sufferings of the remnant, and hope to be purified by obeying the truth and he glad with exceeding joy when the glory of our soon coming King is revealed. My heart is comforted and encouraged to labor and toil on in view of what God is doing for his precious cause and suffering people, especially while I see the way preparing for the solemn warning of the third angel to be heard in new places.

On our way from Vermont to Maine we called at Lunenburg, Vt., where two faithful souls had kept the Sabbath for about three years, and have cast an influence which tells to many minds that those who keep the commandments are blessed of the Lord. We called and conversed with some of their neighbors on the present truth, and by their request held a meeting in the evening. Had a free time, and quite a large congregation, (considering the short notice and rainy weather,) who gave the best attention to the word spoken. The next morning we journeyed on until about noon, when we arrived at Bro. French's in Northumberland, N. H., formerly from Vt. They were wholehearted in the advent cause in 1843 and '44, and did much to sustain it. Here we had a good opportunity to correct a wrong impression left upon their minds in regard to the faith of the Sabbath-keepers who were reported as believing that the Lord did come in '44. We hung up our chart and passed hastily over the three messages of Rev. xiv, and when we got through, one individual said, "Why, how different from what Esq. D. said they believed! Now tell us the reasons why you keep the seventh-day Sabbath. We take the Advent Herald and have heard but very little about the Sabbath-keepers." This request we complied with most cheerfully, as there are so many good reasons why we should keep the commandments. May the Lord enable them to receive and live out the third message as faithfully as they did the first and second.

From this place we hastened on to our appointment at Jay, Me., where we met the little church on Sabbath at Bro. Wm. Bryant's, and were blessed in keeping the holy Sabbath. On First-day we held a meeting at a school-house near by, where we enjoyed much of the presence of the God of truth while speaking to the candid congregation. On Second-day evening we held a meeting at Wilton, where we had quite a large congregation and good attention. Our next appointment was at Canaan, where we spent two Sabbaths: had very interesting meetings, and left in full confidence that as soon as the church gets right God will add to their numbers. We next went to Brewer, where we found the church striving to come up through much tribulation to the rest that remains to the people of God. The church has been much refreshed, and are still contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints.

I will here take the liberty to answer through the Review the question that has been asked by private letters: What is the little Michigan paper doing in your travels? Answer—nothing. O how I pity any poor soul that is so unfortunate in time's last hour as to be found scattering abroad. The productions of any class of religious teachers unless they are fully in the work of God and rightly dividing the word of life, can no more satisfy the honest inquirer after truth, than husks did the poor prodigal. O, dear brethren, how dreadful are the scenes that are just before us, and what vast responsibilities devolve upon every soul whose mind has been enlightened by the present truth, and what awful consequences follow when "these fall away." May the Lord give his saints to feel more deeply the importance of being as wise as serpents and as harmless as doves; and to unite their strength against the powers of darkness as the dangers thicken while nearing the harbor of eternal rest. Lord bless and bring the honest souls safely to land, is the prayer of your unworthy brother in the tribulation and patience of the saints.

Brewer, Dec. 1854.

From Frn. Barden & Perry.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—Our love for truth and the cause of truth, is the only apology we have to make for taking this method to correct some errors published in the minutes of the twenty-ninth annual meeting of the Penobscot Baptist Association, held Sept. 5th, 6th, and 7th, 1854. On page 17th in their report of the state of the Carmel church, we find this statement: "Some of the prominent members of this church, including even its officers, were deluded by a prevalent fanaticism, and neglected their duties to the church. Though very feeble, and perilling even its visibility, the church did not hesitate after ineffectual efforts for their reclamation, to exclude from its fellowship those in whose wisdom and piety it had long confided and who constituted a large proportion of its strength."

Now mark this: some of its prominent members, including even its officers, (deacons Perry and Bardon,) like Paul before Agrippa, not having the privilege before, now take the liberty to answer to this charge of delusion and fanaticism for ourselves.

1st. We frankly confess that after the way that some call heresy, so worship we the God of our fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets. 2d. The Captain of our salvation has said, [Matt. xxiv, 33.] "So likewise ye when ye see all these things, know that it is near even at the doors;" and blessed be his holy name for ever, this knowledge no man taketh from us. 3d. We have responded, Amen, with warm hearts to the truth Paul preached to Titus, Chap. ii, 11-13, and are now looking for the blessed hope and by the grace of God mean to look a little while longer until he actually will appear the second time without sin unto salvation.

For believing and talking and trying to live these sublime truths, we have been published to the world as deluded fanatics. We leave the reader to judge how much injury individuals of the faith above mentioned would do the church of God. 1 John iii, 3. "And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure." Again. The church after "ineffectual efforts for their reclamation did not hesitate to exclude." &c. Now as to the truth of this assertion we leave the maker of it to answer for it to a higher tribunal than that of man. But as for any knowledge of the time when, and place where, Bible efforts were made to reclaim us, we have none. Perhaps this accounts for the efforts being ineffectual.

It is true however, that we were excluded, but how? It was said to us at a certain time that there was to be a conference in a remote part of the town, but nothing was said about any important business to be done at the conference. As it was very inconvenient for us to attend, we did not, which gave them a chance to cut us off at a church meeting held in the morning before the conference without any molestation, or even giving us a letter of excommunication or a chance to answer for ourselves. Then to see them turn about and boast of the Lord's blessing them for faithfully and fearlessly doing their duty is enough to make the heart sick, when we take into consideration the fact that the directions given by the great Head of the church [Matt. xviii, 15-17] were entirely unheeded, as were also the rules laid down by the inspired apostles. But we would not mourn so much in view of the unfair treatment we have received in this matter, as we would in view of the fact, that the professed church of Christ has so far departed from the faith, as to exclude members without giving them as good a chance to defend themselves as the civil law, which provides for all men a fair and impartial trial.

We make not these fair statements of facts to injure any man or body of men, but we make them because we believe the cause of truth demands it, and inasmuch as we believe that in this matter we suffer as christians, we will neither murmur nor complain, but hope by the grace of God to commit the keeping of our souls to him in well-doing as unto a faithful Creator, until our soon coming King shall return and bid all our sorrows cease.

Yours in hope of eternal life.

SUPREMACY OF THE SCRIPTURES.—Sir Walter Scott in the last moments of dissolving nature, addressing his son-in-law said, "Bring me a book." "What book?" replied Lockhart. "Can you ask," replied the man whose works have charmed the world, "can you ask what book? there is but one" Precious Bible!

THE LAST WORK OF THE TRUE CHURCH.

BY M. E. CORNELL.

"Bind up the testimony: Seal the law among my disciples."

CHAPTER I.

THIS text seems to contain two commands equally prominent, each signifying to restore or bring together the truth; implying that the testimony is unbound and the law unsealed. But before we proceed to examine the nature of these commands, it will be necessary to locate the prophecy in order to a correct understanding of the importance of the subject. By the context we learn that the present is the time for the fulfillment of this prophecy: it is when the people are associating themselves and taking counsel together, and crying, "Confederacy, confederacy;" (joining secret societies &c.) Verses 9-12. Again, it is when the disciples (followers of Christ) are looking for the Lord; [verse 17:] which they are not warranted in doing until the signs which he gave to precede his coming are fulfilled; which commenced with the darkening of the sun, May 19th, A. D. 1780. The very generation that witnessed the signs, is to witness the coming of the Lord; hence the prophecy is most definitely fastened upon the present generation.

But there is farther evidence. The prophecy locates itself in a time when the children of the Lord are for signs and for wonders: (separate and peculiar, forsaking the customs of the world.) Verse 18. Again, it is "when they (the people) shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits (mediums) and unto wizards that peep and that mutter: should not a people seek unto their God? for the living to the dead?" Verse 19. This last quotation evidently refers to the present so-called Spirit Manifestations, with all their wonders and miracles, pretending to call up the spirits of the dead, leaving the living God, and going to the dead for knowledge.

By comparing several scriptures we learn that this work of spirits is to be accomplished in the last days, just prior to the second coming of Christ. Our Saviour spoke of this work of wonders and placed its fulfillment this side of the 1260 years of tribulation. See Matt. xxiv, 24. "For there shall arise false christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders, inasmuch that if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." The apostle Paul defines the events to transpire before the coming of Christ, and the last he mentions is, "The working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness," &c. 2 Thess. ii, 9, 10. The same work is spoken of in connection with the advent of Christ in Rev. xvi, 14, 15. "For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. Behold I come as a thief," &c.

This work is spoken of again as a part of the work of a beast which is a symbol of the United States, the very place where these wonders commenced. See Rev. xiii, 13, 14. "And he doeth great wonders so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men, and deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast," &c. Let the reader mark well the analogy of these scriptures. Christ says, SIGNS and WONDERS to DECEIVE, &c., and Paul says, POWER, SIGNS, WONDERS, and DECEIVABLENESS; and Rev. xiii, specifies WONDERS, DECEIVING, POWER and MIRACLES; and Rev. xvi, points us to spirits working MIRACLES.

That these prophecies are now receiving a literal accomplishment in the various forms of spirit manifestations, no one that has investigated the matter and believes in the divinity of the Scriptures, can doubt. All this work of power, signs wonders, and miracles, is to deceive the world, and, if possible, the very elect. In Rev. xix, 20, we learn that those who were deceived by miracles, had also received the mark of the beast. and according to Rev. xiv, 9, 10, and xvi, 2, those who are deceived by familiar spirits, (spirits of devils,) and receive the mark of the beast, will have poured upon them the wine of God's wrath.

Now when such fearful consequences are involved, is it not reasonable to suppose that God has made the way of escape very plain, and given us a perfect shield against the deception of Satan in all its forms? God's plan in this respect is clearly developed in the history of the past. He has always given timely warning before sending his judgments upon the wicked. Before the flood the antediluvians were faithfully warned. God's will was made known to them, and a way of salvation provided for all the obedient. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were warned: signs were given by which they might know when the destruction was nigh. Says Jesus, "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whose readeth let him understand,) then let them which be in Judea, flee into the mountains." Matt. xxiv, 15, 16. All that believed and obeyed were saved. The way of salvation in this case was very plain: "Flee to the mountains!" how simple! all could understand it; and as God is unchangeable we know that he has provided a shield for his people now in this time of unbounded deception. He has spoken of an endless life of glory, and has faithfully marked the way to obtain it. He has also spoken of eternal death, and those things which lead thereto, and has as faithfully warned us of them all.

We are now prepared to inquire, What is the shield against all the wonderful lies with which Satan is deceiving the world at the present time? We will look for the shield in the connection of the warning message; and we may expect to find it composed of a combination of wonderful and mighty truths which, when once understood, will so effectually anoint our eyes, that we can see and shun all of Satan's snares, and enable us to find and walk in the path which leads under that covering which is to shelter the elect when the last plagues shall fall upon the wicked. Such a combination is alluded to in our text: the TESTIMONY and the LAW. The same is mentioned again in verse 20.

After speaking of the cry which is now being made, that we should seek unto them that have familiar spirits, (mediums,) and go to the dead for knowledge, the Prophet directs our attention to the law and the testimony, and affirms that those have no light who speak not according to this word. This quotation shows that the law and the testimony are a test or detector for this time. This conclusion is corroborated by the third angel's message. Rev. xiv, 12. After declaring the fate of those who worship the beast, and receive his mark, he says, "Here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." When the beast and image (powers of earth) are "decreeing unrighteous decrees, and writing grievousness which they have prescribed," (Isa. x, 1.) and "framing mischief by a law," (Ps. xciv, 20,) and are thus multiplying false tests, we are informed of a company that are keeping God's law, and Jesus' faith. Now the very manner in which our attention is called to these, proves conclusively that they are a shield or safe-guard against the false ways of this time. While the two-horned beast is saying you must worship the image, you shall receive the mark, the warning message of the third angel says, "Here are the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus!" as much as to say, Keep these, and you will not be in danger of worshipping the beast, or receiving his mark; and you will escape the wrath of God.

But there is another scripture relating to this part of the subject which it is important to notice. "And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." Rev. xii, 17. The "Woman" in this text, all will agree, represents the True Church; consequently the remnant of her seed must be the last end of the true church on earth. This proves that God's people in the last days are distinguished by keeping (not merely professing to keep) the commandments of God, and testimony of Jesus Christ. But why is this a peculiarity of God's people in the last days? Because the true church has been in the wilderness; and in the last days is to come out entirely into the blazing light of truth as taught by God the Father and his Son Jesus Christ.

The subject of God's commandments is agitated among them, and they soon find out they are not keeping the true Sabbath, and they immediately return to the original Sabbath which their forefathers left when the church went into the wilderness. They now keep all God's commandments as they were given to the true Israel on Mt. Sinai. It is the custom of the times, and also the law of the land, that men should keep the first day of the week holy; but the remnant regard it not: they move out regardless of consequences: this brings persecution: the war spirit of the dragon is manifested against them.

We witness no persecution in the popular protestant churches; but let one of their number begin to keep the Sabbath ordained in the fourth commandment, and he will soon have war declared against him. War is not made upon these nominal churches; therefore they are not the seed of the woman spoken of. They are fallen, and are almost on a level with the world, and have no reason to look for persecution; for, as the poet sings,

"The world will not persecute those who are like them,
But hold them the same as their own."

But that the true children of God in the last days will be persecuted, is evident from the testimony of the apostle Paul. After declaring that perilous times should come in the last days, because men should be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, &c., having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof, he says, "Yea, and, all that will live godly (keep God's law) in Christ Jesus, (obey all the precepts of Christ,) SHALL SUFFER PERSECUTION." 2 Tim. iii, 12. Mark, he does not say they may, but, SHALL. Persecution, then, is inevitable with those who in reality keep the law and testimony. But do not the protestant churches keep them? They do not; for they violate the fourth commandment every week, and the apostle James says, "Whosoever shall keep (or profess to keep) the whole law and fail in one point, (or precept,) he is guilty of all." James ii, 10.

The popular churches, we know, profess godliness; as Paul says, "They have a form of godliness, but deny the power (or fruit) thereof." Actions speak as loud as words; as Paul says again, "They profess that they know God, but in works they deny him," &c. Titus i, 16. Jesus says, "Ye shall know them by their fruits," (works.) Matt. vii, 16. Men may profess to know and love God, and at the same time be deceivers and liars. Let them prove that they know and love God. The apostle John has given us the rule by which to test both ourselves and others. A man may deceive himself and think he knows and loves God, when he in reality does not. Therefore Paul says, "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith: prove your own selves," &c. 2 Cor. xiii, 5.

We will now return to John's RULE: "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother, abideth in death." 1 John iii, 14. This alone would not be a perfect rule; for a man might deceive himself in this, and suppose he loved his brother, when he did not. Let us hear John again: "By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and KEEP HIS COMMANDMENTS; for this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments; and his commandments are not grievous." 1 John v, 23. Jesus gives the same rule: "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." "If any man love me he will keep my words," &c. John xiv, 21, 23.

The evidence that we know God is also in our obedience. See 1 John ii, 3, 5. "And hereby we do know that we know him, IF WE KEEP HIS COMMANDMENTS. He that saith I know him and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him." The apostle James also teaches that there is no profit in a man's saying he has faith while he has not works, and says that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only. James ii, 14, 24.

Having now a perfect rule by which to try men, let us go forth in search of the TRUE CHURCH. Shall we find the true church to be one or all of the popular protestant churches now in existence. Let us see. What is their character at the present time?

1. They turn away their ears from hearing the law. Prov. xviii, 9.

2. They teach for doctrines the commandments of men. Matt. xv, 9.

3. They reject the commandment of God, the true Sabbath, that they may keep their own tradition—Sunday. Mark vii, 9.

4. They are not looking for the second appearing of Jesus Christ. Heb. ix, 28.

5. They are not persecuted. 2 Tim. iii, 12.

6. They are not meek and humble, but proud and haughty. Zeph. ii, 3.

7. They oppress the poor. Isa. lvii, 67.

8. They refuse to repair the breach, (treading down the Sabbath,) to prepare the people to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord. Isa. lviii, 12, 13; Eze. xiii, 5.

9. They will not receive a person into fellowship who keeps the Sabbath according to the commandment. Luke xxiii, 50.

10. Thus requiring men to be sinners in order to have their fellowship. 1 John iii, 4.

11. They as bodies are fallen, and are becoming habitations of devils. (They fellowship children of the wicked one.) Rev. xviii, 2.

12. Because they are fallen and will fellowship wicked men who are guilty of the sin of charming, (magnetizing,) and enchanting, (mesmerizing,) and consulting with familiar spirits, (mediums,) and necromancy, (pretending to communicate with the dead,) [Deut. xvii, 10-12,] God calls his people out, lest they should partake of these sins, and receive of the last plagues. Rev. xviii, 4.

All of the honest, both of priests and people, will leave these fallen bodies when their eyes are opened to see their corruption. The character of the true church is exactly opposite the above.

Communication from Bro. Bates.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—Since my last from Hubbardston, Mass., Feb. 12th, I have visited New Ipswich, Bennington, Wilton and Washington, N. H., Irasburg, Barton Landing, Sutton, Wheelock, Eden, North Hyde Park and Johnson, Vt., and held meetings in all but the first place.

At Wilton, N. H., the Lord answered prayer for the sick. The brethren and sisters who attended the meeting were greatly refreshed, and fully resolved to hold on their way in keeping the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus. Bro. L. Hastings conveyed me from New Ipswich to Bennington and Washington, about forty miles.

The Conference commenced in Washington Feb. 23d, and continued over the 25th. Notwithstanding the severity of the weather, the meetings were well attended. Brethren came from twelve and twenty miles. The united testimony of the brethren during the progress of the meeting, evinced the fixed purpose of their minds in living out the great truths contained in the last message of mercy, and seeking to walk in the old paths, where will be found church order and gospel union.

Feb. 27th, Bro. J. Stowell conveyed me to the R. Road in Charleston, some twenty-five miles, where we tarried all night with his brother. Here we had quite an interesting season. After hearing in relation to our position, Mrs. Stowell seemed very desirous to learn more about it.

The Conference at Irasburg was cheering and good. Here I met with old and tried brethren in the precious cause of truth whom I had not seen for about three years; also many others who had been coming to the knowledge of the truth of the third angel's message, since that time; especially some who had gladly accepted proffered terms of mercy at the tent-meeting there last Summer. We were very glad also to meet with Bro. Stone and Hutchins, who took a part with us in the meetings. I believe that Bro. Stone would be much blessed of the Lord, in laboring for souls in the wide-spread harvest field of our glorious coming King.

The meeting March 2d-4th, was at the house of Bro. Barrows, and in the Union meeting-house in Barton Landing. In the last-mentioned place, the people listened attentively to four discourses. We trust that the seemingly deep attention manifest on the occasion will result in much good. Some acknowledged the truth, and we hope that they will continue to receive and believe, that it may be counted to them for righteousness.

In company with Bro. Hutchins, we also held meetings at Bro. Childs' in Sutton, and in Wheelock. The brethren and sisters manifested their love for the present truth and a strong desire to live it out that they may be prepared for the time of trouble "such as never was;" and many of their neighbors are manifesting a strong desire to grasp the increasing, progressing and unanswerable truths of the third angel's message.

March 8th, Bro. Childs conveyed me some eighteen miles to Irasburg. From thence brother and sister Barrows took us to Eden and North Hyde Park, nearly forty miles. In these two places we held our meetings on the Sabbath and First day, at Bro. Stones and Ferry's. Here also the Bro. gladly received the precious truths of the last message of mercy, and seemed deeply anxious to have their neighbors and friends share with them; especially our last meeting in the school-house at North Hyde Park was solemn and interesting. It is clearly manifest that the Lord is working with his honest-hearted children for the salvation of their neighbors.

Here also I was not only cheered with the greeting of old and tried friends of God's precious cause; but the smiling faces of many which I had not seen before, brought onward, and into the truth by the unceasing labors of those who love the truth, and also those who are preaching and making it plain in pamphlets and papers.

We also had a profitable meeting at Johnson. From thence Bro. Loveland brought me to Morrisville, where we held a meeting in the town-house last evening to a promiscuous assembly. Our meetings Sabbath and First-day, 17th and 18th are appointed to be in Stowe. From thence Bro. Bingham offers to convey me over the mountain to Bristol.

In view of the foregoing, we feel encouraged and strengthened in the work of the Lord, and know that by the grace and Spirit of the Lord we shall be made stronger and stronger to stem the current of all opposition from our contending foe; that in the end we may together shout "Victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name;" on the sea of glass, having then, at least, the joyful satisfaction that we did hear, and heed the dreadful warning of the third angel, and the last message of mercy to fallen, guilty man.

JOSEPH BATES.

Communication from Bro. Holt.

I STILL feel to participate in the unpopular work of spreading before this generation, those precious truths of divine origin which have been, and are still trodden under foot by the Antichristian church, and buried beneath the rubbish of heathen philosophy, Romish superstition, and popular theology.

Notwithstanding seeming difficulties, and many discouragements which are thrown in the path of the christian, by the enemies of truth and good order, to obstruct the way, and to prevent, if possible, the work of restoring that portion of Bible truth which has been so long neglected, I am resolved to unite in the laborious task with those who have come up of their own free-will, and have a mind to work in this troublesome time. Although we are obliged to work with one hand, and hold a weapon of war in the other, I am persuaded that the good hand of the Lord is with us, and will prosper the work until it is completed.

I rejoice that the good Spirit of the Lord has stirred up the hearts of some to engage in this work, who are willing to risk all on the altar of sacrifice, and appropriate all their worldly gain to carry forward this enterprise. All who willingly give their substance for this purpose will hold a check on the Bank of New Jerusalem: and when the work is completed, will for corruptible things receive "glory and honor and immortality, eternal life," with "an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you." They will have an undisputed right in the city of God and free access to the tree of life. Finally, they will inherit all things.

Who would not be willing to exchange a few poor corruptible treasures of this perishable world for eternal riches and immortal blessings which cannot be estimated by mortals? Can it be possible that any will go away grieved like the young man when they learn that all is required in order to procure the durable riches promised in the book of God? I am persuaded better things of those who profess to believe that we are having the last warning message; and the last invitation to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Our faith in this matter will be proved. If we really believe "these things are so," we shall have corresponding works. "Faith without works is dead."

I expect those brethren who have had the privilege of doing but little for the advancement of this last work to be wrought for the church and world, will crave the blessing of giving, and embrace the first opportunity to aid in this enterprise. In order to do this, and make the work effectual, my opinion is that men called of God to preach, will at the same time need to be liberated so as to go out free and set these truths before the people in the power of the Spirit. "Faith cometh by hearing," "and how shall they hear without a preacher?"

We do not expect people to buy books and pay for papers until they become interested in the truths we preach and publish. When the word is preached in the power of God sent out by the Holy Spirit, brethren are stirred up to duty and active faith, which makes it easy to perform their task; for then they lose sight of this poor world and are enlivened with a bright hope of the world to come.

Unbelievers are pricked to the heart and begin to inquire if these things are so; and being convicted of the truthfulness of the message, they are ready to procure our works which treat on different subjects. Thus the pay is received for printing and the work goes on free from embarrassment.

I learned from a note in the Review that Bro. Waggoner was laboring with his hands to support his family; and others are in the same condition. New fields are opening before us, and call for help, but few can be supplied on the account of the scarcity of preachers, and because a portion of them are obliged to work with their hands to support their families. I have wished sometimes that preachers could live by faith only, and that their shoes would not wear out, and their clothes would not become old; but this is not the case. It is written "Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn." It would be cruel to muzzle the ox and then beat the poor creature because he did not move faster and tread out more corn. We cannot expect much from preachers that are bound. They have but little time to study the word and bring out of the rich store-house things new and old to feed the flock of God.

Oran, N. Y., March 15th, 1855.

P. S. I recently held meetings in Van Buren about two weeks since where considerable interest was manifested and a desire to hear further. I disposed of nearly all my books, and on account of paying my rent and sickness in my family I have no money to send for more: some have turned to keep the Sabbath in that place. G. W. H.

We learn that Bro. in Mich. are anxious to obtain Bro. Waggoner's labors and to sustain him in the work. We hope he will accept the offer.—Ed.

COMMUNICATIONS.

From Sister Sims.

DEAR BRO. WHITE:—It has been with deep interest that I have perused and carefully compared with the Scriptures of divine truth the many communications found in the Review, and many of your books and tracts which, through the agency of some good brother has been thrown in my way. It has been more than two years since my mind was awakened to this subject, and I began a thorough investigation in the Scriptures for that, which would substantiate my position with regard to the immortality of the soul, the Sanctuary and the Sabbath, but found no permanent platform whereon to rest which would agree with my former belief. Yet, I found, that the theory advocated by that little band which are denominatively styled Advents, was, as far as I could discover, in perfect unison with the Bible; and the dark and apparently impenetrable mist which, I must candidly acknowledge, has over seemed to veil the horizon of my mind with regard to the Bible, has been torn away, reconciling many positions, which were before wholly unintelligible.

The Bible no longer seemed a sealed book; the mists, emanating from the creeds of man, were forced to disperse that the rays of divine truth might shine in all their beauty.

Often do I ask myself, Shall I be one of that bright, that happy band, "who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb?" It has been about nine months since I became convinced, that to be a true disciple of the meek and lowly Jesus, I must keep God's commandments, one of which is, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." I have been striving in my weak way to keep it since.

40, 41; Luke v, 23, 24. For the world itself was made by him. John i. He had ample power therefore, to perform every miracle which he wrought. There is but one other thing to which this term can refer; viz., the precepts and doctrines of our Lord as recorded in the New Testament. Thus "the faith of the gospel," [Phil. i, 27,] must refer to the precepts and doctrines of the gospel. "The faith" to which a multitude of the priests were obedient, [Acts vi, 7,] which was resisted by Elymas the sorcerer, [Acts xiii, 8,] which was committed to the apostles for the obedience of all nations, [Rom. i, 5,] which Paul testifies that he had kept, [2 Tim. iv, 7,] and which is to be earnestly maintained, as once delivered to the saints, [Jude 3,] must refer, we think, to the precepts and doctrines of the everlasting gospel. That the faith of Jesus is used in this sense in Rev. ii, 13, we think cannot be denied. "Thou holdest fast my name," says Jesus, "and hast not denied my faith." That this is the sense in which it is used in Rev. xiv, 12, is further evident from the fact that it is spoken of as kept in the same manner that the commandments of God are kept.

THE REVIEW AND HERALD.

"Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

ROCHESTER, THIRD-DAY, APRIL 17, 1865.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

"Can ye not discern the signs of the times?" Matt. xvi, 3.

OUR Lord asked the Pharisees and Sadducees this question, at a time when they came to him tempting him for a sign from heaven. It was a reproof to them for their unbelief in the signs mentioned in the Old Testament writings, which they professed to believe, and which were actually fulfilling before their eyes, yet disregarded by them. They could tell the weather for the morrow, but had no skill in those prophecies that pointed to that time. "When it is evening, ye say it will be fair weather, for the sky is red; and in the morning it will be foul weather to-day, for the sky is red and lowering. O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?" Matt. xvi, 3.

We will here name some of the signs which the Jews had as evidence of Jesus' being the true Messiah.

SIGNS OF THE FIRST ADVENT.

1. Christ's birth-place, which was Bethlehem. [Matt. ii, 1,] mentioned in Micah v, 2.
2. Herod slaying all the children in Bethlehem, from two years old and under, [Matt. ii, 16-18,] prophesied of in Jer. xxxi, 15.
3. His return from Egypt, [Matt. i, 14, 15,] prophesied of in Hosea xi, 1.
4. His forerunner, John. The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord, &c. Isa. xl, 3. All Judea and Jerusalem saw this sign when they went out to be baptized of John. Matt. iii, 1-6.
5. The gospel preached. When Jesus stood up in the synagogue to read, he opened the book and read where it is written, [Isa. lxi, 1,] "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel," &c. The eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened upon him. And he said unto them, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." Luke iv, 16-21.
6. The place where he commenced his public ministry, [Matt. iv, 12-16,] mentioned in Isa. ix, 1, 2.
7. The time when he commenced his ministry prophesied by Daniel; viz., at the end of the 69 weeks, A. D. 27. Mark i, 14, 15.
8. His healing the sick, [Matt. viii, 16, 17,] spoken of in Isa. liii, 4.
9. His speaking in parables, [Matt. xiii, 34, 35,] mentioned in Ps. lxxviii, 2.
10. His riding into Jerusalem, [John xii, 12-16,] spoken of in Zech. ix, 9.
11. His humility when on trial. See Matt. xxvii, 12-14. "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth. He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." Isa. liii, 7.

12. The manner and circumstances of his death. "They gaped upon me with their mouths as a ravening and a roaring lion. I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint. My heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels. . . . They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture." Ps. xxii, 13-18. This prophecy had an exact and literal accomplishment at the crucifixion of Christ, and the Jews saw it. Read Matt. xxvii, 35.

13. The fulfillment of the seventy weeks of Dan. ix, 24-27. The Jews understood this, or might have understood it. Caiaphas, being high priest that year, said to them, "Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. And this spake he not of himself, but being high priest that year, he prophesied [or taught the prophecies,] that Jesus should die for that nation, and not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad." John xi, 49-52.

14. Christ's resurrection, [Acts ii, 25-31,] spoken of in Ps. xvi, 8-11.

We might add to these signs the miracles of Christ, the pouring out of the Holy Ghost on the day of pentecost, and still others which were distinctly spoken of by the prophets.

But notwithstanding all this scripture was fulfilling before the faces of the rulers of the Jews, and all these signs were actually accomplished in a little more than thirty years, and they themselves had to acknowledge that notable miracles had been done, yet they believed not.

Well may it be said by this generation, that the Jews deserved wrath, and God was just in destroying their nation and place. But how is it with the professed people of God at this day? Do they believe in that Word which they blame the Jews for rejecting? The Jews were looking for a temporal kingdom, and overlooked the signs of Christ's first advent. The nominal churches, as a body, are looking for a temporal millennium, and overlook the signs of his second advent, which are, as we shall show, as numerous and as forcible as those of his first advent. Then if the signs of Christ's second coming are doubted and rejected by the professed people of God of this generation, the sin of unbelief will rest upon them as heavy as it did upon the Jews.

1. The Dark Day of May, 19th, 1780. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," &c. Matt. xxiv, 29. What days of tribulation are here referred to? Read a description of them in verse 21. "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." For the following reasons we believe this to be the tribulation of the church during the Papal persecutions, and not the destruction of Jerusalem, as some teach.

(1.) That was the greatest tribulation that the church has ever suffered. Fifty, and some writers say, one hundred millions of Christians were put to death by the rack, flame and sword, and by every other engine of cruelty that wicked men and devils could invent. It was a greater tribulation than the church will ever suffer; for in the time of trouble such as never was on the world, when Michael [Christ] shall stand up, [Dan. xii, 1,] the saints will not be put to death. God has promised to deliver "every one" of them.

(2.) This tribulation cannot apply to the destruction of Jerusalem; for that trouble on that nation was not so great as that of the cities of the plain, when God rained fire and brimstone from heaven on them, or the destruction of the old world by the flood. Neither was it so great as the day of God's anger will be, when the last vials of his wrath shall be poured out.

time of trouble such as never was, when Michael shall stand up at the close of probation. Certainly, there could not be two times of trouble, at different periods, greater than ever was, or ever would be. Therefore we apply the "tribulation" spoken of in Matt. xxiv, 21, 29, to the saints during the Papal persecutions, and the "trouble" mentioned in Dan. xii, 1, to the unbelieving world, to be experienced by them in the future.

Then, "immediately after the tribulation of those days" of Papal persecution, the sun was to be darkened. Mark this: It does not say, after those days; but "after the tribulation of those days." The days reached from 538, to 1798, eighteen years this side of the dark day; but the tribulation of the days ceased before the sun was darkened in 1780. The days of tribulation were shortened for the elect's sake. Verse 22. "The reformation under Martin Luther modified this tribulation and continued to restrain the rage, and consume the power of Papacy until 1700; since which time, according to all church history, there has been no general persecution against the church." Mark xiii, 24 makes this point very plain. "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened." That is, before the 1260 years shall close; but after the tribulation, or martyrdom of the saints shall cease, "the sun shall be darkened."

In May 19th, 1780, there was a remarkable fulfillment of the predicted darkening of the sun; and in reference to the facts and date, there can be no doubt; for, besides the historical accounts, which all agree, there are many now living who witnessed it, and can testify to it.

"A something strikingly awful shall forewarn that the world will come to an end, and that the last day is even at the door."—Martin Luther.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived: 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man; for his lamp was trimmed, and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude." Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society—Life of Edward Lee. The 19th of May, 1780, was a remarkable dark day. Candles were lighted in many houses. The birds were silent and disappeared. The fowls retired to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of judgment was at hand. The Legislature of Connecticut was in session, at Hartford, but being unable to transact business adjourned."—President Dwight, in Cl. Historical Collections.

"Dark day of May 19th, 1780.—The sun rose clear, and shone for several hours; at length, the sky became overcast with clouds, and by 10 o'clock, A. M. the darkness was such as to occasion the farmers to leave their work in the field, and retire to their dwellings; fowls went to their roosts, and before noon, lights became necessary to the transaction of business within doors. The darkness continued through the day."—Gage's History of Rowley, Mass.

"Anniversary of the Dark Day.—The Dark Day, May 19th, 1780, is thus described by Mr. Stone, in his History of Beverly:

"The sun rose clear, but soon assumed a brassy hue. About ten o'clock, A. M., it became unusually dark. The darkness continued to increase till about one o'clock, when it began to decrease. During this time candles became necessary. The birds disappeared and were silent, the fowls went to their roosts, the cocks crew as at day-break, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. The alarm produced by this unusual aspect of the heavens, was great."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20th, 1843.

"In the Dark Day, May 19th, 1780, the heavens were covered with a dense cloud for three or four hours. . . . During this time, the clouds were tinged with a yellowish or faint red, for hours, for which no satisfactory cause has been assigned. I stood and viewed the phenomenon, but had not any fear that the world was coming to an end."—Noah Webster, L. L. D.—New Haven Daily Herald.

"The following description of the extraordinary dark day was given by Dr. Adams, on the 27th of May, 1780, eight days after it occurred. He writes:

"We had a very extraordinary phenomenon the 19th day of this month. In the morning it was rainy till about 9 o'clock, when the clouds broke away and the sun appeared, but very red. After nine the clouds grew very thick, with the wind from south-west in breezes; at half-past ten it was uncommonly dark, the clouds appearing of a yellow hue. At eleven, the public school was dismissed, it being so dark that no person could read or write. It continued to grow darker till twelve, when it was so dark we could not tell one person from another in a room with three large windows in it. In short, it was midnight darkness at noonday. . . . Thousands of people who could not account for it from natural causes es, were greatly terrified; and indeed it cast a universal gloom on the earth. The frogs and nighthawks began their notes."

Says D. T. Taylor, as published in the Advent Herald of April 9th, 1853, "I have conversed with two individuals, men of veracity, one a native of Scotland, the other of England, who both testify to the occurrence of this darkness throughout their native countries. All the phenomenon described as attending that memorable day in New England was also witnessed in Great Britain, producing also the same effect and being regarded as a sign of the coming judgment-day. In Scotland it is remembered and referred to as the 'Black Saturday.'"

In the same Herald, the Editor gives the following note:—"The dark day in New England was Friday. There is no record that that darkness was seen in England. The dark day there was on Saturday."

"From Robert Sears' Guide to Knowledge, published in New York, 1844, we extract the following: 'On the 19th of May, 1780, an uncommon darkness took place all over New England, and extended to Canada. It continued about fourteen hours, or from ten o'clock in the morning till midnight. The darkness was so great, that people were unable to read common print, or tell the time of the day by their watches, or to dine, or to transact their ordinary business without the light of candles. They became dull and gloomy, and some were excessively frightened. The fowls went to roost. Objects could not be distinguished but at a very little distance, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. Similar days have occasionally been known, though inferior in the degree or extent of their darkness. The causes of these phenomena are unknown. They certainly were not the result of eclipses.'"

2. The dark night following the dark day, May 19th, 1780. "And the moon shall not give her light." Matt. xxiv, 29.

"The moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun from whom she borrows her light is turned into darkness, she must fail of course and become bankrupt."—Matthew Henry.

"The night succeeding that day (May 19th, 1780) was of such pitchy darkness, that, in some instances, horses could not be compelled to leave the stable when wanted for service. About midnight, the clouds were dispersed, and the moon and stars appeared with unimpaired brilliancy."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20th, 1843. Extract from Stone's History of Beverly.

"The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes, was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."—Mr. Tenny of Exeter, N. H., quoted by Mr. Gage, "to the Historical Society."

Dr. Adams, speaking of the dark night, says:—

"At nine it was a darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost every one who happened to be out in the evening, got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night, as it was in the day, as the moon had full the day before."

3. The falling stars of Nov. 13th, 1833. "And the stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. xxiv, 29.

We are aware that some view that phenomenon an exhibition of meteors, and not of stars, and therefore no fulfillment of this sign. But what kind of a star guided the wise men to the birth-place of the Saviour? Surely, no planet, or fixed star. And how many planets think you, could fall from heaven on to this earth without producing its destruction? It is evident that this sign must have a shower of meteors, or small stars for its fulfillment. And that the falling stars of 1833 fully exhibit the sign, the following extracts will show. The first, from Henry Dana Ward of New York, published in the Journal of Com., Nov. 15th, 1833.

"At the cry, 'look out of the window,' I sprang from a deep sleep, and with wonder saw the East lighted up with the dawn and meteors. The zenith, the North, and the West, also, showed the falling stars, in the very image of one thing, and of only one, I ever heard of. I called to my wife to behold; and while robing, she exclaimed; 'see how the stars fall!' I replied, 'that is the wonder,' and we felt in our hearts, that it was a sign of the last days. For truly 'the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. vi, 13. This language of the prophet has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday it was literally fulfilled. The ancients understood by aster in Greek, and stella in Latin, the smaller lights of heaven. The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore, the idea of the prophet, as it is expressed in the original Greek, was literally fulfilled in the phenomenon of yesterday, so as no man before yesterday had conceived to be possible that it should be fulfilled. The immense size and distance of the planets and fixed stars forbid the idea of their falling unto the earth. Larger bodies cannot fall in myriads unto a smaller body; but most of the planets and all the fixed stars are many times larger than our earth. They cannot fall unto the earth; but these fell towards the earth.

"And how did they fall? Neither myself, nor one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy before quoted. 'It rained fire!' says one—another, 'It was like a shower of fire!' Another, 'It was like the large flakes of falling snow, before a coming storm, or large drops of rain, before a shower.' I admit the fitness of these for common accuracy; but they come far short of the accuracy of the figure used by the prophet. 'The stars of heaven fell unto the earth;' they were not sheets, or flakes, or drops of fire; but they were what the world understands by 'falling stars;' and one speaking to his fellow, in the midst of the scene, would say, 'see how the stars fall!' And he who heard would not pause to correct the astronomy of the speaker, any more than he would reply, 'the sun does not move,' to one who should tell him 'the sun is rising.' The stars fell 'even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet. The falling stars did not come as if from several trees shaken, but from one; those which appeared in the East fell towards the East; those which appeared in the North fell towards the North; those which appeared in the West fell towards the West; and those which appeared in the South (for I went out of my residence into the Park) fell towards the South. And they fell not as the ripe fruit falls. Far from it; but they flew, they were cast like the unripe fruit, which at first refuses to leave the branch; and when under a violent pressure, it does break its hold, it flies swiftly, straight off, descending; and in the multitude falling, some cross the track of others, as they are thrown with more or less force, but each one falls on its own side of the tree. Such was the appearance of the above phenomenon to the inmates of my house."

The second extract is from Prof. Olmstead, of Yale College, a distinguished meteorologist.

"The extent of the shower of 1833, was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the East, to the Pacific on the West; and from the northern coast of South America, to undefined regions among the British possessions on the North, the exhibition was visible, and everywhere presented nearly the same appearance.

"In nearly all places, the meteors began to attract notice by their unusual frequency as early as eleven o'clock, and increased in numbers and splendor until about four o'clock, from which time they gradually declined, but were visible until lost in the light of day. The meteors did not fly at random over all parts of the sky, but appeared to emanate from a point in the constellation Leo, near a star called Gauma Leonis, in the bend of the sickle.

"Those who were so fortunate as to witness the exhibition of shooting stars on the morning of Nov. 13, 1833, probably saw the greatest display of celestial fireworks that has ever been seen since the creation of the world, or at least within the annals covered by the pages of history.

"I feel assured that this is no atmospheric or terrestrial phenomenon, but that these fiery meteors come to us from the regions of space, and reveal to us the existence of worlds of a nebulous or cometary nature, existing in the solar system, and forming constituent parts of that system. Nor are these conclusions built on mere hypothesis, but are necessary inferences from certain facts.

"This is no longer to be regarded as a terrestrial, but as a celestial phenomenon; and shooting stars are now to be no more viewed as casual productions of the upper regions of the atmosphere, but as visitants from other worlds, or from the planetary voids.

"Subsequent inquiries have led me to the belief, that the body was so distant as hardly to exhibit any apparent parallax, but was projected on very nearly the same part of the sky, as seen by all observers. This fact at once shows that the source of the meteors was far beyond the atmosphere, and confirms the preceding conclusion that it was wholly independent of the earth."

After our Lord names these three signs; first, the sun darkened; second, the moon not giving her light; and, third, the stars falling from heaven, also the scenes closely connected with his second advent, [Matt. xxiv, 29–31.] he gives the parable of the fig-tree.

"Now learn a parable of the fig tree. When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that Summer is nigh. SO LIKEWISE YE, when ye shall see all these things, KNOW that it [margin, he] is near, even at the doors." Verses 32, 33.

Here, dear reader, our Lord has stated the object of these signs, which is, that we may know when his coming is at the doors. But we are told that the church is never to know anything of the period of Christ's second advent. Then we inquire, why did our Lord give signs of the event? The fact that Christ foretells signs of his coming, and then states the object of those signs, that the church might know when the event should be near, even at the doors, is sufficient proof that it was the design of Heaven that the church should understand, the period of the Second Advent.

It is true that our Lord has said, "of that day and hour knoweth no man." Mark adds, [Chap. xiii, 32,] "no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." But if this proves that all men are to be perfectly ignorant of Christ's coming till he suddenly descends from heaven, then it also proves that the angels who are to attend him, and Christ himself will have no knowledge of the event till it takes place, and they find themselves in this world. This makes the text prove too much; therefore we must take another view of it. The text does not state that man shall never know the day and hour of Christ's coming. Rev. iii, 3, is good evidence that even the day and hour will be known by the watching ones. "Remember therefore how thou hast received and heard, and hold fast, and repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee."

The testimony of the Apostle is also to the point. "But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you; for yourselves know perfectly, that the day of the Lord so cometh (on the unbelieving world) as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them. . . . But ye, brethren, are not in darkness (as to the time of Christ's coming) that that day should overtake you as a thief." 1 Thess. v, 1–4.

We do not profess any knowledge of the day and hour of the Second Advent, neither the year; but from the signs, we may know that it is near, even at the doors. It is the opinion of critical scholars that the text should read, "of that day and hour maketh known no man," &c. It would then teach that no man, neither the angels, nor the Son is to make the day and hour known; but the Father will do it. This is in perfect harmony with Rev. iii, 3; 1 Thess. v, 1–4. Read also Eze. xii, 21–28, and mark particularly verse 25.

It is sometimes stated that "when these signs are fulfilled, they will be so plain that no doubt will remain respecting their fulfillment. All men will then believe." But if this should be so, then how could it be as it was in the days of Noah? "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man." Noah knew the period of the flood, and preached it to the world, and prepared the ark. In doing this, he condemned the world, and saved himself and family. But the people doubted and scoffed, and were destroyed. "So shall it be also in the days of the Son of man."

God has never revealed his truth to man in a manner to compel him to believe. Those who have wished to doubt his word, have ever found a wide field in which to doubt, and a broad road to perdition. While those who have wished to believe, have ever found everlasting rock on which to base their faith.

The parable of the fig-tree is probably the most forcible one that could be employed by our Lord. When the trees of the field begin to put forth their leaves, and the tender grass begins to spring up, and the ground is being covered with its green velvet carpet, we know that Summer is nigh. If one should doubt, and talk of the season's changing back to cold Winter, he would be thought insane. It is a certainty with us that Summer is coming when we see these signs in nature. "So likewise ye," or with the same certainty, know that Christ's coming is at the doors when the signs in the sun, moon and stars are fulfilled.

A dear friend of ours, who had long been absent, might be coming, yet a thousand miles off. He might be near, yet twenty miles from home; but with what interest should we watch his approach to the door, and special care would be taken to be ready to receive our long absent friend.

That Christ will come again has been gospel truth for more than 1800 years. He says, [Luke xxi, 28,] "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." When these signs begin to come to pass, redemption is drawing nigh; but when they come to pass, then know that Christ is at the doors. Reader, this is our true position; Christ is at the door. Are you prepared to welcome him? If you are not, delay not one hour. Make haste and get ready!

The shaking of the powers of the heavens, sign of the Son of man, and the mourning of the tribes of the earth, are events closely connected with the Second Advent, but are not given as signs to be presented as evidence that the event is near. A little while before Christ comes, every man's case will be unalterably fixed. It will then be said, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Rev. xxii, 11. As proof that this is a short period before the Advent, read the next verse. "And behold I come quickly," &c. He has not come, although the destinies of all are then fixed. In this short period of time, these events will take place: not to be preached to the world; for salvation's hour to them will then be past; not to inspire faith in the saints; for their faith will then be perfected.

THE LAST WORK OF THE TRUE CHURCH

BY M. E. CORNELL.

"Bind up the testimony: Seal the law among my disciples."

CHAPTER II.

HAVING now proved that the time has come when special attention is to be given to the "Law" and "Testimony," we will proceed to inquire,

1. WHAT IS THE LAW, and

referred to in the text. From the scriptures already quoted we learn that the terms, law, and commandments, are used interchangeably referring to the same code. And it is a fact worthy of notice that where the phrase, commandments of God, occurs in the Scriptures it almost invariably refers to the ten commandments written upon tables of stone. The code of ceremonial laws, having been abolished at the death of Christ, the moral laws alone remain. The book of Revelation was given sixty-five years after the crucifixion, where the ceremonial commandments were done away; therefore Jesus refers to the ten commandments in Rev. xxii, 14: "Blessed are they that do his (the Father's) commandments," &c. The apostle Paul must have reference to the same law when he says, "The law is holy, . . . just and good." "The law is spiritual." "The doers of the law shall be justified." "By the law is the knowledge of sin." "With the mind I myself serve the law of God." "Circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God." Jesus must refer to the same law when he says, "If thou wilt enter into life keep the commandments." "The young man saith unto him, Which?" He wished to know which code of commandments Jesus referred to, and Jesus informed him by quoting half of the ten commandments, and these represented the whole code from which they were taken. Matt. xix, 17.

The apostle James speaks of the law of liberty, and the royal law, and gives us to understand what law he refers to by quoting two of the ten commandments; [James ii, 8, 10, 11, 12;] and the apostle shows the importance of this law by saying that it is to judge the words and actions of men. Then if a man does not speak according to this law he is a sinner and of course is in darkness and has no light. Now compare this with the testimony of Isaiah concerning the law mentioned in our text: "To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." Isa. viii, 20. From this we learn that the law mentioned in the text is to govern the words of men; and the testimony of the apostle James, already referred to, shows the rule of conversation to be the ten commandments; therefore we conclude that in order for the law to be sealed among the disciples, they must keep all of the ten commandments.

Having now ascertained what law is to be sealed, we will proceed to examine our second proposition; viz., What is the Testimony to be bound up? As the prophecy containing the text relates to the present time, we conclude that the work of familiar spirits mentioned in the context is synonymous with the same work mentioned in the book of Revelation; hence the law and testimony which is referred to in both places as a Shield, are the same. That which is called the faith of Jesus, in Rev. xiv, 12, is named the testimony of Jesus, in Chap. xii, 17. These two passages referring to the same company at the same time, give us a key to the matter and show that the faith of Jesus, and the testimony of Jesus, are the same, and refer to that part of the shield called in our text the testimony. That the testimony is something separate and distinct from the law is evident from Rev. i, 2: "Who bare record of the word of God and of the testimony of Jesus Christ." See also verse 9: ". . . was in the isle that is called Patmos for the word of God and for the testimony," &c. Again in Rev. xiv, 12: "Here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." It being now sufficiently clear that the law and testimony are not the same, we come more directly to the question, What is the testimony of Jesus?

Jesus' testimony must be what he has declared as a witness; and we find that the Scriptures thus speak of him. See Rev. i, 5: "And from Jesus Christ who is the faithful witness. Again in Rev. iii, 14: "These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness," &c. Again in Rev. xx, 4: "And I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God," &c. From these references we might conclude that the testimony of Jesus is what he has witnessed to, or taught. But other scriptures will settle the question so as to leave no room for doubts. Jesus says, "For this cause came I into the world that I should bear witness unto the truth." John xviii, 37. Then what Jesus spake while on earth, he spake as a witness; consequently all his sayings can with propriety be called his testimony. This conclusion is established by the testimony of the apostle Paul in 1 Cor. i, 5, 6. Paul here assures the saints that they are enriched by Christ in all knowledge even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed in them, so that they come behind in no gift, &c. There can be no doubt that the testimony of Jesus here embraces all his teaching.

As Jesus never taught in vain, he would cease to teach when his disciples were enriched in all knowledge, so that they came behind in no gift, &c.; therefore we conclude that a part of the sayings of Jesus would not have enriched the Corinthians in all knowledge; hence the phrase, testimony of Jesus, comprehends all that Jesus taught. Once more: Paul admonished Timothy "not to be ashamed of the testimony of Jesus; [2 Tim. i, 8;] and Jesus instructed men "not to be ashamed of his words," &c. Mark viii, 38. We may infer from this that the testimony of Christ and his words are the same. But this question is forever settled by the testimony of John the Baptist. Speaking of Christ, he says: "And what he hath seen and heard that he testified, and no man receiveth his testimony. He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true. For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God." John iii, 32-34.

Jesus testified and speaketh; and his words are his testimony. He speaks concerning the past, the present and the future; of things in this world, and that which is to come. He pronounces blessings upon the meek and pure in heart, and woes upon the pharisees and hypocrites. He tells man what is in his heart, and what he shall and shall not do, or say, or think, that he may have eternal life.

ALL THESE ARE HIS TESTIMONY. When Jesus prayed for the apostles, he said, "I have given them thy words." John xvii, 8, 14. And the apostle Paul speaking of the great salvation, says, "It began to be spoken by the Lord and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him." Heb. ii, 3. From this we learn that the testimony of Jesus was finished by the apostles; hence all the doctrines and precepts of the New Testament are comprehended in the phrase, "testimony of Jesus."

OBITUARY.

The enemy Death has broken the ranks of our loving band.

Brother Warner Hoesington sleeps in Jesus. He died of consumption, March 21, 1855, aged 43 years, 3 months and 3 days. He has left a wife and three children to mourn his loss, besides a large circle of friends; but we sorrow not even as others which have no hope; for as we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

Three years ago he made a public profession of religion and joined the Congregational church, in which he remained about one year when he became interested in the Advent doctrine, and of course was dealt with as an offending member. About one year and a half since, Bro. Waggoner presented the third angel's message. He saw the force of it, and immediately commenced with his family to obey God; and from that time till death, lived a consistent christian. For the last six months he had been declining, but as the outward man decayed, the inward man was renewed day by day. The Bible and the coming of the Lord was his only theme.

A few days before his death he told his family, I love you all, but I love Jesus best. He often told friends that stood by him that he was ready to die any moment: he had finished his work, and was confident he had the truth—and that he should have part in the first resurrection. W. B. PUTNAM.

New Buffalo, Wis., March 22d, 1855.

DIED in the town of Grafton, Ill., Jan. 16, Eugene L. Smith, son of Thomas and Phebe Smith, aged five years and nine months.

The fruits of Autumn have ceased to fall,
Their richness leaves a pleasing glow,
But Death has thrown a dark'ning pall,
And sorrow ceaseth not its flow.

We hovered o'er the dying boy,
His sparkling eyes grew dim and grey,
We saw his cheek grow pale, and then
We saw him calmly pass away.

"He's gone"—they say—forever gone,
His gladsome laugh is hushed and still,
And here no more his joyous songs,
With gladness will our bosoms thrill.

But soon immortal will he rise
To heaven's mansions, where he'll be,
To greet us with an angel's smile,
Throughout a blessed eternity.

M. L. BENNETT.

DIED, April 5th, 1855, at Delhi, sister Sally A. Morton, wife of Bro. A. B. Morton, aged forty-five years, after an illness of a very few hours. Sister Morton came out from the M. E. church, and left those that were dear to her, and took a decided stand for the present truth, in company with her husband and a few persecuted ones, some two years since. Thus giving the strongest possible proof that she was a true child of God.

O how sudden and unexpected has fallen by the enemy death, an affectionate wife, a kind and tender hearted mother, and a beloved sister in the Lord. Her fall will be greatly deplored by her friends and neighbors.

The church will her early fall deplore;
But ah! 'tis ours to tremble and adore,
Jehovah's ways. We'll humbly kiss the rod,
And bow submissive to the hand of God.

Preaching on the occasion by the writer, to a large and attentive audience, from Job xiv, 14. The following points were brought out; viz., the origin of death, and sin as its cause; sin a transgression of the law; the ten commandments as the foundation of God's righteous government; each precept standing on its original basis; also, the state of the dead and resurrection; the earth restored as the everlasting inheritance of the saints, &c.

MANNING CURRY.

Feeling it duty I now sit down to inform the scattered remnant of the death of my Father, Niram W. Rockwell. He died March 5th, calm and composed. He seemed to have no doubt but he should be raised in the first resurrection. He was a firm believer in the speedy coming of the Son of God, and for several years a strict observer of the Sabbath of the Lord. We feel indeed that we have met with a great loss, but we mourn not as those who have no hope.

"A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city; and their contentions are like the bars of a castle." Prov. xviii, 19.

all nations; and we have before clearly proved that at the end of the seven times, was the appointed time for God to set his hand again, the second time, to recover the remnant of his people, and to assemble the outcasts of Israel and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth; and that the yoke of their cruel and hard bondage was then broken off, and their captivity was then turned, and the latter-day glory was then ushered in, and we shall hereafter prove that the gathering has been going on from that time to the present.

The gathering together of all which are in heaven and on earth, will be consummated when Christ shall come and ALL the holy angels with him, and the righteous are all caught up to meet him. Then the gathering dispensation, which is the dispensation of the fullness of times, will be ended. Hence the dispensation of the fullness of times was ushered in, in 1798, and will close at the second advent of Christ. Joseph Marsh commences this dispensation of the fullness of times after the second advent; but it will then be among the things that are in the past. He identifies it as the glorious probationary age to come after the second advent; but will he find it there? Nay, verily. See his Pamphlet. Title page, Age to come, pp. 1, 98, 125.

From the "Advent Herald."

THE BLACK SATURDAY IN SCOTLAND.

BRO. HINES:—Having discovered the origin and true application of the above appellation, as referred by us to a dark day supposed to have occurred about the year 1780, I herewith transmit for your columns a correct account of the same, with the remark, that the following statement invalidates the application of the phrase "Black Saturday," to a dark day in Scotland in the above mentioned year. Still I think the testimony adduced in my letter in the Herald last December goes to show that a dark day of some kind, though perhaps local and of less celebrity, did occur in Scotland about the year 1780.

In 1621, the Scottish Parliament met on Saturday, the 4th of August the last day of their session, at Elinburg, to ratify the "Five Articles" of the Acts of the General Assembly of the Kirk, holden at Perth on the 25th day of August, 1618. Over these "Five Articles" the Assenters and Dissenters were quarreling most heartily. Early in the morning a great fire occurred, in the city which much alarmed the people, and says the historian Calderwood, threw the lords into the "greatest perplexity," and "which accident" he says, was taken for a forewarning to the Estates [i. e. the king and lords] to take heed what they did. When the day had come another incident took place also serving to show us the superstition of those times. "Many of the people being convened in the outer court of the palace, observed that when the lords were mounted on their horses, a swan did flee over their heads, from the north towards the south, slashing with her wings, and muttering her natural song. The people," continues Calderwood, "shaking their heads, whispered among themselves that they feared a bad conclusion of that Parliament."

Parliament met, the votes were taken on the "Five Articles," and much against the wishes of many, the king and lords ratified the doings of the Kirk. Calderwood thus describes the sequel.

"When all the acts were now concluded and the ringleaders were insulting over the defenders of the ancient orders, gasping for thanks and reward, and wishing every one to have wings to flee to court with the report; the Grand Commissioner rising from the throne to ratify the acts by touch of the sceptre, at that very same moment, was sent from the heavens, in at the windows of the house, which was dark before by reason of the darkness of the day, an extraordinary great lightning, after the first a second, and after the second a third more fearful. Immediately after the lightnings followed an extraordinary great darkness which astonished all that were in the house. The lightnings were seconded by three loud claps of thunder. Many within the Parliament House thought them to be shots of cannon out of the Castle. It appeared to all that dwell within the compass of ten or twelve miles, that the clouds stood right above the town and overshadowed that part only. The beacon standing in the entry of Leith haven was beaten down with one of the blasts of thunder. After the lightning, darkness and thunder, followed a shower of hailstones extraordinary great, and last of all rain in such abundance that it made gutters run like little brooks; the lords were imprisoned about the space of an hour and a half. Servants rode home with foot-mantles and their masters withdrew themselves, some to their coach and some to their foot. So the 'Five Articles' were not honored with the carrying of the honors, or riding of the Estates in ranks. In the mean time the Castle thundered with their fiery cannons according to the custom used at the Parliaments. This Saturday, the fourth of August, was called by the people, Black Saturday. It began with fire from the earth in the morning, and ended with fire from heaven in the evening. When the fear was past, then durst Atheists scoff and say, that as the Law was given with fire from Mount Sinai, so did these fires confirm their laws."

The curious reader may find this account in David Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, published in 1678, on page 783. It fully explains the tradition of the Black Saturday as well as the cause of the phenomenon, which seems to have been nothing more than an usual hailstorm accompanied with thunder and lightning, darkening the very heavens over Elinburg, and coming down the pages of history, and handed from father to son as a fearful and memorable occurrence happening as it did in connection with other notable events.

Will the other Advent papers copy this article so as to correct any wrong views that may have grown out of the term, Black Saturday, as referring to the dark day of May 19th, 1780? Error will never help a good cause. We want only the truth.

D. T. TAYLOR.

Worcester, Dec. 22nd, 1855.

The Parable of the Fig-Tree. Matt. xxiv, 32.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—It is very necessary that the Lord's honest hearted children understand this similitude in this last generation. When the Saviour sat upon the mount of Olives [Matt. xxiv, 3] the disciples came to him privately and asked him three questions: 1st. When shall these things be; (to wit, the throwing down of the Temple;) 2d. The sign of Christ's coming, and, 3d. The end of the world.

The Saviour commences with this caution: Take heed that no man deceive you: a good admonition in these last days of peril. He then commences and gives the signs and troubles that would precede and attend the destruction of Jerusalem. Verse 29. Immediately after the tribulation of those days, (of Papal persecution,) 1st, the sun shall be darkened, and 2d, the moon shall not give her light, and 3d, the stars (meteors) shall fall from heaven.

I now believe that these three great signs are sufficient for a basis for faith to rest on that the Son of man is nigh, even at the doors. I believe that if we include the other five things spoken of by our Lord on that occasion, we get too much; to wit, the shaking of the powers of heaven, and the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and the mourning of the tribes of earth, and the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, and the sending of the angels with a great sound of a trumpet to gather his elect from the four winds, (or quarters of the earth,) from one end of heaven to the other.

It is very plain that when these things transpire it will be too late to derive any benefit from knowing that he is nigh, even at the doors; for when the voice of God shakes the powers of heaven. Summer, to carry out the parable, is not nigh, but already come; and the wailing of the wicked, and the gathering of the saints, has come; and in fact, the sealing time is passed.

But, says one, immediately after the mentioning of the fig-tree, the Son of man says in verse 33, "When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." I will now inquire, How many things? Answer, all things relating to the parable of the fig-tree, and no more.

We will now paraphrase verses 33, 34, in order to get the true meaning: So likewise ye, when ye shall see, (or know) all these things (or three great signs, the darkening of the sun and moon, and falling of the stars) then know that I am nigh, even at the doors. Verse 34. Verily I say unto you, this generation (or those that see, or have immediate knowledge of, these three great signs) shall not pass till all these things (mentioned before) be fulfilled.

On a thorough examination of the Scriptures, we find the primary signification of generation is from father to son, or the time that class of people would live who were addressed. Admitting this conclusion correct, time is short, for the last sign was the falling stars the 13th of Nov., 1833. Then these things could be seen over 22 years ago.

Now, dear reader, I will not set time but let you calculate the average length of a generation, and before this generation pass the Son of man will be revealed from heaven in the glory of the Father with all the holy angels with him. Shall we be ready when he appeareth?

If any one supposes the coming of the Lord may be delayed for many years to come, it will be well to hear the Saviour again: Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away. Matt. xxiv, 35. In Luke xxi, 29 we have again the parable of the fig-tree, and all the trees, showing us that we can learn not only from the three great signs, but all the passing signs as they transpire. When the true children of God see these things begin to come to pass, they will look up and lift up their heads; for their redemption draweth nigh. Verse 28. It is very evident when our redemption draws nigh then he is nigh, even at the doors, and this takes place when these things begin to come to pass, or the three great leading signs have been seen, so as to be believed without doubting.

When the Saviour speaks in verse 31 of these things coming to pass, and the kingdom of God drawing nigh, it has a comparison to those things relating to the fig-tree and all the trees, and no more. In verse 32, it has reference to all things on this subject; and the generation is not to pass away till all be fulfilled.

My dear brethren and sisters, are we getting ready for these great events just before us; for he saith, "And behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Rev. xxii, 12. Now are we by patient continuance in well-doing seeking for honor, glory, immortality and eternal life? If we want to stand when he appeareth we must do as our Lord has said in Luke xxi, 34. And take heed to yourselves lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life; and so that day come upon you unawares; for as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. Mark that it is on the dwellers but not on the sojourners; for they will be found watching, that that day does not overtake them as a thief; for Jesus says in Rev. iii, "If therefore thou shalt not watch I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee."

O, my brethren, let us be sober and watch unto prayer; resist the enemy and overcome at last, and be forever with the Lord in the golden city on the new earth.

SELF-EXAMINATION.—The Christian that grows in grace often examines his own heart. He takes his bearings. He looks at the direction in which he is moving and the progress which he is making. He is not contented unless he is advancing unless he is gaining some new victory over self, over Satan, or over the world. He compares himself with himself, and then with the perfect standard.

CAST THY CARE ON HIM.

WEARY traveler, cast thy care
On the Saviour:
Quickly to his throne repair,
He will hear thy humble prayer,
Always—ever.

True and faithful is thy Friend,
Ever near.
He will watch thee, and defend,
He'll be with thee to the end,
And wipe thy tear.

Or is thy soul by sorrow riven,
Mid sin and care?
Hope on—this promise sure is given:
The pure on earth shall meet in heaven:
No sorrow there.

There is beyond a happier land,
Far, far from this;
Martyrs next the throne will stand,
Saints will meet a glorious band—
A world of bliss.

As on life's rugged path we go,
We'll trust thy love.
Whate'er our lot on earth—we know
We soon shall part with all below,

Then cast thy load of doubt away,
And never roam:
He'll lead thee to the realms of day,
He'll guard and lend a beauteous ray,
To guide thee home.—Sel.

SIGNS OF THE END.

A LETTER FROM M. S. AVERY TO HER SISTER.

MY DEAR SISTER:—I have long wished to write but have hesitated, knowing that I must speak the true sentiments of my heart in regard to some points; and this I have feared would grieve you. I know that as far as religion is concerned, I am very unpopular; and I have feared that if I should speak to my sister concerning this, I should be called an enthusiast or a fanatic; but I will try to overcome this, and talk with you in love, and without fear, lest your blood be required at my hands in the great day of accounts, which is not far distant. Very bitter indeed would be the reproaches of a dear brother or sister in that solemn day, such as these: "O you had the truth, you knew the way, you saw danger approaching and thickening around, and you warned us not!" I mean by the grace of God assisting, to clear my skirts, and have a conscience void of offense that my heart condemn me not.

I am well aware of the position you occupy, and if I rightly understand Bible truth, I much fear you are in a dangerous place, and have embraced errors that are fatal in the extreme; errors which have no doubt a flattering and pleasing appearance, but will in the end plunge their victims into everlasting ruin.

Dear L., I believe the Bible in whole, not in part, to be the sacred and divine revelation of God, and therefore cannot do violence to that word of truth, the christian's guide, by wresting from its pages any part that might not please the carnal propensities of my nature. O that I loved it more, that its heaven-born precepts were more deeply stamped upon my heart! Dear sister, do you not read enough of this book to show you that we are living in the last days, in the closing up of time? Do not the signs of the times speak as with "trumpet tones," that soon He that shall come will come, and will not tarry? Heb. x, 37. Even him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, any signs, and lying wonders. See 2 Thess. ii, 9. This working of Satan is nothing more nor less than "Spirit Manifestations." What are they, but lying signs and wonders, wrought by the adversary of souls to deceive, and lead them captive at his will?

We read in 1 Tim. vi, 16, that God only hath immortality, and in another place, "This mortal must put on immortality," which we cannot do if we have it already on. Also in Ps. cxlvi, 4, "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish." Again, Ps. vi, 5, "For in death there is no remembrance of thee; in the grave who shall give thee thanks?"

Thus the Bible affords ample proof that "the dead know not anything." But the seducing spirits and doctrines of devils spoken of, [1 Tim. 4,] contradict all these repeated truths which God who cannot lie hath spoken, and by them Satan would, with his seductive wiles, have us believe that our dead friends are alive, (immortal,) and holding converse with us, notwithstanding their thoughts perished at death.

The word of inspiration is so positive and plain on this subject, that those who read and believe the testimony, cannot be deceived. Yes, 'tis a precious truth, that those who have immortality must seek for it, and obtain it alone through Jesus Christ. Otherwise his death and sufferings are all in vain.

My dear sister, when I see that yourself, with millions of others, are caught in the Deceiver's snare, I tremble at the dreadful prospect before you. O, be entreated of one who loves you dearly, to make your escape while there is hope. You may be astonished at my alarm, and perhaps think my fears are groundless; but I would point you to the prophet Isaiah, chap. viii: "And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and that mutter, should not a people seek unto their God? For the living to the dead! To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

The testimony of the "rappers" does not accord with the word, and I therefore conclude that we might well be alarmed at the rapid progress of Spiritualism. O that you could see as plainly as I see it, that we are in the close of this world's history! Read for my sake, dear sister, 2 Tim. iii, and then judge candidly if we are not in the last days—in the perilous times there brought to view. Are not men lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false-accusers, incontinent, fierce, and despisers of those that are good? Are they not high-minded, and lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God? Have they not also the form of godliness, denying the power thereof?

Now I beg you to seriously consider this scripture, and deny if you can, that we are seeing its complete fulfillment daily? Yes, methinks we need not go beyond the limits of our own households, to discover those that are disobedient to parents; and you and I well know that children are not now as they were when we were named among them. Where, O where, is that becoming bashfulness or modesty, together with the regard for old age, that characterized the children of "by-gone-days?" Where is the respect for parents, although their hairs are silvered with age, among the youth of the present generation? And why is all this? Because we are living in the very eve of time, when we are pointed to these signs, and, as a matter of course, they have come.

We are also informed in 2 Pet. iii, that there shall be scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? and 2 Tim. iii, says, "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived;" and it is even so—it is Bible truth.

I take the following extract from a Universalist paper, the Star in the West, Vol. xix, No. 44:

"Our country seems to be rapidly degenerating. There is no limit to the follies and vices of thousands in our large cities. The present generation bids fair to exceed in frivolity and extravagance anything that has ever preceded it since the foundation of the Republic. Let it not be forgotten that the effeminacy of a people is the surest forerunner of the decay of a nation."

These are startling truths, and the world is in a fearful condition. Many it seems know this; but understand not the meaning. Our land of boasted liberty and freedom is polluted with deeds of the blackest dye; and yet they do not see that destruction is coming.

I would now ask you to take a view of the professed churches of Christ. Do not they join hands with the world? Do not they dress and act like the world? Do they not love pleasure more than God? Are they merciful to the poor? Are they not ornamented with gold, (which is forbidden by the Word,) and costly apparel, while the widow and fatherless are perhaps famishing for the necessities of life within their call? Such poor souls realize not that there is a fearful retribution hastening on. Terrible indeed will be the reckoning! They profess to love God, but in works they deny him. If by chance they hear the Second Advent mentioned, they will deridingly sneer and scoff, and perhaps get angry, and say, "If the Lord ever comes, it won't be in my day." Thus they are giving the "peace and safety" cry, spoken of in 1 Thess. v. But we are there told that "sudden destruction cometh upon them, and they shall not escape."

O what a blessed promise still awaits those faithful martyrs, for they have not yet received it. See verse 39. And in the glorious morning, when the sleeping dust of millions shall arise by the power of God, and put on immortality, they too will be remembered, and will then receive a full reward. Yes the day is very near, when those that have lost their lives for the witness of Jesus, shall come forth. Looking forward to that day of joy, all the prophets of old died in faith, not having yet received the promise; but they are soon to realize all their hopes. The solemn splendors of that morning will soon open before us, when lo! they shall arise and shout victory over the grave. At the sound of the last trumpet, every saint will be awakened, not one left or forgotten. But I fear that I am wearying your patience, and you are beginning to think me a "Millerite" in good earnest; but bear with me a little longer, and I will try to be brief.

Although I have shown you a few of the prominent signs of the Lord's soon coming, undoubtedly, you think me foolish for believing it, when Wm. Miller taught the same in 1844, and he did not come. But my dear L., if I expect you on a visit next Spring, and you fail to come at the time looked for, shall I rashly give it up forever, and say you will never come? How absurd this course would be; but if on the other hand I love you with true affection, with what almost impatient anxiety, would I wait, and even watch for your coming?

It may be well here to mention the great disappointment experienced in '44 by those who were animated by the blessed hope of soon seeing Jesus. This doctrine as taught by Mr. Miller, was, I believe, the gospel of the kingdom, that should be preached to every nation, tongue and people, for it went to the remotest parts of the earth. To the United States, or North America alone, this cry, "The hour of his judgment is come," was not confined. The far-off isles of the ocean heard it; and it aroused the people of the eastern continent. Thousands and millions feared it was too true. Yes, the very world stood in awe, at the expected coming of the King of heaven. But the time of trial came, and the hopes of many an honest soul were seemingly crushed at once. The world, and even those professing godliness, looked on in mockery and derision. The time of danger had passed; their fears were quelled; and they could now scoff and sneer with impunity. Do not think, dear sister, that all those persecuted souls called Millerites, gave up the ship when the storm arose. O no! Many faithful souls endured the trial of their faith, although severely tested. Their position was carefully examined again and again: it was all right. Their reckoning was true: figures would not lie. But the mistake, how, or where was it? It was so to be; but time and study have since revealed it. You will find the foundation of this doctrine in Dan. viii, 14. "Unto two thousand three hundred days, then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed."

days, to cleanse it; but although he came not to earth, he entered the Most Holy of the heavenly Sanctuary then, and is now offering his blood for the blotting out of the sins of the people. This I understand to be the judgment spoken of, which begins at the house of God. 1 Pet. iv, 17. Should you scruple the idea of a Sanctuary being in heaven, consult the following scriptures: Ps. cii, 19; xvi, 6; Heb. viii, 1, 2.

Thus we see that the hour of his judgment came, and the proclamation was not an untruth, as we often hear it called. I believe we are now, and have been since 1844, in the waiting time. See Hab. ii, 3. If the Lord had come when nearly all expected him, the scriptures would not have been fulfilled; for we read that he shall come as a snare, and a thief in the night. But how few are now looking for "this same Jesus that went away into heaven," although we are assured he shall come again in many places in the Word. And we are also informed of the destruction of the antediluvian world by water; of the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah; of the first advent of the Saviour, and also his death, resurrection and ascension.

All these truths are readily admitted and generally believed by the world, and yet by the same word we are told that the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, that Jesus shall come in the glory of his Father, that the dead know not anything, that the soul that sinneth it shall die. But who regards these truths? A very few believe them. O what inconsistency! Does not the very fulfillment of the prophecy of the first advent prove that of the second to be true? Says Jesus, "As it was in the days of Noah so also shall the coming of the Son of man be." They were eating and drinking, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away. 'Tis sad indeed now-a-days to see the reflections that are cast on the Bible. But says Solomon, [Prov. xiii, 13,] Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed; but he that feareth the commandment shall be rewarded.

And now before I close, a word on the Sabbath. Christ says, "I came not to destroy the law or the prophets." And again, "I have kept my Father's commandments." John xv, 10. Now if he did not destroy but kept the law, why too should we not keep it? We read that God is unchangeable; that he gave the commandments to men, and yet poor, imperfect, erring man, has dared to alter God's law, that Paul calls holy, just and good, by keeping the first day of the week in place of the seventh. Some blindly think this will do just as well, or the observance of any day that will make a seventh part of the week, but this is making void the law of God.

I could produce much proof in favor of the true Sabbath, if it were necessary. I think you have some good testimony in the little pamphlets I once sent you, and were I assured that they were read, and proved interesting, I would send more, and such as might give entire satisfaction on other subjects that I have briefly touched, more justly than it is in my power to do. I will now close this subject by referring you to the language of Solomon: "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man." Eccl. xii, 13.

And now, my dear sister, nearly all the signs of the end are in the past. The darkening of the sun and moon took place May 19, 1780, immediately after the tribulation of the Papal persecution; and the next sign in order, the falling of the stars, occurred Nov. 13, 1833; and the next we are to expect, the powers of the heavens will be shaken, and the sign of the Son of man appear in heaven. Then all the tribes of the earth shall mourn, and those that are not prepared, and have not the seal of the living God, will then join in the awful prayer, "Rocks and mountains, fall on us!" Not having done the will of God, they will pass away with the world. Whether we are ready or not, sure it is that the scenes of earth will soon close. Surely "destruction cometh; and they shall seek peace, and there shall be none."

And now I hope you will not take all that I have said as my say so. I have endeavored to produce some scripture proof; for I would not that you should think the foundations of my faith are to be found in man-made creeds, or aught but the Bible. I could yet write pages on these subjects so interesting to me, could I know you are also interested.

Now, my dear sister, I bid you farewell, sincerely hoping you may be led to investigate; search the Bible for yourself, and see the truth as it is.

Affectionately yours. M. S. AVERY.

Babylon's End Approacheth!

It is apparent that the Lord in his instruction to his people, employs things animate and inanimate, beasts, nations, trees, cities, &c., to instruct and forewarn them of their whereabouts on the stream of time, and their entrance into the vast ocean of eternity. Dan. vii; Isa. xiv, 8; xxi, 13; Rev. xviii, 5; Isa. xxvi, 1, 2.

In examining and comparing Rev. xviii and Isa. xlvii, we find a striking similarity. The boast of Babylon's exaltation, of being no widow, and the enchantments and sorceries of one, which are the works of the other, by foul spirits of devils, and also the gradation, but precipitance of her judgments, ending alike, in her being burned, show that the same symbol is used in both places.

We feel warranted in the fear of the Lord, for the sake of giving light to the remnant, and warning honest souls that are deceived by fallen Babylon, to apply the instructions of those chapters to the popular fallen churches of this day.

The boast of sitting a queen, and "I am, and none else beside me; I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children," is thus answered by the scriptures: "But these two things shall come to thee in a moment, in one day, the loss of children, and widowhood: they shall come upon thee in their perfection." Isa. xlvii, 8, 9.

The rejection of the nominal churches came when they had acted out their hate fully, towards the proclamation of Christ's second coming, and towards them who loved and proclaimed it, in 1844. There was the "year day" of her divorce and loss of children. It is believed that fifty thousand lovers of the of the coming of Christ left the churches in that year. They have borne testimony to the same in the amplest manner in their reports. For sufficient evidence see their admissions noted in the "Signs of the Times," a pamphlet printed at the Advent Review Office, Battle Creek, Mich., pp. 86-90.

And after their fall mentioned in Rev. xiv, 8, which was proclaimed throughout the land in 1844, Rev. xviii, announces that "Babylon is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit," which is fulfilling by the spirits of devils working miracles through members of the churches, by spirit developments since 1844.

Notwithstanding the awful fall of Babylon, we hear the voice of long-suffering mercy, saying, "Come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues."

This is a moral fall; and of an organization that encircles the people of God, and is of importance sufficient to intoxicate all nations and kings of the earth with the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and make rich through the abundance of her delicacies the merchants of the earth.

Who is this Babylon? She is not the nations, nor kings, nor the merchants, of the earth; as in their sphere of organization, they are of the masculine gender, and of one party; but Babylon is the boasting queen, feminine, on the other hand.

Her widowhood has come, and loss of children, in spite of her boast, sufficient to warrant the application of the symbol. But we expect that this will be to a greater degree; and then "a voice of the cry of the shepherds, and an howling of the principals of the flock, shall be heard; for the Lord hath spoiled their pasture." Jer. xxv, 36.

Here I would state what I witnessed on First-day, Feb. 22d. The circumstances were, that some of the most humble members of a Wesleyan church who had become anxious to hear on our faith, induced me to go to the W. house to solicit an opportunity for Bro. J. N. L. to preach in their house. Soon after I was seated, the minister of the day, who was not the incumbent in charge, but the teacher of the seminary, who I soon concluded was not preaching for "bread and butter," took for his text, Neh.

THE REVIEW AND HERALD.

"Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH. OCT. 16, 1856.

THE SEVEN CHURCHES.

"I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet, saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last; and, What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia: unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea." Rev. i, 10, 11.

Commentators generally suppose that the testimony to the seven churches was given for the benefit of only seven literal churches in Asia. But we must agree with some modern expositors, that these seven churches should be understood as representing seven conditions of the Christian church, in seven periods of time, covering the ground of the entire Christian age; and here are some of our reasons:

1. The great design of the book of Revelation, it will be admitted, was to foretell the great events of the Christian age, (with which the people of God were to be connected,) which have occurred since the book was written, which are occurring, and which are yet to take place. It is true that in a very few instances, past and present events are mentioned in this book, as in the case of the woman with the crown of twelve stars, and the man-child which was caught up to God and his throne, [Rev. xii, 1-5,] but in all such cases the past and present are alluded to only to introduce future events, which are the burden of the prophecy in all cases. The book commences thus: "The Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass." Rev. i, 1. If seven literal churches of Asia only are described in the prophecy, as they then existed, John was shown what had come to pass.

2. The book of Revelation is a prophecy, and not a description of what was then past, neither of what then existed. "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein; for the time is at hand." Rev. i, 3. Who will pretend that the first three chapters of Revelation are a prophecy, if they understand them as relating the character of seven literal churches in Asia? No one.

3. The book of Revelation is dedicated to the seven churches in Asia. Said the angel to John, "What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia; unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea." Rev. i, 11. Are any disposed to say that this entire book was dedicated to only seven of the then existing churches? We would inquire of them, first, Why dedicated to them only? Why not to the churches in Corinth, Cappadocia, Galatia, Thessalonica, Philippi, Colosse, Rome, Jerusalem, Bithynia, &c., as well as to the seven churches in Asia? And, second, Why is the Revelation dedicated to those churches which lived before the fulfillment of nearly all of the prophecy of the book? Of what use to the seven literal churches in Asia could the prophecy of the Papal beast be? or the woe trumpets, the two-horned beast, the three angels' messages, the last plagues, or any portion of that prophecy that has been fulfilling the past fifteen centuries? We answer, Of no use. But when we apply the seven churches to seven distinct periods of the Christian age, in which the book of Revelation has been fulfilling, and understand the prophecy as describing seven distinct conditions of the Christian church, all is plain and forcible. Many other reasons might be given for applying the prophecy to the seven churches in Asia to the whole church of Christ in seven periods of the entire Christian age; but these affording sufficient proof, must suffice for the present.

We will now take up the churches in their order, as given in the Revelation. And here we would suggest, that the reason why these seven churches in Asia are used to represent the Christian church in her several states down to the end of this age, is because the significations of the names of those churches describe the spirit and character of the several periods of the Christian church.

FIRST CHURCH.

"Unto the angel of the church of Ephesus write: These things saith he that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, who walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks: I know thy works, and thy labor, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil; and thou hast tried them which say they are apostles and are not, and hast found them liars; and hast borne, and hast patience, and for my name's sake hast labored, and hast not fainted. Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love. Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent. But this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate. He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." Rev. ii, 1-7.

Ephesus signifies, "desirable, chief." This was true of the first age of the church, in the apostles' days. They had received the doctrine of Christ pure from the mouth of the great Teacher, and the Holy Spirit was poured out, and rested upon them. The gifts of the Spirit were with the church. It was noted for "works," "labor," and "patience, and could not bear them which were evil." God could dwell with such a church, and manifest his power in their midst. Yet there were some things against this desirable church, in consequence of which they were called upon to repent.

SECOND CHURCH.

"And unto the angel of the church in Smyrna write: These things saith the first and the last, which was dead, and is alive: I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty, but thou art rich; and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan. Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: behold the Devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried, and ye shall have tribulation ten days: be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." Verses 8-11.

Smyrna signifies "myrrh," denoting that the church in this age would be a sweet-smelling savor to God, while passing through the fiery ordeal of persecution; which has always served to keep out pride, popularity, and self-dependence—the bane of true faith, piety and devotion. This state reached down to Constantine, covering the period of what is called the ten persecutions. See Buck's Theological Dictionary, pp. 332, 333. For want of room we can give here only his statement of the last.

"The tenth began in the nineteenth year of Diocletian, 303. In this dreadful persecution, which lasted ten years, houses filled with Christians were set on fire, and whole droves were tied together with ropes and thrown into the sea. It is related that 17,000 were slain in one month's time; and that during the continuance of this persecution, in the province of Egypt alone, no less than 144,000 Christians died by the violence of their persecutors; besides 700,000 that died through the fatigues of banishment, or the public works to which they were condemned."

The tribulation of "ten days," mentioned in the testimony to the Smyrna church, may well apply to the last of the ten persecutions, which continued ten years; yet some apply it to all ten. The continued scenes of martyrdom and dreadful cruelty continually before this church were sufficient to keep hypocrites and worldlings out of the church; and the constant expectation that some dreadful death would end their probation, led them to purity of life. There is no fault found with this church. "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life," was the only hope of this holy church.

THIRD CHURCH.

"And to the angel of the church in Pergamos write: These things saith he which hath the sharp sword with two edges: I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is; and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith, even in those days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth. But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumblingblock before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication. So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which thing I hate. Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth. He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." Verses 12-17.

Pergamos signifies "very earthy, elevated." This period reached from Constantine, about 313, down to the rise of anti-christ, about 538. During this period the church became very earthly, having her worldly policy, and like the church of this day, attending to the ceremonies and forms of religion, and neglecting inward piety, the graces of the Spirit, and the life and power of the religion of Jesus. Here was the falling away mentioned by Paul. 2 Thess. ii, 3. Fault is found with this church, and it is here called upon to repent. But this was the age that prepared the church to receive to her bosom the monster, "man of sin," "son of perdition."

FOURTH CHURCH.

"And unto the angel of the church in Thyatira write: These things saith the Son of God, who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire, and his feet are like fine brass: I know thy works, and charity, and service, and faith, and thy patience, and thy works; and the last to be more than the first. Notwithstanding I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols. And I gave her space to repent of her fornication, and she repented not. Behold, I will cast her into a bed, and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, except they repent of their deeds. And I will kill her children with death; and all the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: and I will give unto every one of you according to your works. But unto you I say, and unto the rest in Thyatira, (as many as have not this doctrine, and which have not known the depths of Satan, as they speak,) I will put upon you none other burden; but that which ye have already, hold fast till I come. And he that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations. And he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers; even as I received of my Father. And I will give him the morning star. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Verses 18-28.

Thyatira signifies, "sweet savor of labor, or sacrifice and contrition;" and is a description of the church during the 1260 years of Papal supremacy. This age of dreadful cruelty, and martyrdom of the true church, improved her real condition. "I know thy works, and charity, and patience, and thy works; and the last to be more than the first." How necessary to the purity and prosperity of the church, has been persecution and affliction; how corrupting and destructive to holiness has been worldly prosperity!

Verse 20 is strong testimony that we have correctly applied these churches. Jezebel is a figurative name, alluding to Ahab's wife, who slew the prophets of the Lord, led her husband into idolatry, and fed the prophets of Baal at her own table. A more striking figure could not have been used to denote the Papal abominations. See 1 Kings xviii, xix, xxi. It is very evident from history, as well as from this verse, that the church of Christ did suffer some of the Papal monks to preach and teach among them. In verse 25 is the charge, "Hold fast till I come." Here is evidence that some who lived near the close of this age of the church would live until the Lord should come. The signs in the sun and moon were fulfilled in 1780, very near the close of this period; and in reference to these signs the Saviour said, "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth near." Luke xxi, 28. The time had come for the church to look up and expect her coming Lord in the clouds of heaven; hence it is said to some in Thyatira, "Hold fast till I come;" to the church in Sardis, "If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee;" and to the church in Philadelphia, "Behold I come quickly." The coming of the Lord is not named in the testimony to the churches before this; but, "be thou faithful unto death," is the charge to them. They could not scripturally look for Christ's second coming in their day. Says Paul, "Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed." Here the church is carried down past the apostasy, and the revelation of the Papacy—down to the period of the special signs of the second advent before she can scripturally expect Christ's second coming. These facts are overwhelming evidence that the seven churches denote seven periods of the entire christian church from the first advent down to the second advent of Christ.

FIFTH CHURCH.

"And unto the angel of the church in Sardis write: These things saith he that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven stars: I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead. Be watchful, and strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die; for I have not found thy works perfect before God. Remember therefore how thou hast received and heard, and hold fast and repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee. Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments, and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy. He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment, and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Chap. iii, 1-6.

Sardis signifies, "song of joy, or that which remains." The last signification is mentioned in verse 2. "Be watchful and strengthen the things that remain." If we are correct in the application of the first four churches, then Sardis represents the nominal churches for the last half century, or more. This church has a name that it lives, but is dead. Look at the exalted position, and name which the nominal churches have had among the nations of the earth. Look at her high-sounding titles, and the applause she receives from what is called the world. The nominal churches have the name of the churches of Jesus Christ, and have the credit of doing much for the world. But they are dead—dead to the pure principles of the gospel, and to good works, as laid down by Christ and the apostles.

But there are "a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments," &c. To this church the message of the coming of the Lord is given, and the cry, Come out of her my people. A few hear, believe and obey. These came out of all the several denominations, and united upon the glorious theme of Jesus' coming, leaving their denominational tenets behind, and formed the

"And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write: These things saith he that is Holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth: I know thy works: behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it; for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name. Behold, I will make them of the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie: behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee. Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth. Behold, I come quickly; hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown. Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out; and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God; and I will write upon him my new name. He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Verses 7-13.

Philadelphia signifies, "brotherly love," and expresses the position and spirit of those who received the advent message up to the Autumn of 1844. As they came out of the sectarian churches, they left party names and party feelings behind, and every heart beat in union as they gave the alarm to the nominal churches and to the world, and pointed to the coming of the Son of man as the consummation of the true believer's hope. Selfishness and covetousness were laid aside, and a spirit of consecration and sacrifice was cherished. The Spirit of God was in every true believing soul, and his praise on every tongue. Those who were not in that movement know nothing of the deep searching of heart, consecration of all to God, peace, joy in the Holy Ghost, and pure, fervent love for each other, which true believers then felt. Those who were in that movement are aware that language would fail to describe that state of "brotherly love."

It will be necessary, for want of room, to pass by many things of interest in the testimony to this church as we have in the testimonies to the former churches; but we call especial attention to verse 7, which establishes the chronology of the church of brotherly love. "These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth, and no man shutteth, and shutteth, and no man openeth." That Christ is here described, no one will deny. He is the rightful heir to David's throne, hence has the key of David, which may represent power. The throne of David, or Christ, on which he is to reign, is in the capital of his kingdom, the New Jerusalem now above. The opening and shutting can refer only to the change of ministration from the Holy to the most Holy of the heavenly Sanctuary, at the end of the 2300 days, in 1844. It was then that the ministration in the Holy Place closed, and the ministration in the most Holy for the forgiveness of sins, and to cleanse the Sanctuary, was opened by him that hath the key of David. "Behold, I set before thee an open door." "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. xi, 19. We can apply texts of this class to no other events than Christ's entering the most Holy, in 1844, and opening his ministration there, where the ark of ten commandments is, hence, since that time the Sabbath, with the whole law of God, has been present truth in a special sense.

Compare with the above texts, Dan. vii, 13, 14; Ps. ii, 8, 9; Rev. xi, 15; Matt. xxv, 10. That Christ receives the kingdom, takes the throne of David, before his second advent, is plainly taught. This union is represented by the marriage, [Matt. xxv, 10,] and is called, "the marriage of the Lamb." Rev. xix, 7. Since 1844, has been the patient, waiting, watching time. "Here is the patience of the saints, here are they that keep the commandments of God." Rev. xiv, 12. "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord when he will return from the wedding," &c. Luke xii, 35, 36.

SEVENTH CHURCH.

"And unto the angel of the church of the Laodiceans write: These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true Witness, the beginning of the creation of God: I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would that thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth. Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see. As many as I love I rebuke and chasten; he zealous, therefore, and repent. Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me. To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Verses 14-22.

Laodicea signifies, "the judging of the people," or, according to Cruden, "a just people," and fitly represents the present state of the church, in the great day of atonement, or judgment of the "house of God" while the just and holy law of God is taken as a rule of life.

It has been supposed that the Philadelphia church reached to the end. This we must regard as a mistake, as the seven churches in Asia represent seven distinct periods of the true church, and the Philadelphia is the sixth, and not the last state. The true church cannot be in two conditions at the same time, hence we are shut up to the faith that the Laodicean church represents the church of God at the present time.

The conditional promises to the Philadelphia church are yet to be fulfilled to that portion of that church who comply with the conditions, pass down through the Laodicean state, and overcome.

But, dear brethren, how humbling to us as a people is the sad description of this church. And is not this dreadful description a most perfect picture of our present condition? It is; and it will be of no use to try to evade the force of this searching testimony to the Laodicean church. The Lord help us to receive it, and to profit by it. What language could better describe our condition as a people, than this addressed to the Laodiceans? "Neither hot nor cold," but "lukewarm." It will not do, brethren, to apply this to the nominal churches, they are to all intents and purposes, "cold." And the nominal Adventists are even lower than the churches, who justly look down upon them with horror for the infidel views, held by many of them, of no Sabbath, no family prayer, no Devil, no operation of the Holy Ghost, no pre-existence of the Son of God, and no resurrection of the unjust.

The word "hot," represents the fervency, zeal and good works which are in accordance with the scriptures. This is not our condition; yet the feeble efforts put forth by us as a people are such that we cannot be said to be "cold." We are "lukewarm." "So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth." These are words of dreadful import. A thorough change is the only hope of the remnant. Here follows the reason why we are so offensive to the Lord: "Because thou sayest, I am rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing." We may not have boasted of our gold, silver, or of this world's goods; but have we not had, more or less, an exulting and an exalted spirit, in view of our position on plain Bible truth? Our positions are fully sustained by an overwhelming amount of direct scriptural testimony; and certainly a theory of divine truth is indispensable; but we, as a people, have evidently rested down upon a theory of truth, and have neglected to seek Bible humility, Bible patience, Bible self-denial, and Bible watchfulness, and sacrifice, Bible holiness, and the power and gifts of the Holy Ghost, which the church may enjoy, according to the plain testimony of the Bible. Hence it is said, "And knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." What a condition!

And it is to be feared that many a poor Laodicean is so fast in this delusive snare, as to never fully feel the force of the counsel of the Saviour, to buy of him "gold tried in the fire," "white raiment," and "eyesalve." These we cannot regard as representing the present truth, but rather, the graces of the Spirit, and attainments in the christian course, which the present truth should lead us most earnestly to seek for. "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten; be zealous, therefore, and repent." God's honest people will feel greatly rebuked and chastened by this description of their condition, and they will repent, heartily, zealously; but from the words, "as many," &c., we may fear for some, whose self-righteousness, and self-dependence, have carried them beyond the reach of the reproving Spirit, and the counsel of the true Witness. Dear brethren, read and weep over the touching language from His lips which follows. It is to you.

"Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." How careless many of you have been of the reproofs and warning which the dear Saviour has

I love the prospect of the saints' home. My heart and my treasure are there, and I cannot be left with those who love this world. I realize more than ever that it is through much tribulation that we shall enter the kingdom of God.

Great trials await the remnant, but the grace of God is sufficient, and I desire strength and a willing heart that I may endure to the end and be saved. I choose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. I mean to be an overcomer and meet all who are redeemed from among men, in whose mouth is found no guile, on mount Zion with the Lamb.

Yours in the patience of the saints.

From Sr. Dodge.

BRO. SMITH, I wish to say that the Review is a welcome visitor to us. We read it with delight, and especially the communications from the dear brethren and sisters, which are a comfort to us. We are alone in keeping the Sabbath, there being no one else in the place who keeps it, and yet we are not alone, for the Lord is with us to comfort us in our loneliness.

Let us be of good comfort, and hold out with patience a little longer; for I believe the time is near at hand, when we shall all be gathered home in one family. There will be no lonely ones there.

My dear brethren and sisters, let us strive to be prepared for the coming of the Lord. Let us awake out of sleep, and come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty; let us be zealous and repent, that we may have the tried gold, and white raiment.

What we do, must be done quickly; O that we might all be found, clothed in white raiment, at the Lord's coming!

From your unworthy sister.

Stoddard, N. H. Dec. 16, 1856.

From Sr. Burwell.

BRO. SMITH: I have long felt it my duty to write a few lines through the Review to the brethren and sisters scattered abroad that they may know something of the dealings of God with us, in the year that is past. It is now almost one year since we left our home in Vermont, our friends and relations, and those of like precious faith, and sought a home in the town of Parma Michigan, among strangers, in a strange land.

We have within the past year been called to pass through deep waters of affliction. Sickness and death have entered our family, and taken from our embrace two dear children, an only son aged 18, and our oldest daughter aged 20. Thus has this world become a dark and dreary wilderness to me. Everything of a worldly nature, even our very dwelling, is sad and gloomy. My mind was not in a state to endure such afflictions, and it seemed for a while that I must sink under them, and as though the grave would be a relief. But the Lord has thus far sustained me, and praise his holy name he has promised to be with us in six troubles and in the seventh will not forsake us, if we trust in him. And although these afflictions may seem severe yet we know that he hath done and will do, all things right. I feel now to say with Job though he slay me yet will I trust in him; and I do desire to live so near the Lord that I may learn what he designed I should by these afflictions and to know and do the will of God in all things.

I see truly it is a strait and narrow way to the kingdom; and it is through much tribulation that we enter there. I hope we may all heed the last call, to be zealous and repent, and not think because we have a theory of the truth, and have professed to believe the Third Angel's Message, that we need nothing more; that we are rich and increased in goods, but remember that it is the faithful alone that will reign with Jesus.

Jesus has said, to him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne. Will we let pride, selfishness love of the world or any thing else shut the dear Saviour from our hearts, or will we open the door and welcome him in, that he may sup with us. I mean to seek earnestly for a deeper work of grace in my heart, that I may be prepared for the solemn scenes that are just before us. O let us all awake from stupidity and heed the exhortation of the dear Saviour, to watch lest coming suddenly he find us sleeping.

The Review has always been a welcome messenger to me; but I never knew how to prize it as I do now. It is a source of satisfaction to receive a letter from a friend; but when I get the Review I expect to hear from quite a number of my brethren and sisters, which truly affords comfort and consolation in this time of trial.

The Sabbath-keepers here number twelve, who are striving to keep all of the Commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life. The visits from Bro. and Sr. White, and Brn. Bates and Frisbie, have not been altogether in vain. There appears to be quite an interest to hear on the part of some; and I hope the time is not far distant when our number may be increased by such as will be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. And, dear brother, that you, and others engaged with you in sending out the truth to the world, may be sustained in your arduous labors, is the prayer of your unworthy sister in affliction.

From Sr. Clafin

BRO. SMITH: I think I can make the required response, I can speak but for one, that "as for me" I will serve the Lord; for I believe that the Lord he is God, and I will follow him, his grace assisting me.

How gladly did I receive the light, showing our whereabouts in the stream of time. How often have I wondered, when I looked upon the church and have seen our love growing cold, and severe trials coming in on every hand, and said, what is the matter? I thank God, that he is yet mindful of us, and is showing us what the matter is. Truly it is sad to tell, we are in a deplorable state: about to be spued out of the mouth of God, because we are lukewarm.

Are we not admonished, by this message of the Angel of the church of the Laodiceans. Will we not all take heed to his counsel, that there may none be left behind, or spued out of his mouth.

O, I greatly fear, some will reject the light, as others have done in former days, and he left in darkness, and left to believe strange doctrines and to have their portion in the last plagues, and second death. The people of God have always had something to molest them, and while we look back in the past, we see that second Advent believers have been tested and tried in many ways. The first great test was the disappointment in 1844. We all understand how sorely they were tried then. And the Third Angel followed, with his Message, and light began soon to shine upon the commandments, and the messengers began to proclaim through the land, saying, The Seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.

O, then another trying time had come, more cutting than ever before seemingly, not only to leave brethren and sisters, but the whole world; for they nearly all keep the first day, and how can I come out here alone? we would say, and keep the seventh day. But hard as it was, thank the Lord, a goodly number got strength to step out upon it. Who among us now will reject the light which shows the condition of the church and draw back? I hope none will be left to draw back to perdition, but that we all shall believe to the saving of the soul.

Extracts from Letters.

BRO. S. WARNER writes from Providence, R. I., Dec. 21st, 1856: "I would at this time send to you, and all the brethren who love our Lord, and consent to, and try to keep, the Commandments of God, and the Faith of Jesus, my fraternal love and greeting, and do herein express that I do feel to desire and pray to our God, that your, (and our,) faith may be strengthened, and that your mind may be enlightened, your health preserved, and usefulness increased, that you may be enabled to bring to light, and to the understanding, of all the readers of the Review, things new and old, from the only fountain of truth, yet given to man, for his instruction, i. e., the Holy Bible.

"As I have never had the satisfaction of being personally acquainted with you, and I might say the same of nearly all the true Sabbath-keepers, with the exception of our beloved Bro. Joseph Bates, you will therefore know that it is the cause and the persons I feel the most for. Yet it would be esteemed by me as a great blessing, if I could have the privilege of meeting with others of like precious faith for the worship of God from time to time. But this little spot on the face of the globe seems to be a place where all created beings are constantly and entirely engrossed with the love of gain, and enjoyment of momentary pleasures.

"I do most humbly pray, that myself, your unworthy brother in Jesus, I trust, may be more faithful, more obedient to the commands and will of God, having the mark of the living God, which I understand to be the keeping of God's holy day, the seventh day of the week, the Sabbath of the Lord, or the "Lord's day."

"Blessed be God that he gave me to realize that the mark of the beast, &c., was the obedience of the will to the commands of the beast, Papacy, in keeping the 'Sunday,' and profaning God's Sabbath."

BRO. C. W. STANDISH writes from Milan, Ohio:—"Though I am but a poor Laodicean, I feel encouraged to hope; (for the same Faithful and True Witness says, As many as I love I rebuke, &c.,) and I am resolved to heed the admonition to be zealous and repent. I believe the time is soon coming when this Message will go with a loud voice, and all lovers of truth will be engaged in advancing the last Message of mercy to a rebellious house."

"A Day for a Year." Eze. iv, 6.

Who may say that the "days" brought to view in Hosea vi, 2, will not admit of a similar exposition, as those in Daniel's prophecies, which, to us are of so much importance, in the right understanding of the prophetic scriptures; if they admit of the same interpretation, they would seem to take their date from the call to the Laodicean Church. Notice the first verse of the above chapter, namely, Hosea, vi. Verse 3, also, affords strong evidence that the prophet would, direct our mind to the last great outpouring of the Holy Spirit, as the first is in the past. Counting then, two full years, or prophetic periods of time, from the past Fall, where the call is given, as we believe in truth, to the Laodicean church, we would be carried by "the third day" into the year 1859, and near its close, and if "this generation," which doubtless had its beginning in the year, A. D. 1780, on the 19th of May, closes 19th, May 1860, as I believe from the testimony of David as seen in Psalms xc, 10, then certainly this exposition of Hosea cannot be rejected; as all is to be done, the saints, both living and dead gathered up before the generation closes, or passes. For proof, see Matt. xxiv, 31; 1 Thess. iv, 16; Rev. xx, 5, 6.

Now, taking into the account the present state of the world, and considering the progress of spiritualism in this country; the dominion of the two-horned beast, and location of the false prophet, and also the state of the "True Church," in the hour of his judgment, I would close with the language of the Prophet.

"Come and let us return unto the Lord: for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up." So shall we be prepared for the change from this mortal to immortality. Here is the text; "after two days will he revive us; in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight."

Brethren, and sisters, let us consider it; for I believe that we must have yet a clearer sense of the shortness of time. O Lord revive us now is my prayer

Yours in love, JESSE DORCAS.
Freemont, Ohio, Dec. 16, 1856.

Communication from Bro. Hart.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—I feel it my duty to speak to you through the Review at this time. I am now fully convinced that my course since I moved west has not been such a one as has been calculated to shed a good influence on the side of truth. That is, my course in the affairs of this life has gone to show that my affections were placed on the earth. And in view of the past, I feel to say to my brethren and sisters scattered abroad that I sorrow for my course, and mean to heed the admonition to the Laodiceans, to be zealous and repent.

This testimony has shown me my true condition in the sight of that God who knows my heart. Here light shines from his word like the sun at noon-day. It is a most solemn and awful threatening from the mouth of Jesus, that if we are not zealous he will spue us out of his mouth. Who will heed this warning? Who will give all for the pearl of great price? Who is it that will turn about, and give all for the kingdom? On this message hangs our eternal destiny. Christ is in earnest with his people. It is evident that the Lord is requiring great zeal at this point. Our coming so near the time when the Lord will make his appearing, and our stupidity and great lack of spirituality, demand of us to be awake, and here begin to act like men who wait for the Lord.

Brethren and sisters, what shall I say? Can I say any thing to arouse you from the stupidity that has been so long on us, and has lulled us into a perfect sleep? This sleep, I fear, many will never awake from, until it is for ever too late, the last note of warning being past, and then awake only to receive the wrath of God in the seven last plagues.

My soul is drawn out after you while I write. This is truly a testing truth, and also a very humiliating truth. Poor, miserable, blind and naked, and knew it not. O what a testimony to the remnant! Who will buy gold tried in the fire? (It costs something.) It will cost us all we have. I ask again, Who will give all for the kingdom? Who will sacrifice all for the Lord and his truth?

I do not feel it my duty here to go into the argument to prove that we are in the Laodicean state of the church. Examine what has been written on this subject by J. W. It seems to me as though we were near that point of time when the cases of all the living saints were coming before the Judge of all the earth. Are we in that state of affliction of soul that is required of us according to the type? I think not. That required the affliction of their souls. And if we are not found in that state of affliction, that is, humility, sobriety, self-sacrificing and mourning for our sins, God will spue us out of his mouth.

The inquiry may arise, What shall I do? The testimony comes home to us from our Saviour, [Luke xii.] Be like men who wait for the coming of their Lord. No longer let your works deny your faith. Step out upon the truth with your whole soul. It will bear you. Brethren and sisters, lean upon the arm of God for strength. His arm is mighty, and he will never let those who trust in him fall.

I feel like giving all for the truth, and mean also to be zealous in this matter. Shall we be among that class of servants who say in their heart, My Lord delays his coming, and our portion at last be found among the hypocrites? Remember that our lives are an index to our hearts. What has the world learned from this index the few past years? They have learned that we have an inheritance on this earth that we esteem dear to us. Yes, they have learned that we really love this inheritance. Has it not been so? The testimony our Saviour is, [Rev. iii.] that we are blind. What has blinded us? Paul testifies that the god of this world blinds men. O let us remember that this world has a thousand charms to draw our minds away from the truth, and that there is danger of our being drawn into the pit at last. Let us arise and lay aside the world. It is a garment of unrighteousness. Let us put on the garment of righteousness. The zeal that will be manifest by God's children, under this message, I think will bring the loud cry. Not the wars of the old world; not the troubles of this country; but a consistent life with our profession will meet with the approbation of God, and prepare his children to give the loud cry of the Third Message.

Communication from Bro. Everts.

DEAR BRETHREN: I am passing through a solemn train of thought. The question with me is, Where are we? I answer, More than twelve years past the proclamation "The hour of his Judgment is come." Rev. xiv, 6, 7. We have been the same length of time in the cleansing of the Sanctuary. Dan. viii, 14. I inquire, What was the cleansing of the Sanctuary under the first covenant? It was a day of judgment. What did it typify? The work in the antitypical Sanctuary, which has been going on since A. D. 1844; since the announcement, "The hour of his judgment is come." O how much weight and solemnity in the word, Judgment! It should cause every one to ask, When does it take place? "To the law and the testimony," is our motto. It was future from Paul's day; for he "reasoned of a Judgment to come." Acts xxiv, 25. Our Saviour declared that his words would judge men in the last days.

I understand that judgment must be rendered before Christ comes; for when he comes it will be to raise the righteous saints, and change the living saints, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; [1 Cor. xv, 52:] which, being an instantaneous work, would allow of no time at that moment for judgment. Judgment must be passed upon all who share in eternal life at the coming of Christ, before he comes, and during the existence of the last generation on earth. As proof of this, we quote the words of the Apostle, which show that the dead are judged while some are alive: "Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick [living] and the dead. For for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according [in like manner] to men in the flesh, [living men,] but live according to God, in the Spirit." 1 Pet. iv, 5, 6.

When this judgment is rendered, I understand that the solemn declaration will be announced, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still." Then Christ exclaims, "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me." Rev. xxii, 11, 12.

Therefore, my dear brethren, believing that Christ will soon come, I inquire again, Where are we? I answer, In the judgment of the saints; for Peter says that judgment first begins at the house of God. Chap. iv, 17. It appears that the order is, that the righteous dead have been under investigative judgment since 1844. And now the message that we passed from the sixth phase of the gospel church, which was the Philadelphia, or brotherly-love state, in 1844; and that we are in the Laodicean or judging-of-the-people condition, and are lukewarm. The appeal of the Faithful and True Witness is a perfect antitypical parallel to that which decided in solemn judgment the fate of the Hebrew church on the tenth day of the seventh month, near the close of all their sanctuary scenes, which shadowed the great decisive judgment in the end of the world. What are they? "For whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people." Lev. xxiii, 29. Be zealous and repent, [afflicted,] or I will spue thee out of my mouth; [cut thee off from among the people of God.] Rev. iii, 14, 19.

My dear Brethren, from the scripture referred to I solemnly believe that the judgment has been going on in the Heavenly Sanctuary since 1844, and that upon the righteous dead, from "righteous Abel" down through patriarchs, prophets, martyrs, and all the saints who have fallen asleep in Jesus, judgment has been passing. How solemn the thought, that perhaps, our companions, our children, brother or sister, has been passing the great momentous review that will entitle them to a glorious immortal body at the coming of Christ.

The solemn declaration that the Laodiceans know not that they are wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked, and that they are exhorted, yea, commanded, to be zealous and repent, under the awful penalty of being spued out of the True Witness' mouth, has thrilled my whole being.

I call to mind, What have I been about! I find by serious reflection that my poverty comes upon me like an armed man. I look back to the Philadelphia ground on which I stood in 1844, my heart filled with brotherly love, the full hope of salvation like a powerful anchor or a dazzling helmet, on my head, walking softly before the Lord, dead to the world, looking only for a heavenly inheritance and with deep shame and regret, I see that I have taken a journey into a foreign land, and wasted all that blessed portion that my heavenly Father bestowed on me. I confess with shame and regret, that my worldly mindedness and conduct has made me a citizen of this world, and I have filled myself with nothing better than husks, till I am perishing with starvation.

My dear brethren, I humbly confess that I have ensnared and loaded down myself and others around me with cares to a degree unbecoming and unfitting to one who professes to be living and hoping for a better inheritance. I confess that I have sinned before my dear brethren and heaven, and I mean by the grace of the Lord assisting me, to be zealous and repent by turning about immediately.

I have placed my lands, my entire earthly substance, on the altar anew, (if I am not deceived,) and throw myself on to the consecrated altar, and pray that the Lord will direct me by his unerring and heavenly wisdom, and lead me by his opening providence until the sacrifice is entirely used up in the cause of God. I know that there is bread enough and to spare in my heavenly Father's house.

APPOINTMENTS.

PROVIDENCE permitting there will be a Conference at Rouse's Point, N. Y., commencing February 6th, at 10 o'clock A. M., and continue as long as thought best. Will not the brethren come to this meeting prepared to take hold in earnest, on this last note of warning, and observe February 6th as a day of fasting and prayer, that the Lord may give us the eye-salve to see the importance of securing the white raiment and the gold tried in the fire, by which we shall stand the conflict that is before us.

In behalf of the church.

C. W. SPERRY.
A. S. HUTCHINS.

There will be a general conference held at the house of Bro. John Stowell in Washington, N. H., commencing sixth day evening Jan. 23d, and continue over Sabbath and first day. Will Bro. Hutchins, Sperry, and Stone, make an effort to attend and as many other brethren from abroad as have a mind to work.

As it is not convenient for Bro. Stowell to accommodate as many as formerly, it will be necessary for brethren from abroad to come prepared to take care of themselves as far as they can, and thereby help bear the burden of this meeting which is designed for the especial benefit of the saints that are zealous to repent.

In behalf of the church.

THE REVIEW AND HERALD

"Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH. FEB. 12, 1857.

THE SEVEN CHURCHES, SEVEN SEALS, AND FOUR BEASTS.

"THE book of Revelation," says Wm. Miller, "has been called by thousands a sealed book; and many a dear saint, while in this imperfect state of vision and knowledge, has wept much, because they could not read and understand the book. For it is very evident that the book of Revelation is not only interesting in its symbolical and mystical descriptions, natural scenery, and figurative language, but it is rich in truth, and the communication of events then hid under the veil of futurity, and would only be unfolded to the natural visions of men, many ages to come. John has written this book after the laws of nature; that is, he has seemed to copy after some of the richest and most picturesque scenes in nature's laws. He has, in revealing truths to our minds, followed the same steady course that fountains of water do in their course to the sea. He begins as it were back upon the mountains, where the head may be but a fountain, and there gives us a description of the source. He then glides gently along through the vale below, winding between hills and mountains, visiting in his course the hamlets of the peasant, the villages of men, the populous towns and cities of commerce, until he lands us or leaves us in the ocean of eternity. At first, he appears to be describing some bubbling fountain or gentle spring, and swelling in importance as he proceeds, brings in and adds every important stream of events, deepens and widens in his course, until he makes his prophetic history like a deep-flowing river, bearing upon its bosom the gallant ships and galley with oars. At first, he describes a pebbly brook murmuring along the hills, now and then bursting into view with some gentle fall, then gliding softly away, until it meets some rugged head-land, shifts its course, and almost seems to retrace its path; then, suddenly bursting from the hills in cataracts of foam, bounding from rock to rock, leaping into the vale below, he again seems to follow the alluvial flats and receives his tributary streams, winds on his way, until it falls at its mouth by a tremendous leap into a gulf of waters, and is swallowed up in the waves of the sea."—Miller's Lectures.

Three times, at least, the Revelator brings us down in this manner, as though he had begun on one mountain, and had traced three different streams of history down to the great ocean of eternity. The seven churches of Asia present a history of the church of Christ in her seven forms, in all her prosperity and adversity, from the days of the apostles, down to the end. The seven seals are a history of the transactions of the powers and kings of the earth over the church and God's protection of his people during the same time.

There are other prophecies of this kind in the book of Revelation, which do not cover the entire ground of the Christian age, but are equally important with these mentioned; such as the seven-headed, and two-horned beasts of chap. xiii, and the angels of chap. xiv.

How wonderfully strange, that professed ministers of Jesus Christ should call the book of Revelation a mystery, when the Revelator has in the prophecy of this book spanned the whole length of the Christian age with many prophetic descriptions not only pertaining to earthly governments, but delineating the character and condition of the true church in her changes of prosperity and adversity. Line upon line, line upon line is thus given to point out to the Christian traveler his whereabouts on the highway of time.

We will now follow down two of these prophetic streams for near 1800 years, and compare them with the four beasts of chap. iv. They cover four distinct periods, and reach to within less than a century of the present time. They are the first four churches of Rev. ii, and the first four seals of chap. vi.

FIRST PERIOD.

First Church. "Unto the angel of the church of Ephesus write: These things saith he that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, who walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks: I know thy works, and thy labor, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil; and thou hast tried them which say they are apostles and are not, and hast found them liars; and hast borne, and hast patience, and for my name's sake hast labored, and hast not fainted." Rev. ii, 1-3.

This was true of the witnesses of Jesus Christ in the days of the apostles. That church was noted for its works, and labor, and patience. One of its praiseworthy traits was faithfulness. It tried false apostles, and found them liars. That church viewed sin in all its sinfulness, and could not bear them that were evil. Christ could dwell with such a church and manifest his power in their midst, and go forth with them to battle with principalities, powers, and spiritual wickedness.

First Seal. "And I saw when the Lamb opened one of the seals, and I heard, as it were the noise of thunder, one of the four beasts saying, Come and see. And I saw, and behold a white horse: and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him: and he went forth conquering, and to conquer." Chap. vi, 1, 2.

The personage riding forth, conquering and to conquer, upon the white horse, represents the Lord Jesus Christ leading on the apostolic church, as they went forth in the power of the gospel, and gained great victories by the power of the Holy Ghost. See Acts of the Apostles.

First Beast. "And the first beast was like unto a lion." Chap. v, 7. It is said at the opening of the first seal, that one of the four beasts said, "Come and see." This beast evidently represents the church in the same period as the first seal, and the first church. This beast was like a lion, bold and strong, fitly representing the apostolic church.

SECOND PERIOD.

Second Church. "And unto the angel of the church in Smyrna write: These things saith the first and the last, which was dead, and is alive: I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty, but thou art rich; and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are of the synagogue of Satan. Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: behold the Devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried, and ye shall have tribulation ten days: be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Rev. ii, 8-10.

This testimony describes scenes of persecution, tribulation, poverty and peril to the followers of Jesus Christ; yet the church in this period was rich in faith, and good works. This state covered most of the period called by some historians, the ten persecutions, which closed about A. D. 313. Charles Buck, in his Theological Dictionary, pp. 332, 333, speaking of this period of dreadful persecution, says:

"Historians usually reckon ten general persecutions, the first of which was under the emperor Nero, thirty-one years after our Lord's ascension, when that emperor, having set fire to the city of Rome, threw the odium of that execrable action on the Christians. First, Those were apprehended who openly avowed themselves to be of that sect; then by them were discovered an immense multitude, all of whom were convicted. Their death and tortures were aggravated by cruel derision and sport; for they were either covered with the skins of wild beasts and torn in pieces by devouring dogs, or fastened to crosses, and wrapped up in combustible garments, that, when the daylight failed, they might, like torches, serve to dispel the darkness of the night. For this tragical spectacle Nero lent his own gardens; and exhibited at the same time the public diversions of the circus; sometimes driving a chariot in person, and sometimes standing as a spectator, while the shrieks of women burning to ashes supplied music for his ears. 2. The second general persecution was under Domitian, in the year 95, when 40,000 were supposed to have suffered martyrdom. 3. The third began in the third year of Trajan, in the year 100, and was carried on with great violence for several years. 4. The fourth was under Antoninus, when the Christians were banished from their houses, forbidden to show their heads, reproached, beaten, hurried from place to place, plundered, imprisoned, and stoned. 5. The fifth began in the year 127, under Severus, when great cruelties were committed. In this reign happened the martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas, and their companions. Perpetua had an infant at the breast, and Felicitas was just delivered, at the time of their being put to death. These two beautiful and amiable young women, mothers of infant children, after suffering much in prison, were exposed, before an insulting multitude, to a wild cow, who mangled their bodies in a most horrid manner; after which they were carried to a conspicuous place, and put to death by the sword. 6. The sixth began with the reign of Maximinus, in 235. 7. The seventh, which was the most dreadful ever known, began in 250, under the emperor Decius, when the Christians were in all places driven from their habitations, stripped of their estates, tormented with racks, &c. 8. The eighth began in 257, under Valerian. Both men and women suffered death, some by scourging, some by the sword, and some by fire. 9. The ninth was under Aurelian, in 274; but this was inconsiderable, compared with the others before mentioned. 10. The tenth began in the nineteenth year of Diocletian, 303. In this dreadful persecution, which lasted ten years, houses filled with Christians were set on fire, and whole droves were tied together with ropes and thrown into the sea. It is related that 17,000 were slain in one month's time; and that during the continuance of this persecution, in the province of Egypt alone, no less than 144,000 Christians died by the violence of their persecutors; besides 700,000 that died through the fatigues of banishment, or the public works to which they were condemned."

The tribulation of "ten days" mentioned in the testimony to the Smyrna church, may well apply to the last of the ten persecutions, which continued ten years.

Second Seal. "And when he had opened the second seal, I heard the second beast say, Come and see. And there went out another horse that was red; and power was given to him that sat thereon, to take peace from the earth, and that they should kill one another: and there was given unto him a great sword."

The red horse denotes blood and carnage, and refers to the times of persecution suffered by the Smyrna church. "Given unto him a great sword," denotes that the persecuting power would have great authority, and that the slaughter of the church of Jesus Christ would be very great.

Second Beast. "And the second beast was like a calf." It is also said at the opening of the second seal, "I heard the second beast say, Come and see." This second beast is the representation of the church. It was like a calf, and shows that the church would be given to the slaughter like a calf fatted for the market, during the Smyrna period of the church, and the second seal.

THIRD PERIOD.

Third Church. "And to the angel of the church in Pergamos write: These things saith he which hath the sharp sword with two edges: I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is; and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith, even in those days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth. But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication. So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which thing I hate. Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth." Rev. ii, 12-16.

This period reached from Constantine, about 313, down to the rise of anti-christ, about 538. During this period the church became very earthly, having her worldly policy, and, like the church of this day, attending to the ceremonies and forms of religion, and neglecting inward piety, the graces of the Spirit, and the life and power of the religion of Jesus. Here was the falling away mentioned by Paul. 2 Thess. ii, 3. Much fault is found with this church, and it is here called upon to repent. This was the age that prepared the church to receive to her bosom the monster, "man of sin," "son of perdition."

Third Seal. "And when he had opened the third seal, I heard the third beast say, Come and see. And I beheld, and lo a black horse; and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand. And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say, A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny; and see thou hurt not the oil and the wine."

"This seal," says Wm. Miller, "was opened in the days of Constantine, when religion became popular, and was a stepping-stone to power; and this seal agrees with the Pergamos church as to time and place. The black horse denotes error and darkness; and when the church became connected with worldly power and wisdom, she lost her purity of doctrine and practice, and adopted, in her creed, maxims and principles congenial with the natural heart, and forms and ceremonies for show and parade, rather than the humbling and cross-bearing life of the followers of Jesus. The balances denoted that religion and civil power would be united in the person who would administer the executive power in the government, and that he would claim the judicial authority both in church and state. This was true among the Roman emperors, from the days of Constantine until the reign of Justinian, when he gave the same judicial power to the bishop of Rome. The measures of wheat and barley for a penny denote that the members of the church would be eagerly engaged after worldly goods, and the love of money would be the prevailing spirit of the times, for they would dispose of any thing for money. The oil and wine denote the graces of the Spirit, faith and love, and there was great danger of hurting these, under the influence of so much worldly spirit. And it is well attested, by all historians, that the prosperity of the church in this age produced the corruptions which finally terminated in the falling away, and setting up the anti-christian abominations."

Third Beast. "And the third beast had the face of a man." At the opening of the third seal it is said, "I heard the third beast say, Come and see." This third beast which represents the church under the third seal, had a face as a man, and shows that the church in the Pergamos period, and period of the third seal, would be like a natural man, proud, haughty, independent, selfish, ambitious, covetous and worldly.

FOURTH PERIOD.

Fourth Church. "And unto the angel of the church in Thyatira write: These things saith the Son of God, who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire, and his feet are like fine brass: I know thy works, and charity, and service, and faith, and thy patience and thy works; and the last to be more than the first. Notwithstanding I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols. And I gave her space to repent of her fornication, and she repented not. Behold, I will cast her into a bed, and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, except they repent of their deeds. And I will kill her children with death; and all the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: and I will give unto every one of you according to your works. But unto you I say, and unto the rest in Thyatira, (as many as have not this doctrine, and which have not known the depths of Satan, as they speak,) I will put upon you none other burden; but that which ye have already, hold fast till I come. And he that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations. And he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers; even as I received of my Father. And I will give him the morning star." Rev. ii, 18-28.

This testimony well applies to the church of Jesus Christ during the 1260 years of Papal supremacy. This age of dreadful cruelty, and martyrdom of the true church, improved her real condition. "I know thy works, and charity, and patience, and thy works; and the last to be more than the first." How necessary to the purity and prosperity of the church, has been persecution and affliction; how corrupting and destructive to holiness has been worldly prosperity!

Verse 20 is strong testimony that we have correctly applied these churches. Jezebel is a figurative name, alluding to Ahab's wife, who slew the prophets of the Lord, led her husband into idolatry, and fed the prophets of Baal at her own table. A more striking figure could not have been used to denote the Papal abominations. See 1 Kings xviii, xix, xxi. It is very evident from history, as well as from this verse, that the church of Christ did suffer some of the Papal monks to preach and teach among them. In verse 25 is the charge, "Hold fast till I come." Here is evidence that some who lived near the close of this age of the church would live until the Lord should come. The signs in the sun and moon were fulfilled in 1780, very near the close of this period; and in reference to these signs the Saviour said, "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." Luke xxi, 28. The time had come for the church to look up and expect her coming Lord in the clouds of heaven; hence it is said to some in Thyatira, "Hold fast till I come."

The "end" mentioned in verse 26, can refer to but one event; namely, the end which is elsewhere in Scripture spoken of in connection with the second advent of Jesus Christ. These facts, in the testimony to the church in Thyatira, furnish the strongest proofs that the testimonies to the seven churches are prophetic, covering the whole Christian age.

Fourth Seal. "And when he had opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth beast say, Come and see. And I looked, and beheld a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and hell followed with him. And power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth."

The fourth seal evidently opened with the Papal supremacy, about A. D. 538. And what language could better illustrate the dreadful cruelties of the Papal power on the church of Jesus Christ than the above? Christians were killed with the sword. They were imprisoned and stoned to death. The most cruel and bloody means of torture were invented to inflict death in every possible shape that men and devils could invent. Tens of thousands suffered death under the most excruciating torments that the Inquisition could devise. And after the Papal bloodhounds had glutted their thirst for blood, thousands were thrown to ferocious beasts. The time and place of the opening of this seal cannot be mistaken. It was during the period of Papal supremacy.

Fourth Beast. "And the fourth beast was like a flying eagle." At the opening of the fourth seal it is said, "I heard the voice of the fourth beast say, Come and see." This fourth beast, which represented the true church under the fourth seal, was like a flying eagle.

"And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent. And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days." Rev. xii.

Here "a time, times, and half a time" is explained to be 1260 days. These days used in symbolic prophecy are years, and refer to the 1260 years of Papal supremacy. The fourth beast represents the true church during that period. Whiting translates beast in Rev. iv, "living being."

We have now traced the churches, the seals, and the beasts, or living beings, as far as they will compare as covering the same periods of time. The seals are seven in number, the beasts but four. And it may be well here to notice, that at the opening of the first, second, third and fourth seals the first, second, third and fourth beasts are heard to say "Come and see;" but when the fifth, sixth and seventh seals are opened, there is no such voice heard. Neither do the last three churches, and the last three seals, compare, as covering the same periods of time, as the first four churches, and the first four seals do. But, as we have shown, the churches, seals and beasts do agree, as covering the same time for the space of nearly 1800 years, till we come down to a little more than half a century of the present time. Here we close our remarks on this subject for the present. At some future date we shall endeavor to follow down through the remaining seals, and say more respecting the last three churches. J. W.

THE CAUSE IN WESTERN NEW YORK. The Seneca Indians.

BRO. SMITH: Bro. Ingraham has been with us in this vicinity four Sabbaths. Two were spent in Olcott, and two in this place. One in Olcott embraced the truth, and some others, we hope, will soon be enabled to take a stand with the little flock there.

The church in this vicinity are rising, and we hope it is rising never to decline again. We hope this is the case everywhere.

Bro. Ingraham and myself visited a little settlement of the Seneca Indians, on the Tonawanda Creek, about ten miles from here. There are some fifty or more professors of Christianity among them, constituting a Baptist church. We gave two lectures through an interpreter in their chapel. They manifested much interest. Their elder and deacon, and those among them who can read English seemed anxious to read, and we distributed some of our tracts among them gratuitously. Some said they believed from the signs that the coming of the Lord was near. We have reason to believe that the Lord has precious jewels among the red men, and some of them on the Tonawanda. We have reason to hope that the minister of that church, who is a man eloquent in the Seneca tongue, will embrace the truth. Should this be the case, the Message would soon go to their brethren on other reservations.

May the Lord raise up some there to sound the Message in the Seneca tongue. I intend to visit them again soon, and give them further light on the prophecies, and on the Commandments of God.

CAST THY CARE ON HIM.

WEARY traveler, cast thy care
On the Saviour:
Quickly to his throne repair,
He will hear thy humble prayer,
Always—ever.

True and faithful is thy Friend,
Ever near.
He will watch thee, and defend,
He'll be with thee to the end,
And wipe thy tear.

Or is thy soul by sorrow riven,
Mid sin and care?
Hope on—this promise sure is given:
The pure on earth shall meet in heaven:
No sorrow there.

There is beyond a happier land,
Far, far from this;
Martyrs next the throne will stand,
Saints will meet a glorious band—
A world of bliss.

As on life's rugged path we go,
We'll trust thy love.
Whate'er our lot on earth—we know
We soon shall part with all below,

Then cast thy load of doubt away,
And never roam:
He'll lead thee to the realms of day,
He'll guard and lend a beauteous ray,
To guide thee home.—Sel.

SIGNS OF THE END.

A LETTER FROM M. S. AVERY TO HER SISTER.

MY DEAR SISTER:—I have long wished to write but have hesitated, knowing that I must speak the true sentiments of my heart in regard to some points; and this I have feared would grieve you. I know that as far as religion is concerned, I am very unpopular; and I have feared that if I should speak to my sister concerning this, I should be called an enthusiast or a fanatic; but I will try to overcome this, and talk with you in love, and without fear, lest your blood be required at my hands in the great day of accounts, which is not far distant. Very bitter indeed would be the reproaches of a dear brother or sister in that solemn day, such as these: "O you had the truth, you knew the way, you saw danger approaching and thickening around, and you warned us not!" I mean by the grace of God assisting, to clear my skirts, and have a conscience void of offense that my heart condemn me not.

I am well aware of the position you occupy, and if I rightly understand Bible truth, I much fear you are in a dangerous place, and have embraced errors that are fatal in the extreme; errors which have no doubt a flattering and pleasing appearance, but will in the end plunge their victims into everlasting ruin.

Dear L., I believe the Bible in whole, not in part, to be the sacred and divine revelation of God, and therefore cannot do violence to that word of truth, the christian's guide, by wresting from its pages any part that might not please the carnal propensities of my nature. O that I loved it more, that its heaven-born precepts were more deeply stamped upon my heart! Dear sister, do you not read enough of this book to show you that we are living in the last days, in the closing up of time? Do not the signs of the times speak as with "trumpet tones," that soon He that shall come will come, and will not tarry? Heb. x, 37. Even him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, any signs, and lying wonders. See 2 Thess. ii, 9. This working of Satan is nothing more nor less than "Spirit Manifestations." What are they, but lying signs and wonders, wrought by the adversary of souls to deceive, and lead them captive at his will?

We read in 1 Tim. vi, 16, that God only hath immortality, and in another place, "This mortal must put on immortality," which we cannot do if we have it already on. Also in Ps. cxlvi, 4, "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish." Again, Ps. vi, 5, "For in death there is no remembrance of thee; in the grave who shall give thee thanks?"

Thus the Bible affords ample proof that "the dead know not anything." But the seducing spirits and doctrines of devils spoken of, [1 Tim. 4,] contradict all these repeated truths which God who cannot lie hath spoken, and by them Satan would, with his seductive wiles, have us believe that our dead friends are alive, (immortal,) and holding converse with us, notwithstanding their thoughts perished at death.

The word of inspiration is so positive and plain on this subject, that those who read and believe the testimony, cannot be deceived. Yes, 'tis a precious truth, that those who have immortality must seek for it, and obtain it alone through Jesus Christ. Otherwise his death and sufferings are all in vain.

My dear sister, when I see that yourself, with millions of others, are caught in the Deceiver's snare, I tremble at the dreadful prospect before you. O, be entreated of one who loves you dearly, to make your escape while there is hope. You may be astonished at my alarm, and perhaps think my fears are groundless; but I would point you to the prophet Isaiah, chap. viii: "And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and that mutter, should not a people seek unto their God? For the living to the dead! To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

The testimony of the "rappers" does not accord with the word, and I therefore conclude that we might well be alarmed at the rapid progress of Spiritualism. O that you could see as plainly as I see it, that we are in the close of this world's history! Read for my sake, dear sister, 2 Tim. iii, and then judge candidly if we are not in the last days—in the perilous times there brought to view. Are not men lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false-accusers, incontinent, fierce, and despisers of those that are good? Are they not high-minded, and lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God? Have they not also the form of godliness, denying the power thereof?

Now I beg you to seriously consider this scripture, and deny if you can, that we are seeing its complete fulfillment daily? Yes, methinks we need not go beyond the limits of our own households, to discover those that are disobedient to parents; and you and I well know that children are not now as they were when we were named among them. Where, O where, is that becoming bashfulness or modesty, together with the regard for old age, that characterized the children of "by-gone-days?" Where is the respect for parents, although their hairs are silvered with age, among the youth of the present generation? And why is all this? Because we are living in the very eve of time, when we are pointed to these signs, and, as a matter of course, they have come.

We are also informed in 2 Pet. iii, that there shall be scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? and 2 Tim. iii, says, "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived;" and it is even so—it is Bible truth.

I take the following extract from a Universalist paper, the Star in the West, Vol. xix, No. 44:

"Our country seems to be rapidly degenerating. There is no limit to the follies and vices of thousands in our large cities. The present generation bids fair to exceed in frivolity and extravagance anything that has ever preceded it since the foundation of the Republic. Let it not be forgotten that the effeminacy of a people is the surest forerunner of the decay of a nation."

These are startling truths, and the world is in a fearful condition. Many it seems know this; but understand not the meaning. Our land of boasted liberty and freedom is polluted with deeds of the blackest dye; and yet they do not see that destruction is coming.

I would now ask you to take a view of the professed churches of Christ. Do not they join hands with the world? Do not they dress and act like the world? Do they not love pleasure more than God? Are they merciful to the poor? Are they not ornamented with gold, (which is forbidden by the Word,) and costly apparel, while the widow and fatherless are perhaps famishing for the necessities of life within their call? Such poor souls realize not that there is a fearful retribution hastening on. Terrible indeed will be the reckoning! They profess to love God, but in works they deny him. If by chance they hear the Second Advent mentioned, they will deridingly sneer and scoff, and perhaps get angry, and say, "If the Lord ever comes, it won't be in my day." Thus they are giving the "peace and safety" cry, spoken of in 1 Thess. v. But we are there told that "sudden destruction cometh upon them, and they shall not escape."

O what a blessed promise still awaits those faithful martyrs, for they have not yet received it. See verse 39. And in the glorious morning, when the sleeping dust of millions shall arise by the power of God, and put on immortality, they too will be remembered, and will then receive a full reward. Yes the day is very near, when those that have lost their lives for the witness of Jesus, shall come forth. Looking forward to that day of joy, all the prophets of old died in faith, not having yet received the promise; but they are soon to realize all their hopes. The solemn splendors of that morning will soon open before us, when lo! they shall arise and shout victory over the grave. At the sound of the last trumpet, every saint will be awakened, not one left or forgotten. But I fear that I am wearying your patience, and you are beginning to think me a "Millerite" in good earnest; but bear with me a little longer, and I will try to be brief.

Although I have shown you a few of the prominent signs of the Lord's soon coming, undoubtedly, you think me foolish for believing it, when Wm. Miller taught the same in 1844, and he did not come. But my dear L., if I expect you on a visit next Spring, and you fail to come at the time looked for, shall I rashly give it up forever, and say you will never come? How absurd this course would be; but if on the other hand I love you with true affection, with what almost impatient anxiety, would I wait, and even watch for your coming?

It may be well here to mention the great disappointment experienced in '44 by those who were animated by the blessed hope of soon seeing Jesus. This doctrine as taught by Mr. Miller, was, I believe, the gospel of the kingdom, that should be preached to every nation, tongue and people, for it went to the remotest parts of the earth. To the United States, or North America alone, this cry, "The hour of his judgment is come," was not confined. The far-off isles of the ocean heard it; and it aroused the people of the eastern continent. Thousands and millions feared it was too true. Yes, the very world stood in awe, at the expected coming of the King of heaven. But the time of trial came, and the hopes of many an honest soul were seemingly crushed at once. The world, and even those professing godliness, looked on in mockery and derision. The time of danger had passed; their fears were quelled; and they could now scoff and sneer with impunity. Do not think, dear sister, that all those persecuted souls called Millerites, gave up the ship when the storm arose. O no! Many faithful souls endured the trial of their faith, although severely tested. Their position was carefully examined again and again: it was all right. Their reckoning was true: figures would not lie. But the mistake, how, or where was it? It was so to be; but time and study have since revealed it. You will find the foundation of this doctrine in Dan. viii, 14. "Unto two thousand three hundred days, then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed."

days, to cleanse it; but although he came not to earth, he entered the Most Holy of the heavenly Sanctuary then, and is now offering his blood for the blotting out of the sins of the people. This I understand to be the judgment spoken of, which begins at the house of God. 1 Pet. iv, 17. Should you scruple the idea of a Sanctuary being in heaven, consult the following scriptures: Ps. cii, 19; xvi, 6; Heb. viii, 1, 2.

Thus we see that the hour of his judgment came, and the proclamation was not an untruth, as we often hear it called. I believe we are now, and have been since 1844, in the waiting time. See Hab. ii, 3. If the Lord had come when nearly all expected him, the scriptures would not have been fulfilled; for we read that he shall come as a snare, and a thief in the night. But how few are now looking for "this same Jesus that went away into heaven," although we are assured he shall come again in many places in the Word. And we are also informed of the destruction of the antediluvian world by water; of the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah; of the first advent of the Saviour, and also his death, resurrection and ascension.

All these truths are readily admitted and generally believed by the world, and yet by the same word we are told that the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, that Jesus shall come in the glory of his Father, that the dead know not anything, that the soul that sinneth it shall die. But who regards these truths? A very few believe them. O what inconsistency! Does not the very fulfillment of the prophecy of the first advent prove that of the second to be true? Says Jesus, "As it was in the days of Noah so also shall the coming of the Son of man be." They were eating and drinking, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away. 'Tis sad indeed now-a-days to see the reflections that are cast on the Bible. But says Solomon, [Prov. xiii, 13, Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed; but he that feareth the commandment shall be rewarded.]

And now before I close, a word on the Sabbath. Christ says, "I came not to destroy the law or the prophets." And again, "I have kept my Father's commandments." John xv, 10. Now if he did not destroy but kept the law, why too should we not keep it? We read that God is unchangeable; that he gave the commandments to men, and yet poor, imperfect, erring man, has dared to alter God's law, that Paul calls holy, just and good, by keeping the first day of the week in place of the seventh. Some blindly think this will do just as well, or the observance of any day that will make a seventh part of the week, but this is making void the law of God.

I could produce much proof in favor of the true Sabbath, if it were necessary. I think you have some good testimony in the little pamphlets I once sent you, and were I assured that they were read, and proved interesting, I would send more, and such as might give entire satisfaction on other subjects that I have briefly touched, more justly than it is in my power to do. I will now close this subject by referring you to the language of Solomon: "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man." Eccl. xii, 13.

And now, my dear sister, nearly all the signs of the end are in the past. The darkening of the sun and moon took place May 19, 1780, immediately after the tribulation of the Papal persecution; and the next sign in order, the falling of the stars, occurred Nov. 13, 1833; and the next we are to expect, the powers of the heavens will be shaken, and the sign of the Son of man appear in heaven. Then all the tribes of the earth shall mourn, and those that are not prepared, and have not the seal of the living God, will then join in the awful prayer, "Rocks and mountains, fall on us!" Not having done the will of God, they will pass away with the world. Whether we are ready or not, sure it is that the scenes of earth will soon close. Surely "destruction cometh; and they shall seek peace, and there shall be none."

And now I hope you will not take all that I have said as my say so. I have endeavored to produce some scripture proof; for I would not that you should think the foundations of my faith are to be found in man-made creeds, or aught but the Bible. I could yet write pages on these subjects so interesting to me, could I know you are also interested.

Now, my dear sister, I bid you farewell, sincerely hoping you may be led to investigate; search the Bible for yourself, and see the truth as it is.

Affectionately yours. M. S. AVERY.

Babylon's End Approacheth!

It is apparent that the Lord in his instruction to his people, employs things animate and inanimate, beasts, nations, trees, cities, &c., to instruct and forewarn them of their whereabouts on the stream of time, and their entrance into the vast ocean of eternity. Dan. vii; Isa. xiv, 8; xxi, 13; Rev. xviii, 5; Isa. xxvi, 1, 2.

In examining and comparing Rev. xviii and Isa. xlvii, we find a striking similarity. The boast of Babylon's exaltation, of being no widow, and the enchantments and sorceries of one, which are the works of the other, by foul spirits of devils, and also the gradation, but precipitance of her judgments, ending alike, in her being burned, show that the same symbol is used in both places.

We feel warranted in the fear of the Lord, for the sake of giving light to the remnant, and warning honest souls that are deceived by fallen Babylon, to apply the instructions of those chapters to the popular fallen churches of this day.

The boast of sitting a queen, and "I am, and none else beside me; I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children," is thus answered by the scriptures: "But these two things shall come to thee in a moment, in one day, the loss of children, and widowhood: they shall come upon thee in their perfection." Isa. xlvii, 8, 9.

The rejection of the nominal churches came when they had acted out their hate fully, towards the proclamation of Christ's second coming, and towards them who loved and proclaimed it, in 1844. There was the "year day" of her divorce and loss of children. It is believed that fifty thousand lovers of the of the coming of Christ left the churches in that year. They have borne testimony to the same in the amplest manner in their reports. For sufficient evidence see their admissions noted in the "Signs of the Times, a pamphlet printed at the Advent Review Office, Battle Creek, Mich., pp. 86-90.

And after their fall mentioned in Rev. xiv, 8, which was proclaimed throughout the land in 1844, Rev. xviii, announces that "Babylon is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit," which is fulfilling by the spirits of devils working miracles through members of the churches, by spirit developments since 1844.

Notwithstanding the awful fall of Babylon, we hear the voice of long-suffering mercy, saying, "Come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues."

This is a moral fall; and of an organization that encircles the people of God, and is of importance sufficient to intoxicate all nations and kings of the earth with the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and make rich through the abundance of her delicacies the merchants of the earth.

Who is this Babylon? She is not the nations, nor kings, nor the merchants, of the earth; as in their sphere of organization, they are of the masculine gender, and of one party; but Babylon is the boasting queen, feminine, on the other hand.

Her widowhood has come, and loss of children, in spite of her boast, sufficient to warrant the application of the symbol. But we expect that this will be to a greater degree; and then "a voice of the cry of the shepherds, and an howling of the principals of the flock, shall be heard; for the Lord hath spoiled their pasture." Jer. xxv, 36.

Here I would state what I witnessed on First-day, Feb. 22d. The circumstances were, that some of the most humble members of a Wesleyan church who had become anxious to hear on our faith, induced me to go to the W. house to solicit an opportunity for Bro. J. N. L. to preach in their house. Soon after I was seated, the minister of the day, who was not the incumbent in charge, but the teacher of the seminary, who I soon concluded was not preaching for "bread and butter," took for his text, Neh.

nor seen but one, the Review is a welcome messenger to me. It oft times cheers my drooping spirits. I read it with pleasure and I am blessed in so doing. Though weak, I beg your prayers that I may keep all the commandments of God and live so as to meet you all on the new earth."

BATTLE CREEK, FIFTH DAY, APR. 23, 1857

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

1. "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light." Mark xiii, 24; Matt. xxiv, 29; Luke xxi, 25; Rev. vi, 12.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived: 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man; for his lamp was trimmed, and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society—Life of Edward Lee.

"The 19th of May, 1780, was a remarkable dark day. Candles were lighted in many houses. The birds were silent and disappeared. The fowls retired to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of judgment was at hand. The Legislature of Connecticut was in session at Hartford, but being unable to transact business, adjourned."—Pres. Dwight, in Historical Collections.

"Dark Day of May 19th, 1780.—The sun rose clear, and shone for several hours; at length the sky became overcast with clouds; and by 10 o'clock, A. M. the darkness was such as to occasion the farmers to leave their work in the field, and retire to their dwellings; fowls went to their roosts, and before noon, lights became necessary to the transaction of business within doors. The darkness continued through the day." Gage's History of Rowley, Mass.

"In the dark day, May 19th, 1780, the heavens were covered with a dense cloud for three or four hours. . . . During this time the clouds were tinged with a yellowish or faint red, for hours, for which no satisfactory cause has been assigned. I stood and viewed the phenomenon, but had not any fear that the world was coming to an end."—Noah Webster, L.L.D.—New Haven Daily Herald.

From Robert Sears' Guide to Knowledge, published in New York, 1844, we extract the following:

"On the 19th of May, 1780, an uncommon darkness took place all over New England, and extended to Canada. It continued about fourteen hours, or from ten o'clock in the morning to midnight. Similar days have occasionally been known, though inferior in the degree or extent of their darkness. The causes of these phenomena are unknown. They certainly were not the result of eclipses."

"The sun rose clear, but soon assumed a 'brassy hue. About ten o'clock, A. M., it became unusually dark. The darkness continued to increase till about one o'clock when it began to decrease. During this time candles became necessary. The birds disappeared and were silent, the fowls went to their roosts, the cocks crew as at day-break, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. The alarm produced by this unusual aspect of the heavens was great."

"The night succeeding that day was of such pitchy darkness, that, in some instances, horses could not be compelled to leave the stable when wanted for service. About midnight the clouds were dispersed, and the moon and stars appeared with unimpaired brilliancy."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20th, 1843. Extract from Stone's History of Beverly.

Mr. Tenney, of Exeter, N. H., quoted by Mr. Gage to the Historical Society, says:—

"The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes, was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."

Dr. Adams, speaking of the dark night, says:—
"At nine it was a darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost every one who happened to be out in the evening, got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night, as it was in the day, as the moon had full the day before."

2. "And the stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. xxiv, 29; Mark xiii, 25; Luke xxi, 25; Rev. vi, 13.

Prof. Olmstead of Yale College, a distinguished meteorologist, speaking of the falling stars says:—

"The extent of the shower of 1833, was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the East, to the Pacific on the West; and from the northern coast of South America, to undefined regions among the British possessions on the North.

"In nearly all places, the meteors began to attract notice by their unusual frequency as early as eleven o'clock, and increased in numbers and splendor until about four o'clock, from which time they gradually declined, but were visible until lost in the light of day. The meteors did not fly at random over all parts of the sky, but appeared to emanate from a point in the constellation Leo, near a star called Gamma Leonis, in the bend of the sickle.

"Those who were so fortunate as to witness the exhibition of shooting stars on the morning of Nov. 13, 1833, probably saw the greatest display of celestial fire-works that has ever been seen since the creation of the world, or at least within the annals covered by the pages of history.

"I feel assured that this is no atmospheric or terrestrial phenomenon, but that these fiery meteors come to us from the regions of space, and reveal to us the existence of worlds of a nebulous or cometary nature, existing in the solar system, and forming constituent parts of that system."

Henry Dana Ward of New York, as published in the Journal of Com., says:—

"Truly 'The stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. vi, 13. This language of the prophet has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday it was literally fulfilled. The ancients understood by aster in Greek, and stella in Latin, the smaller lights of heaven. The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore, the idea of the prophet, as it is expressed in the original Greek, was literally fulfilled in the phenomenon of yesterday. The immense size and distance of the planets and fixed stars forbid the idea of their falling unto the earth. Larger bodies cannot fall in myriads unto a smaller body; but most of the planets and all the fixed stars are many times larger than our earth. They cannot fall unto the earth; but these fell towards the earth.

"And how did they fall? Were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses: 'Even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.'"

Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it [margin "he"] is near, even at the doors. Matt. xxiv, 32, 33.

3. Perils of the last days. 2 Tim. iii, 1-8; iv, 3, 4. Matt. xxiv, 12, 13, 38, 39. Scoffers—2 Pet. iii, 3-7. Cry of peace and safety—1 Thess. v, 3. Evil servants—Matt. xxiv, Luke xii, 45.

4. Spiritualism the work of Satan—Rev. xvi, 13-15; xiii, 13, 14; xviii, 2; Matt. xxiv, 23, 24; 2 Thess. ii, 9-12; 1 Tim. iv, 1; Isa. viii, 19, 20.

GOING HOME.

We said that the days were evil,
We felt that they might be few,
For low was our fortune's level,
And heavy the winters grew;
But one who had no possession
Looked up to the azure dome,
And said in his simple fashion,
"Dear friends, we are going home!"

"What need of the changeless story,
Which time hath so often told,
The sceptre that follows glory,
The canker that comes with gold—
That wisdom and strength and honor
Must fade like the far sea foam,
And death is the only winner?
But, friends, we are going home!"

"The homes we had hoped to rest in
Were opened to sin and strife,
The dreams that our youth was blest in
Were not for the wear of life;
For care can darken the cottage,
As well as the palace hearth,
And birth-rights are sold for pottage,
But never redeemed on earth."

"The springs have gone by in sorrow,
The summers were grieved away,
And ever we feared to-morrow,
And ever we blamed to-day.
In depths which the searcher sounded,
On hills which the high heart clomb,
Have trouble and toil abounded;
But, friends, we are going home!"

"Our faith was the bravest builder,
But found not a stone of trust;
Our love was the fairest guider,
But lavished its wealth on dust;
And time hath the fabric shaken,
And fortune the clay hath shown,
For much they have changed and taken,
But nothing that was our own."

"The light that to us made baser
The path that so many choose,
The gifts which we found no place for,
The riches we could not use;
The heart that when life was wintry
Found summer in strain and tone,
With these to our kin and country,
Dear friends, we are going home!"

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

"WHEN SHALL THESE THINGS BE?"

Verses 15-20. "When ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso read-eth, let him understand,) then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains: let him which is on the house-top not come down to take anything out of his house: neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. And wo unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! But pray ye that your flight be not in the Winter, neither on the Sabbath-day."

The "abomination of desolation" mentioned in verse 15, is called "armies" in Luke xxi, 20, referring to the Romans. "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh."

This desolating power is spoken of by Daniel the prophet. "And the people of the princes that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. . . . And for the overspreading of abominations, he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate." Margin, "desolator." Dan. ix, 26, 27. Here is a clear prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman armies. Our Lord referred his disciples to the book of Daniel, and taught them to read and understand, and when they saw what was there predicted take place, they must make their escape.

Verse 21. "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be."

We take the position that the "tribulation" here mentioned is the tribulation of the church of Jesus Christ, and not that of the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem, and offer the following reasons:

1. It is a fact that the tribulation of the Christian church, especially under the reign of Papacy, has been greater than God's people had suffered before, "since the beginning of the world." Fifty millions were cruelly put to death by the Papacy alone. But it is not true that the tribulation of the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem was the greatest tribulation the world ever witnessed. How much greater was the tribulation of the inhabitants of the cities of the plain when God rained on them fire and brimstone from heaven! or, when God destroyed all men on the face of the globe, save eight souls, by the flood!

2. We believe that the tribulation of the Christian church has been greater than it will ever be again. True, a time of trouble, "such as never was," spoken of in Dan. xii, 1, is coming upon the world; but we find in the same verse this blessed promise, "And at that time thy people shall be delivered." But we cannot believe that the tribulation of the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem was greater than the world will ever witness. No, the vials of Jehovah's unmingled wrath are yet to be poured out, not upon thousands of one city, or the people of one nation only, but upon the guilty millions of all nations. "The slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth, even unto the other end of the earth; they shall not be lamented, neither gathered, nor buried." Jer. xxv, 33.

3. If this tribulation be applied to the Jews, or any other class of unbelieving men, it cannot be harmonized with Dan. xii, 1, which speaks of the time of trouble such as never was, when Michael shall stand up. Certainly, there cannot be two times of trouble, at different periods, greater than ever was, or ever would be. Therefore we apply the "tribulation" spoken of in Matt. xxiv, 21, 29, to the church of Christ, extending down through the 1260 years of Papal persecution; and the "trouble" mentioned in Dan. xii, 1, to the unbelieving world, to be experienced by them in the future.

4. The period of tribulation was shortened for the elect's sake. Who are the elect here mentioned? The Jews? No, their house had been pronounced desolate, they were left of God in their hardness of heart, and blindness of mind, and even St. Paul said, "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles." The elect were the followers of our Lord Jesus Christ. And where were they when tribulation was upon the Jews? They had fled to the mountains. How absurd, then, to say that the days of the tribulation of the Jews in the city of Jerusalem were shortened for the sake of the elect who had fled from the place of tribulation to the mountains.

5. The connection between verses 20 and 21, shows that the tribulation was to commence even with those Christians who were to flee out of the city. "But pray ye that your flight be not in the Winter, neither on the Sabbath-day; for then shall be great tribulation," &c.

Our Lord here speaks of the tribulation which his people would suffer from the time of their flight onward. We follow them in their flight to the mountains, and then pass along down through the noted persecutions of the church of God under Pagan Rome, and we see, indeed, tribulation. And when we come to the period of Papal persecution, we see from fifty to one hundred and fifty millions of the saints of the Most High suffering the most cruel tortures, and dying the most dreadful deaths that wicked men and demons could inflict. This last period is especially noted in prophecy.

The prophet Daniel saw the Papacy, its blasphemy, its arrogance, its work of death on the saints, and its duration as a persecuting power, under the symbol of the little horn. "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time." Chap. vii, 25.

It is so generally admitted that "a time and times and the dividing of time," is 1260 years, that we shall not here offer any proof on the point. Commencing the 1260 years A. D. 538, they reach to A. D. 1798, when Berthier, a French general, entered Rome and took it. The Pope was taken prisoner and shut up in the Vatican. The Papacy was stripped of its civil power. Here ended the period of tribulation spoken of by our Lord, which was

SHORTENED FOR THE ELECT'S SAKE.

Verse 22. "And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." The Papacy was clothed with civil power to punish heretics for 1260 years, and had not the period of tribulation of the elect in the providence of God been shortened, the martyrdom of the church would have continued to 1798, in which event, in all human probability, no flesh of the elect would have been saved. But the reformation under Martin Luther, and those associated with the mighty reformer, modified this tribulation, and continued to restrain the rage, and consume the power of the Papacy until 1700, since which time, according to all church history, there has been no general persecution against the church.

Reader, where are we brought in this prophetic discourse of our Lord? Ans. Down into the eighteenth century, very near the present time. We should naturally expect, then, that the instructions and warnings of the next verse would be applicable to this generation.

Verses 23, 24. "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there, believe it not. For there shall arise false christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders, inasmuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect."

Here is a description of the spiritual deception of the present age. False christs arose not far from the first advent of Christ, to deceive the Jews in regard to that event; [see verse 5:] likewise, false christs and false prophets have arisen at this day to deceive the people on the subject of the second advent. The Shakers say, "Lo, here is Christ." His second coming is in the person of Ann Lee. "Lo, he is there," cry most of the popular ministers of these times. "His second coming is at the conversion of sinners, or at the death of saints." So they have as many second comings of Christ as there are sinners converted, and saints die. Senseless theology this! "Lo here," exclaim a host of Spiritualists, and they "show great signs and wonders." If possible they would deceive the very elect. And we regard it as a safe conclusion that they will yet deceive all others but the elect.

Verses 25, 26. "Behold, I have told you before. Wherefore, if they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert, go not forth; behold, he is in the secret chambers, believe it not." Our Lord is here dwelling upon what he had just before told them. His subject is still the teachings of those who say, "Lo, here is Christ!" "Lo, he is there!" If the Mormons say, "Behold he is in the desert," at Salt Lake city, "go not forth," yet many of their disciples have gone. Or, if you hear proclaimed from the lips of the professed minister of Jesus, "Behold, he is in the secret chamber," Christ's second coming is spiritual, at death, or at conversion, believe it not. And why not believe such mystical teachings? The reason is given in the next verse. And we greatly rejoice that our Lord has not only pointed out false christs and false prophets, and has warned us against their teachings, but he has in contrast set before us the manner of his second coming in the plainest terms.

Verses 27, 28. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together."

When "the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father," and all the holy angels with him, the whole heavens will blaze with glory, and the whole earth will tremble before him. Said the angels to the men of Galilee who were anxiously viewing their ascending Lord, "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts i, 11. Said Paul, "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven." 1 Thess. iv, 16. "Behold, he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him." Rev. i, 7.

Verses 29-31. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet; and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."

We have before seen that our Lord speaks in this chapter of the long period of tribulation upon his followers, and we have also seen how those days of tribulation were shortened for the elect's sake. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," &c. We refer the reader to the noted dark day of May 19th, 1780, as the fulfillment of this declaration. Mark this. It does not read, after those days, but "after the tribulation of those days." The days [1260 years, Dan. vii, 25] reached to 1798, eighteen years this side of the dark day in 1780. Mark xiii, 24 makes this point still plainer. "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened." That is, before the 1260 years closed, but after the tribulation, or martyrdom of the saints ceased, the sun was darkened. Those who would point to the future, or to the past, prior to the eighteenth century, for the darkening of the sun here mentioned, will do well to read again Mark xiii, 24. "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened."

"THE SUN SHALL BE DARKENED."

"A something strikingly awful shall forewarn that the world will come to an end, and that the last day is even at the door."—Martin Luther.

In May 19th, 1780, there was a remarkable fulfillment of the predicted darkening of the sun; and in reference to the facts and date, there can be no doubt; for, besides the historical accounts, which all agree, there are many now living who witnessed it, and can testify to it.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived: 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man; for his lamp was trimmed, and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society—Life of Edward Lee.

"The 19th of May, 1780, was a remarkably dark day. Candles were lighted in many houses. The birds were silent and disappeared. The fowls retired to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of judgment was at hand. The Legislature of Connecticut was in session, at Hartford, but being unable to transact business adjourned."—President Dwight, in Ct., Historical Collections.

Dark day of May 19th, 1780.—The sun rose clear, and shone for several hours; at length, the sky became overcast with clouds, and by 10 o'clock, A. M., the darkness was such as to occasion the farmers to leave their work in the field, and retire to their dwellings; fowls went to their roosts, and before noon, lights became necessary to the transaction of business within doors. The darkness continued through the day."—Gage's History of Rowley, Mass.

Anniversary of the Dark Day.—The dark day, May 19th, 1780, is thus described by Mr. Stone, in his History of Beverly:

"The sun rose clear, but soon assumed a brassy hue. About ten o'clock, A. M., it became unusually dark. The darkness continued to increase till about one o'clock, when it began to decrease. During this time candles became necessary. The birds disappeared and were silent, the fowls went to their roosts, the cocks crew as at day-break, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. The alarm produced by this unusual aspect of the heavens, was great."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20th, 1843.

"In the dark day, May 19th, 1780, the heavens were covered with a dense cloud for three or four hours. . . . During this time, the clouds were tinged with a yellowish or faint red, for hours, for which no satisfactory cause has been assigned. I stood and viewed the phenomenon, but had not any fear that the world was coming to an end."—N. Webster, LL. D.—New Haven Daily Herald.

"The following description of the extraordinary dark day was given by Dr. Adams, on the 27th of May, 1780, eight days after it occurred. He writes:

"We had a very extraordinary phenomenon, the 19th day of this month. In the morning it was rainy till about 9 o'clock, when the clouds broke away and the sun appeared, but very red. After nine the clouds grew very thick, with the wind from south-west in breezes; at half past ten it was uncommonly dark, the clouds appearing of a yellow hue. At eleven, the public school was dismissed, it being so dark that no person could read or write. It continued to grow darker till twelve, when it was so dark we could not tell one person from another in a room with three large windows in it. In short, it was midnight darkness at noon-day. . . . Thousands of people who could not account for it from natural causes, were greatly terrified; and indeed it cast a universal gloom on the earth. The frogs and night-hawks began their notes."

"From Robert Sears' Guide to Knowledge, published in New York, 1844, we extract the following: 'On the 19th of May, 1780, an uncommon darkness took place all over New England, and extended to Canada. It continued about fourteen hours, or from ten o'clock in the morning till midnight. The darkness was so great, that people were unable to read common print, or tell the time of the day by their watches, or to dine, or transact their ordinary business without the light of candles. They became dull and gloomy, and some were excessively frightened. The fowls went to roost. Objects could not be distinguished but at a very little distance, and everything bore the appearance of gloom and night. Similar days have occasionally been known, though inferior in the degree or extent of their darkness. The causes of these phenomena are unknown. They certainly were not the result of eclipses.'"

"THE MOON SHALL NOT GIVE HER LIGHT."

"The moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun from whom she borrows her light is turned into darkness, she must fail of course and become bankrupt."—Matthew Henry.

"The night succeeding that day (May 19th, 1780) was of such pitchy darkness, that, in some instances, horses could not be compelled to leave the stable when wanted for service. About midnight, the clouds were dispersed, and the moon and stars appeared with unimpaired brilliancy."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20th, 1843. Extract from Stone's History of Beverly

"The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes, was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."—Mr. Tenny, of Exeter, N. H., quoted by Mr. Gage, "to the Historical Society."

Dr. Adams, speaking of the dark night, says: "At nine it was a darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost every one who happened to be out in the evening, got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night, as it was in the day, as the moon had full the day before."

"STARS SHALL FALL FROM HEAVEN."

We here give an extract from an article written by Henry Dana Ward, in regard to the falling stars of Nov. 13th, 1833, published in the Journal of Commerce, Nov. 15th, 1833:

"At the cry, 'look out of the window,' I sprang from a deep sleep, and with wonder saw the East lighted up with the dawn and meteors. The zenith, the North, and the West, also, showed the falling stars, in the very image of one thing, and of only one, I ever heard of. I called to my wife to behold; and while robing, she exclaimed, 'see how the stars fall!' I replied, 'that is the wonder,' and we felt in our hearts, that it was a sign of the last days. For truly 'the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. vi, 13. This language of the prophet has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday, it was literally fulfilled. The ancients understood by aster in Greek, and stella in Latin, the smaller lights of heaven. The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore, the idea of the prophet, as it is expressed in the original Greek, was literally fulfilled in the phenomenon of yesterday, so as no man before yesterday had conceived to be possible that it should be fulfilled. The immense size and distance of the planets and fixed stars forbid the idea of their falling unto the earth. Larger bodies cannot fall in myriads unto a smaller body; but most of the planets and all the fixed stars are many times larger than our earth. They cannot fall unto the earth; but these fell towards the earth.

"And how did they fall? Neither myself, nor one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy before quoted. 'It rained fire!' says one; another, 'It was like a shower of fire!' Another, 'It was like the large flakes of falling snow, before a coming storm, or large drops of rain, before a shower.' I admit the fitness of these for common accuracy; but they come far short of the accuracy of the figure used by the prophet. 'The stars of heaven fell unto the earth;' they were not sheets, or flakes, or drops of fire; but they were what the world understands by 'falling stars,' and one speaking to his fellow, in the midst of the scene, would say, 'see how the stars fall!' And he who heard would not pause to correct the astronomy of the speaker, any more than he would reply, 'the sun does not move,' to one who should tell him, 'the sun is rising.' The stars fell 'even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet. The falling stars did not come as if from several trees shaken, but from one: those which appeared in the east fell towards the east; those which appeared in the north fell towards the north; and those which appeared in the west fell towards the west; and those which appeared in the south (for I went out of my residence into the Park) fell towards the south. And they fell not as the ripe fruit falls. Far from it; but they flew, they were cast like the unripe fruit, which at first refuses to leave the branch; and when under a violent pressure, it does break its hold, it flies swiftly, straight off, descending; and in the multitude falling, some cross the track of others, as they are thrown with more or less force, but each one falls on its own side of the tree. Such was the appearance of the above phenomenon to the inmates of my house."

The second extract is from Prof. Olmstead, of Yale College, a distinguished meteorologist.

"The extent of the shower of 1833 was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the east, to the Pacific on the west; and from the northern coast of South America, to undefined regions among the British possessions on the north, the exhibition was visible, and everywhere presented nearly the same appearance.

"In nearly all places, the meteors began to attract notice by their unusual frequency as early as eleven o'clock, and increased in numbers and splendor until about four o'clock, from which time they gradually declined, but were visible until lost in the light of day. The meteors did not fly at random over all parts of the sky, but appeared to emanate from a point in the constellation Leo, near a star called Gamma Leonis, in the bend of the sickle.

"Those who were so fortunate as to witness the exhibition of shooting stars on the morning of Nov. 13th, 1833, probably saw the greatest display of celestial fireworks that has ever been seen since the creation of the world, or at least within the annals covered by the pages of history.

"I feel assured that this is no atmospheric or terrestrial phenomenon, but that these fiery meteors come to us from the regions of space, and reveal to us the existence of worlds of a nebulous or cometary nature, existing in the solar system, and forming constituent parts of that system. Nor are these conclusions built on mere hypothesis, but are necessary inferences from certain facts.

"This is no longer to be regarded as a terrestrial, but as a celestial phenomenon; and shooting stars are now to be no more viewed as casual productions of the upper regions of the atmosphere, but as visitants from other worlds or from the planetary voids.

"Subsequent inquiries have led me to the belief, that the body was so distant as hardly to exhibit any apparent parallax, but was projected on very nearly the same part of the sky, as seen by all observers. This fact at once shows that the source of the meteors was far beyond the atmosphere, and confirms the preceding conclusion that it was wholly independent of the earth."

This is important testimony as to the vast extent of the falling stars, and also of their emanating from a single point in the heavens. It was the greatest display of celestial fire-works recorded on the pages of history. It was no atmospheric, or terrestrial phenomenon, common to the upper regions of the earth; but a display of the Divine Power, baffling the science of man.

"A gentleman in South Carolina thus describes the effect of the phenomenon of 1833 upon the ignorant blacks: 'I was suddenly awakened by the most distressing cries that ever fell on my ears. Shrieks of horror and cries for mercy I could hear from most of the negroes of three plantations, amounting in all to about six or eight hundred. While earnestly listening for the cause, I heard a faint voice near the door calling my name. I arose, and taking my sword, stood at the door. At this moment I heard the same voice still beseeching me to rise, and saying, 'O my God, the world is on fire.' I then opened the door, and it is difficult to say which excited me most, the awfulness of the scene, or the distressed cries of the negroes. Upwards of one hundred lay prostrate on the ground, some speechless, and some with the most bitter cries; but most with their hands raised imploring God to save the world and them. The scene was truly awful, for never did rain fall much thicker than the meteors fell towards the earth, east, west, north and south, it was the same.'—E. H. Burdett.

THE LAST DAYS.

FROM A TRACT BY H. L. HASTINGS.

(Concluded.)

Sixth: The last days were to be days of carelessness and security on the part of a rebellious world.

As it was in the days of Noah, when the deluge rolled its swelling waves above an unheeding race—and as it was in the days of Lot, when the fiery tempest burst in awful fury upon the scenes of mirth and riot, so sudden shall the coming of the Son of Man be. Luke xvii, 26–30. Like the unexpected return of the master from a distant country. Luke xii, 36, 37. Like the stealthy approach of the midnight thief. Rev. xvi, 15. Like the snare entrapping the incautious animal. Luke xxi, 35. Like the sudden lightning flash gleaming amid the darkness. Matt. xxiv, 27. As the coming of the lord of the servant, while he in the midst of riot and merriment is smiting his fellow servants and saying in his heart, "My lord delayeth his coming"—so sudden, so unexpected by a careless world shall the Son of Man appear. "For when they shall say Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape." 1 Thess. v, 3. And have we not come to witness such a condition of things? And are we not then in the last days?

Seventh: The last days were to witness an increase of knowledge.

While Satan was putting forth all his energies, and rallying all his forces for fierce and final conflict, there was to be a corresponding effort on the part of the Almighty to publish the last message of mercy to perishing men. The words of the prophet were to be "closed up and sealed till the time of the end." Dan. xii. And the command was, "But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book even to the time of the end; many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." Dan. xii, 4. "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Matt. xxiv, 14. And to-day is this Scripture fulfilled before your eyes. The visions and prophecies are unsealed. Many run to and fro, coursing in arrowy speed over earth and ocean, to preach the word of God. And knowledge is increased—knowledge of every kind. No art, no science, no pursuit, is unaffected by this increase. Survey the world now, and imagine it a century ago, and you cannot fail to observe the fulfillment of this prediction. The Gospel has gone to every land and clime, and though rejected by the ungodly, yet it stands "for a witness unto all nations." More than forty millions of Bibles, in near two hundred languages, have been issued by Bible Societies alone within the last half century. And the Missionary work, so recent, yet so extensive, assists to fulfill the word. And when this work is done, "then shall the end come"—not the millennium of glory, but the end of the age, when the wicked shall be cast "into a furnace of fire" and the righteous shall emerge from the long dark night of time, and "shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." Matt. xiii, 40–43.

Eighth: The true Church of God, though few and despised, were in the Last Days to be expecting the coming of the Lord.

"But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." "Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night nor of darkness." They are to lift up their heads rejoicing as their "redemption draweth nigh." Luke xxi, 28–31. They are to know "that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." They are to be like virgins taking their lamps and going "forth to meet the bridegroom," whose coming they were hourly expecting. Matt. xxv, 1–13. And has not that time arrived? Has not the angel flying in mid-heaven proclaimed in every land the thrilling message, "Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his Judgment is come?" Rev. xiv, 6, 7.

Ninth: The Last Days were to be days of bloody strife, distress, and carnage among the nations of the earth.

A glance at the prophetic record will show this with indisputable clearness. The prophet Isaiah pronounces the woe of God upon "the multitude of many people," that rush "like the rushing of mighty waters." "The nations shall rush, but God shall rebuke them, and they shall flee afar off, and shall become as the chaff of the mountain before the wind, and like a thistle-down before the whirlwind." Isa. xvii, 12, 13. "For behold the Lord will come with fire, and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh, and the slain of the Lord shall be many." Isa. lxvi, 15, 16.

Jeremiah beholds the Almighty engaged in dread controversy with the nations—the evil goes from nation to nation, the whirlwind rises from the coasts of the earth. The wine cup of fury is put to the lips of all the nations, and finally the "slain of the Lord" lie ungathered, unburied, and unmourned from one end of the earth to the other. Jer. xxv, 26–33.

Ezekiel beholds the enemies of God rushing onward from the "North quarters" "like a storm" to "the mountains of Israel," until at length amid a tempest of fire and brimstone they perish at the presence of God, and all the fowls are bidden to feast upon their carcasses. Eze. xxxviii, and xxxix.

Daniel traces the history of the world until "the king of the North" goes forth to run a race of conquest and devastation, until, planting his royal tent in the "holy mountain," he comes to a strange and awful end; Michael the Great Prince, stands up—troubles come upon the world—the dead are raised, and God's people have deliverance and glory. Dan. xi, 40–45; xii, 1, 2.

Joel and the other prophets point to the time when the nations, mad with rage, shall beat their plowshares into swords, and their pruning-hooks into spears, and come up to the Valley of Jehoshaphat, there to be crushed in the awful wine-press of Jehovah's wrath. Joel iii, 9–14.

The Saviour points us onward to a time when amidst "distress of nations with perplexity," and the failing of hearts for fear, they shall see the Son of Man appearing in the clouds of heaven. Luke xxi, 25–27. And the Revelator, after beholding the strange history of the world for many generations, sees at last the kings of the earth gathered together to make war against the King of kings, who is seen descending in glory from the skies, and who destroys them all. Rev. xix.

And do we not stand to-day upon the verge of a tremendous crisis? Are not the nations preparing for the great day of God Almighty? Do we not hear the thunders that portend a coming storm? Do we not feel the throes that herald earth's last convulsion? And are we not in the last days? We have seen what their character is to be, and there is no room for the fable of a converted world this side of that last day when Christ shall raise his people and sit in Judgment on the human race. John vi, 40; xii, 48. No doubt a time of peace and glory is coming, but the Prince of peace, the King of glory must come to bring it. And who shall abide the day of his coming? Who shall stand when he appeareth?

We stand to-day amid earth's concluding scenes. The last days are the present days. The grand drama approaches its conclusion. Deceptive demons gather the nations together—the kings of the East shall soon come with hasty steps to Armageddon's plain—the plagues heavy and grievous are poured upon the nations—the echoes of the sixth trumpet are dying away, and ere long the seventh trumpet will sound in wailing cadence, its final woe to the inhabitants of the earth. Shouts of praise shall then be heard in heaven, and curses and strife on earth; while "voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and a mighty earthquake" shall close the terrific scene. But beyond these voices and thunderings are those voices of still louder praise that the saints shall utter—beyond these lightnings, the glory of God shall enlighten the world, and beyond that earthquake is the "kingdom that cannot be moved."

Reader, these are solemn considerations. The Judge is near—are you ready to meet him? The Lord is at hand—can you shout for joy as he appears? Christian, are you ready, all ready to enter in to the marriage supper of the Lamb? I beseech you, be not deceived. Live pure and holy. Walk close with God. Strive to possess the mind that was in Christ Jesus, that you may be welcomed to his presence when he comes. Sinner, turn; for why will ye die?

Do we Love our Captain?

WE have heard of the attachment of soldiers to their leaders. The sight of Washington, of Wellington, and of Napoleon, often filled the troops of those great captains with an irrepressible enthusiasm. In many cases the simple shout of the leader's name, more stirring than the drum-beat or bugle-note of battle, made them willing to suffer want, to go shoeless and shelterless, to cross almost insurmountable mountains, to brave the snows of Russia and the burning sun of Egypt and Palestine, fearless of death to face the most formidable foe. Even the veteran soldier, long after he has been laid aside from active service, and when memory alone could supply him with motive, has been known to kindle with young ardor, and lift up his bent and trembling form with lofty pride at a bare allusion to his beloved captain.

But what is any earthly leader, even though his name be Washington, or Wellington, or Napoleon, compared with Him whose name is "Wonderful"? What banner should animate us like that of the cross? What are the trophies of earthly warriors,

THE CHRISTIAN AND HIS ECHO.

True faith, producing love to God and man,
Say, Echo, is not this the Gospel plan?
The Gospel plan.

Must I my faith and love to Jesus show?
By doing good to all, both friend and foe?
Both friend and foe.

But if a brother hates and treats me ill,
Must I return him good and love him still?
Love him still.

If he my failings watches to reveal,
Must I his faults as carefully conceal?
As carefully conceal.

But if my name and character be blast,
And cruel malice, too, a long time last;
And if I sorrow and affliction knew,
He loves to add unto my cup of woe;
In this uncommon, this peculiar case,
Sweet Echo, say, must I still love and bless?
Still love and bless.

Whatever usage ill I may receive,
Must I be patient still, and still forgive?
Still forgive.

Why, Echo, how is this? thou'rt sure a dove!
Thy voice shall teach me nothing else but love!
Nothing else but love.

Amen! with all my heart, then be it so;
'Tis all delightful, just, and good, I know;
And now to practice I'll directly go.
Directly go.

Things being so, whoever me reject,
My gracious God me surely will protect.
Surely will protect.

Henceforth I'll roll on him my every care,
And then both friend and foe embrace in prayer.
Embrace in prayer.

But after all those duties I have done,
Must I, in point of merit, them disown,
And trust for heaven through Jesus' blood alone?
Through Jesus' blood alone.

Echo, enough! thy counsels to mine ear,
Are sweeter than to flowers, the dew-drop tear;
Thy wise instructive lessons please me well:
I'll go and practice them. Farewell, farewell.
Practice them. Farewell, farewell.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

POWERS OF THE HEAVENS SHAKEN.

This event we must regard as being future. It holds the same place in the events of this chapter, that the departing of the heavens as a scroll does in the events of the sixth seal of Rev. vi. Both follow the falling stars. Please compare Matt. xxiv, 29, 30, with Rev. vi, 12-17. We think the Scriptures plainly teach that, prior to the resurrection of the just by the voice of the Son of God, the voice of God the Father will shake the heavens and the earth, and at the voice of God the powers of the heavens will be shaken. And we think this will take place at the pouring out of the seventh vial into the air, Rev. xvi, 17. Then it is said, "And there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven from the throne, saying, It is done." This is not the voice of the Son of God as he descends to raise the dead. It comes from the throne of God in the temple of heaven. "Whose voice then shook the earth; but now he hath promised, saying, yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven." Heb. xii, 26. "The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and earth shall shake; [but what will become of the poor saints?] but the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel." Joel iii, 16.

We would speak modestly of future events, but venture the opinion that the voice of the Father will shake the heavens and the earth before the sign of the Son of man appears. But the people of God will be safe. Islands may disappear and mountains be thrown down, but the saints remain unharmed. Earthquakes may break up the earth's surface, so that kings and nobles, rich and poor, bond and free may hide "themselves in the dens, and in the rocks of the mountains," still God will be the hope of his people.

SIGN OF THE SON OF MAN.

This is not one of the signs which show that the Son of man is near; but "the sign of the Son of man in heaven." It is that which signifies his position. When Christ ascended from the mount of Olivet, "a cloud received him" from the sight of the disciples. They still gazed at the cloud as it rolled upward, bearing the Saviour toward the Father's throne, but they could not see his lovely person. When he comes "in like manner" as he was taken up, the cloud will appear in the distance; small at first, but as it draws near the earth it will increase in size. It will signify to those who are looking for his return that he is there, soon to burst forth from the cloud in matchless glory. This cloud will be the sign of the Son of man in heaven.

THE TRIBES OF THE EARTH MOURN.

During the pouring out of the seven last plagues, and at the time of the shaking of the powers of the heaven, a large portion of the wicked will doubtless be destroyed. A portion still remain to view scenes still more terrific, and endure anguish more dreadful. The sign is seen in heaven. A once crucified, a slighted and insulted Saviour, now King of kings, and Lord of lords, is coming near the earth! His glory blazes everywhere! The saints hope and rejoice with trembling, but what an hour for the wicked! The tribes of the earth mourn. Amid the ruins of shivered creation they hold one general prayer-meeting. Kings and great men, rich men, chief captains and mighty men, free and bond, all, yes all unite in the general wail. As the Son of man in the glory of his Father, attended by all the holy angels, draws still nearer, consternation fills every breast. They hide in dens and in the rocks of the mountains. Their only hope is to be concealed from the glory of that scene. They know it is too late to pray to the Son of man for mercy, that probation for the human family has ended forever. Here is a copy of that dreadful prayer:

"Mountains and rocks fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" Rev. vi, 16, 17.

But rocks cannot shelter them from the burning glory reflected by the King of kings, attended by the whole heavenly host. The presence of but one angel before Joseph's sepulchre caused the keepers to fall like dead men. Then when "the Son of man shall come in the glory of the Father," "and all the holy angels with him," no sinner can endure the scene and live. The exceeding brightness of that holy throng, brighter than a thousand suns at noon-day, will pierce the sinner's lowest hiding place, and will "make a speedy ridance of all them that dwell in the land." Zeph. i, 18. Or, as Paul says, "Whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness [bright shining, Macknight's Translation] of his coming." O, Christian brother, we warn you to watch and be ready to receive your Saviour with joy. Backslider, arouse, and return to the Lord while he may be found. And, poor sinner, though you have never tasted of the pardoning love of Christ, you, too, may come and find pardon, and a shelter from approaching wrath.

The Son of man will be seen "coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." But before his coming, a great work will be done for his people. Should he suddenly burst upon them now, they could not endure "the power and great glory" of the scene. This subject is beautifully illustrated by the following words of the Prophet: "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord, his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain; as the latter and former rain unto the earth." Hosea vi, 3.

The day-star first appears, then the dawn of day. And as the light of day increases, our eyes are enabled to endure it, and view the sun shining in his strength. But should the light of the sun burst upon the world suddenly at midnight, no human eye could endure it.

So will the saints be prepared to meet their coming King. They must first break away from the fashions, love and cares of this world, and consecrate themselves and all they have to the Lord. Then will they share the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, "as the rain, as the latter and the former rain upon the earth." The day-star will arise in their hearts. 2 Pet. i, 19. Then will the day of release and rest dawn in glory upon the weary trusting ones. Those who have taken heed to the sure word of prophecy through the dark watching night, will then raise their heads in triumph. They are filled with faith, and with the Holy Spirit. Glory is poured upon them till they can gaze on Christ and angels. The trumpet sounds. The angels are dispatched to the grave's mouth. The voice of the Son of God awakes the sleeping saints of all past ages. They come forth in immortal perfection, and as they leave the earth, the living saints are changed. The "elect from one end of heaven to the other," each with an angel bright and strong to lead the way, are all caught up to meet their Lord who waits in mid heaven to receive the purchase of his blood. As language would fail to describe what follows, dear reader, we leave you here to contemplate it, praying that we may soon participate in the meeting scene.

PARABLE OF THE FIG-TREE.

Verses 32, 33. "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that Summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it, [he, margin,] is near, even at the doors."

The parable of the fig-tree is probably the most forcible that could be used by our Lord to inspire in the hearts of his people faith in his speedy coming. When the trees of the field begin to put forth their leaves, and the tender grass springs up, and the ground is being covered with its green velvet carpet, we know that Summer is nigh. If one should doubt, and talk of the season's changing back to cold Winter, he would be thought insane. It is a certainty with us that Summer is coming when we see these signs in nature. We know that Summer is nigh. "So likewise ye," or with the same certainty, KNOW that Christ's coming is at the doors when the signs in the sun, moon and stars are fulfilled.

Here, dear reader, our Lord, has stated the object of these signs, which is, that we may know when his coming is at the doors. But we are told that the church is not to know anything of the period of Christ's second advent. Then we enquire, why did our Lord give signs of the event? Are they given to deceive us? to lead the honest Christian to look for Christ's coming, when, in fact, nothing is to be known of the time of the event? Certainly not. The fact that Christ foretells signs of his coming, and then states the object of those signs, that the church may know when the event should be near, even at the doors, is sufficient proof that it is the design of Heaven that the church should understand the period of the second advent.

ALL THESE THINGS.

Our Lord says, [Luke xxi, 28,] "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." The signs began to come to pass with the dark day of 1780. Then it could be said that redemption draweth nigh, and from that time the humble followers of Jesus might look up in expectation of witnessing his glorious appearing. But [verse 31] "when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."

The signs in the sun, moon and stars are all that were given to base faith upon. All the other events mentioned in connection with these, have their fulfillment after the faith of God's people is perfected, and the doom of all sinners is fixed. Therefore we conclude that the phrase, "all these things," embraces the darkening of the sun and the moon, and the falling of the stars; and these having come to pass, we may now learn the parable of the fig-tree, and know that Christ's coming is near, even at the doors.

But it is urged that the phrase, "all these things," embraces all the things mentioned in connection by our Lord. We will test the matter. The things mentioned, are (1.) the sun shall be darkened, (2.) the moon shall not give her light, (3.) the stars shall fall from heaven, (4.) the powers of the heavens shaken, (5.) sign of the Son of man, (6.) the tribes of the earth mourn, (7.) they shall see the Son of man coming, and (8.) the angels gather the elect. Here are eight things mentioned in close connection. Must they all take place before it may be known that Christ's coming is near, even at the doors? Certainly not, for his coming is one of the things. Then where shall the division be made? How many of these eight things are embraced in the phrase, "all these things?" We will commence at the last, and trace them back and see. The angels gathering the elect is not embraced in the phrase, neither the coming of the Son of man in power and great glory; for it would be most absurd to say that we must wait until Christ comes and raises the dead before we may know that his coming is near, even at the doors. The phrase, "all these things," does not embrace the mourning of the tribes of the earth, and the sign of the Son of man; for then the cloud that brings the Saviour is seen—no time to learn the parable of the fig-tree then. Neither does the phrase embrace the shaking of the powers of the heavens; for that does not take place until the seventh vial is poured out. But the faith of God's people is perfected, and the doom of all sinners is for ever fixed before the pouring out of the first vial. The parable of the fig-tree was given to inspire faith in the minds of those who hear the reasons of Christ's soon coming. But to suppose that this parable is to be learned after it is said, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still, . . . and he that is holy, let him be holy still," after the thunder, lightning, great earthquake, and great hail, "each stone about the weight of a talent," is most absurd. No! The phrase, "all these things" in verse 33, embraces the three great signs in the sun, moon and stars, given to strengthen the faith of God's people while merciful warnings are being given to the world. Here, then, since the falling stars of 1833, the parable of the fig-tree has force, and we may know that Christ's coming is near, even at the doors, with all the certainty that we know that Summer is nigh when the trees put forth their tender buds and leaves.

THIS GENERATION SHALL NOT PASS.

Verses 34, 35. "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Many suppose that our Lord here speaks of the generation then living, who listened to his teachings. That such are in error on this point, the following facts clearly prove:—

1. It is certainly true that what is embraced in the phrase, "all these things," was not fulfilled in that generation.

2. It could not be the generation living in the days of his flesh, for he said to them, [Luke xi, 29,] "There shall no sign be given it, but the sign of Jonas the prophet."

It is evident that our Lord refers to the generation who were to see the signs fulfilled, and who were to be instructed by the parable of the fig-tree. In this prophetic discourse he leads the minds of his disciples down over the events of the Christian age, mentions the signs in the sun, moon and stars, which were to appear in the last generation, and declares that this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled.

In like manner St. Paul carries his brethren forward to the resurrection, when he says, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." 1 Cor. xv, 51, 52. Or, "Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." 1 Thess. iv, 17.

Also, in like manner is the mind carried backward in Ps. xcv, 10. "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation." The generation here spoken of provoked the Lord in the wilderness, long before David lived. He goes back and speaks of it as though it were present. In this manner our Lord goes forward, and speaks of the last generation as though it were then present.

We do not believe that the phrase, "this generation," marks any definite number of years. Some suppose that our Lord designed to teach that some who were witnesses of the dark day in 1780, would live to witness the second coming of the Saviour. That some who saw this first sign will live to witness the coming of Jesus, we have no doubt. But it is our opinion that our Lord designed to teach that the people who should live at the time of the fulfilment of the last sign, (the falling stars of 1833,) and should hear the proclamation of the coming of Christ, based partly upon the fulfilled signs, should witness the scenes connected with his coming.

The proclamation of the coming and kingdom of Christ is given to the last generation. God did not send Noah to preach to next to the last generation before the flood, but to the last. The very generation which drank the waters of the flood, saw Noah build the ark, and heard his warning voice. So God has raised up men to give the solemn warning to the world at the right time. The signs were fulfilled at the right time to give force to the warning.

And the very generation of men that live after the three great signs are fulfilled, and who hear and reject the warning message from heaven, will drink the unmingled cup of the wrath of God. For such the seven last plagues are reserved. And those of this very generation who receive the message, suffer disappointments, and endure the trials of the waiting position, will witness the coming of the Son of man, and with the faithful host of God will then exclaim, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord, we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." Isa. xxv, 9.

With what emphasis our Lord gave utterance to this sentiment. It is a rebuke upon our unbelief. As we read it, God help us to believe. "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."

Verse 36. "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." Many suppose that this text proves that nothing can be known in regard to the time of the second coming of Christ. Here, we think they greatly err, and give the following reasons why we think so:—

1. Because our Lord gives signs of his coming, and says, "When ye shall see all these things, KNOW that it is near, even at the doors." Who dare dispute the Master, and say we cannot know anything about the nearness of the event?

2. Because he says, "As the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." God said to Noah, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh, yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years." Gen. vi, 3. At the appointed time said the Lord to Noah, "Come thou, and all thy house into the ark, . . . For yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth." Gen. vii, 1-4. A warning connected with time, was given to Noah for the men of his age. Likewise a most solemn warning, based upon the termination of the prophetic periods, and the fulfillment of the signs, is given to the men of this generation. "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." Amos iii, 7. The period of the flood was revealed, and the warning was given. The fulfilling prophecies, and signs of the times declare Christ's coming at the door, and the solemn message has gone forth.

3. Because they make the text prove too much for their own unbelief. As recorded by Mark, it reads, "But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." If the text proves that men are never to know anything in regard to the time of the second advent, it proves that angels are not to know, and also that the Son is to be kept in the same ignorance; that is, know nothing about it till the event takes place, and our Lord finds himself in this world!!! The idea that the Son of God will not know the day and hour of his second advent to this world is most preposterous. Christ will know. So will angels, and so will the waiting, watching people of God.

An old English version of the passage reads, "But that day and hour no man maketh known, neither the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." This is the correct reading according to several of the ablest critics of the age. The word know, is used in the same sense here that it is by Paul in 1 Cor. ii, 2. "For I determined not to know [make known] anything among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified." Men will not make known the day and hour, angels will not make it known, neither will the Son; but the Father will make it known.

Says Campbell, "Macknight argues that the term know is here used as a causative, in the Hebrew sense of the conjugation haphel, that is, to make known. His [Christ's] answer is just equivalent to saying: The Father will make it known when it pleases him; but he has not authorized man, angel, or the Son, to make it known. Just in this sense Paul uses the term know. 1 Cor. ii, 2. I came to you making known the testimony of God; for I determined to make known nothing among you but a crucified Christ."

Albert Barnes in his notes on the Gospels says, "Others have said that the verb rendered knoweth means sometimes to make known, or to reveal, and that the passage means, 'that day and hour none maketh known, neither the angels, nor the Son, but the Father.' It is true the word has sometimes that meaning, as in 1 Cor. ii, 2."

Verses 37-39. "But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark. And knew not, until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." A picture of the present condition of the mass of mankind is here drawn. How dark the features! The people of the last generation will be like that before the flood, while the ark was preparing.

Noah preached, and warned them of the coming flood, and they mocked. He built the ark, and they scoffed at, and jeered the man of God. He was a preacher of righteousness. His works were calculated to give edge to, and set home to the heart, what he preached. Every righteous sermon, and every blow struck in building the ark, condemned a careless, scoffing world. As the time drew nearer, they grew more careless, more hardened, more bold and impudent, and their condemnation surer. Noah and his family were alone. And could one family know more than all the world? The ark is a matter of ridicule, and Noah is regarded as a willful bigot.

But the Lord calls Noah into the ark, and says to him, "Yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth." And by the hand of Providence the beasts are led into the ark, and the Lord shuts Noah in. This is regarded at first by the scoffing multitude as something wonderful; but it is soon explained away by the wiser ones, so as to calm their fears, and they breathe easier. But the day arrives. The sun rises as usual, and the heavens are clear. "Now where is old Noah's flood?" is heard from a thousand impious lips. On this very day some are being joined in marriage. It is a day of unusual feasting and sports. The farmer is planting and sowing, and the mechanic is heard pursuing his work of building. And while all are looking over long years of future prosperity and happiness, suddenly the heavens gather blackness. Fear fills every heart. They think of Noah, and as they turn to look towards the ark, the windows of heaven open, and the rain in torrents descends. "The fountains of the great deep are broken up," and here and there come gushing up rivers of water. The valleys are fast filling up, and thousands are swept away in death. Some flee to the highest points of land, but the water fast follows them up. Men bear their wives and children to the mountains, but are obliged to part with them there to drown, while they climb the highest trees. But soon they too are covered with water, so that there is not a resting place for Noah's dove. All are still in death. Horrid death, made still more horrible by being in consequence of slighted mercy.—But where is Noah? Ah! safe in the ark, borne upon the bitow. Safe from the flood, safe in the ark, for God "shut him in."

By most people the evidences of the soon coming of Christ are considered insufficient to base faith upon. But mark: the testimony and acts of one man condemned the people destroyed by the flood. The evidences then were sufficient, otherwise the world would not have been condemned. But behold the evidences which come pouring in upon us on all sides that the day of the Lord is near, and hasteth greatly. We follow down the numerous prophetic chains of Daniel, and of the Revelation, and we find ourselves in every instance standing just before the day of wrath. We see the signs spoken of by Prophets, by Christ, and in the epistles fulfilling, or fulfilled. And at the right time, and in the right manner, to fulfill certain prophecies, a solemn message arises in different parts of the world. "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain; let all the inhabitants of the land tremble; for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand." Joel ii, 1. Wherever we look, we see prophecy fulfilling. And while the knowledge of God and the spirit of holiness are departing, spiritual wickedness like a flood covers the land.

But these evidences are considered insufficient to rest faith upon. But what kind of evidence would they have? "When the signs of the end," says the sceptic, "are fulfilled, they will be so plain that no one can doubt." But if the signs are of such a nature, and are fulfilled in such a manner, as to compel all to believe in the coming of Christ, how can it be as it was in the days of Noah? Men were not then compelled to believe. But eight believing souls were saved, while all the world beside sunk in their unbelief beneath the waters of the flood. God has never revealed his truth to man in a manner to compel him to believe. Those who have wished to doubt his word, have found a wide field in which to doubt, and a broad road to perdition. While those who have wished to believe, have ever found everlasting rock on which to rest their faith. "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Luke xviii, 8. He will find but little. It will be as in the days of Noah. A few will believe, and stand complete in God amid all the perils of the last days. "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Luke xii, 32.

Just before the end, the world will be hardened in sin, indifferent to the claims of God, careless about hearing warnings of danger, blinded by cares, pleasures and riches, an unbelieving and infidel race, eating, drinking, marrying, building, planting, sowing. It is right to eat and drink, but the sin is in excess and gluttony. The marriage covenant is holy, but God's glory is seldom thought of. Building, planting and sowing, necessary for convenient shelter, food and clothing, are right, but the world has gone wholly after these things, so that they have no time, or disposition to think of God, heaven, Christ's coming and the Judgment. The Earthquake at St. Louis.

Two shocks of an earthquake were felt yesterday in this city and vicinity, of more violence than are usual in this latitude. The first shock occurred about five minutes past four o'clock, and was preceded by a loud, continuous noise, like thunder or the roar of artillery. The earth then commenced shaking, and the houses seemed to rock from East to West. After a pause of eight or ten minutes the second shock came on, but was much less violent than the first. Deeming the house we were in—a tall, narrow, five story building, and we in the fifth—unsafe, we soon found our way to the ground, in Georgia costume, when we observed that the sky presented a singular appearance, an unusual thing was around the moon, and a peculiar fog hung close to the earth. A gentleman informed us that he also saw a very brilliant meteor about the time of the first shock. Whether these signs had anything to do with the earthquake, we leave others to determine. Earthquakes, if we may believe the testimony of the rocks, have been no unusual thing in this vicinity in ages past. And not to go back to antiquity, many of our oldest citizens will remember the terrible earthquake that occurred at New Madrid, in 1811, when that village was partially destroyed, and a large section of that part of the State sunk and submerged, rendering an act of Congress necessary to grant other lands to the settlers in place of those that were destroyed. For many years after the occurrence, the inhabitants experienced violent shocks periodically, and emigrants were afraid to settle in that quarter. After a while, however, they became used to them, and whenever one happened, they would remark, "It is only an earthquake," and go about their business.

We do not remember to have felt the shock of an earthquake since the evening of the presidential election of 1852; just as the sun was going down and Franklin Pierce had been elected President of the United States. If it took an earthquake to herald the defeat of Gen. Scott, who knows but that this second earthquake was intended to announce that the financial crisis is over, and that nothing more is going to burst on the top of the earth, just at this time.—St. Louis Leader, Oct. 9.

trates the spirit that the world is getting into of treating serious matters with lightness and frivolity. They will crack a joke on the most serious events, and lay nothing to heart. But there are scenes before us, about to convulse the world, and sweep its inhabitants to ruin, which will prove no joke. The time will come when people will not be disposed to trifle with these things.—Ed.

Doesrick's went to a fashionable church in a city to buy a pew, but had too light a purse. He says:—

"I very soon discovered that no 'dead heads' were allowed on this line, and that if a man couldn't pay he was put off the train. After some preliminary chat about the foreign news, the state of the markets, the hope of a revival of religion, the rise in 'Erie,' the progress of the work of grace, and the price of pork, the lowly ones gathered around, and the sale began. Those pews nearest the pulpit, or perhaps I should say, those seats next the locomotive, were sold first: they brought seventy, eighty, and even one hundred dollars premium; the price was to be paid merely for a choice of seats, in addition to the regular rent. I instantly saw that I hadn't money enough to take a first class cabin passage, but thought there might be a place for me somewhere. Jones bought a ticket, and Smith and Tompkins; but there was not a single seat that came down to my pile, and I felt I must give up the journey or find a cheaper conveyance; for I certainly couldn't afford to go to heaven at such exorbitant rates."

Spirits Guiding a Vessel.

The following singular account of a sailing vessel being guided by an invisible, intelligent power, we clip from a Wisconsin paper. The individuals who subscribe to the document, are said to be persons well known in Stockbridge, and of strict veracity and honor.

"We, the undersigned, left Oshkosh in a small sail-boat for Stockbridge, at twenty minutes past four on Friday afternoon, July 17th. A gentle wind was blowing from the south-west at the time, but at about nine o'clock in the evening, and when about half way across, it became intensely dark. At the same time a terrible gale of wind blew up from the south-east, threatening us with immediate destruction, and rapidly drifting us to the north-west. The sails were immediately furled, but the boat became unmanageable—the waves rolled high. We knew not what to do—it was so dark we could not see each other, except by an occasional flash of lightning which only served to make our inevitable doom more apparent. Suddenly, and while we were expecting every moment to go to the bottom, a brilliant ball of light, from four to six inches in diameter, appeared at the mast-head, and simultaneously several small lights appeared on the pole in the hands of one of the party, which he was using to steer the boat, (as we could not guide it with the rudder,) also one upon each shoulder. He at the same time cried out, 'Never fear, our guardian spirits are with us!' The light at the mast-head moved toward the eastern shore. We steered for it, and with nothing to propel ourselves with, as we had no oars on board, the boat moved rapidly along toward the light, against wind and waves. At half-past eleven we landed, having run into a little harbor, nearly in a south-east direction from the place where the gale first struck us, having proceeded about eight miles, (for we had drifted back about a mile and a half,) propelled by an invisible power, in about two hours and thirty minutes.

'TIS A POINT I LONG TO KNOW.

BY DANIEL HERBERT.

A LADY going through a lodging-house in Malvern, was surprised to observe the following lines hung up in every room in the house. On inquiring the reason, she was told that Lord K——, had come to that house in a very precarious state of health, and even thought himself dying. One day he found in a book the verses—read and reread them; they suited exactly his own state of mind, and made so deep an impression on him, that, with God's blessing, his faith was confirmed. On leaving the lodging-house, Lord K——, asked the landlady to hang up the verses, trusting that they might be made of equal use to other poor sinners!

What is the point you long to know?
Methinks I hear you say—'tis this,
I want to know I'm born of God,
An heir of everlasting bliss;

Is this the point you long to know?
The point is settled in my view;
For if you want to love your God,
It proves that God has loved you.

I want to know Christ died for me;
I want to feel the seals within;
I want to know Christ's precious blood
Was shed to wash away my sin.

I want to feel more love to God;
I want more liberty in prayer;
But when I look within my heart,
It almost drives me to despair.

I want a mind more firmly fixed
On it, my everlasting Head;
I want to feel my soul alive,
And not so barren and so dead.

I want more faith—a stronger faith;
I want to feel its power within;
I want to feel more love to God;
I want to feel less love to sin.

I want to live above the world,
And count it all but trash and toys;
I want sweet tokens of God's grace,
Some foretaste of eternal joys.

I want—I know not what I want;
I want that real special good;
Yet all my wants are sum'd up here—
I want—I feel I want my God!

Is this the point you long to know?
The dead can neither feel nor see;
It is the slave that's bound in chains,
Who knows the worth of liberty.

So where a want like yours is found,
I think I may be bold to say,
The Lord has fixed within that heart
What hell can never take away.

However small thy grace appears,
There's plenty in thy gracious Head;
Those wants you feel, my Christian friends,
Are never found among the dead.

Always engage Satan in the Lord's strength, and answer him with God's word.

THE NATURE AND TENDENCY OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM.

We now come to notice the works of the enemy which the Scriptures condemn, among which the works of the magicians of Egypt are included. The first noticed in the Scriptures is witchcraft.

Many contend, and those too, who profess faith in the Bible, that there is no such thing as witchcraft; and that a belief in its existence is a relic of the superstition of the dark ages. But God said, [Ex. xxii, 18,] "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." This proves that witches did exist, or else God commanded them to put to death such as had no being, to suppose which, would be absurd. Paul also teaches in Gal. v, that witchcraft is one of the works of the flesh as much as envy, hatred, drunkenness, and murder. Thus the fact of its existence is established by both Testaments.

Again in Lev. xix, 26, they were forbidden to use enchantment; and verse 31 says: "Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after wizards to be defiled by them." And in chap. xx, 6, the Lord said he would cut off the soul that turned after wizards, and such as have familiar spirits. Also in verse 27; a wizard and such as had familiar spirits, either men or women, were to be put to death.

According to the definitions of the words witch, wizard, sorcerer, enchanter, &c., which we will give, these various works are closely allied to one another, or are all parts of the same work, differing more in degree than in nature. Most of them are named in Deut. xviii, 9-12, which is as follows:

"When thou art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not learn to do after the abominations of those nations. There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer. For all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord.

The following definitions are copied from Webster's Unabridged Dictionary:

WITCHCRAFT. The practices of witches; sorcery; enchantments; intercourse with the Devil; power more than natural.

SORCERY. Magic; enchantment; witchcraft; divination; by the assistance, or supposed assistance of evil spirits: or the power of commanding evil spirits.

ENCHANTMENT. The act of producing certain wonderful effects by the invocation or aid of demons, or the agency of certain supposed spirits; the use of magic arts, spells, or charms; incantations.

DIVINATIONS. The act of divining; a foretelling future events, or discovering things secret or obscure, by the aid of superior beings; or by other than human means.

NECROMANCY. Properly the art of revealing future events by means of a pretended communication with the dead.

FAMILIAR SPIRIT. A demon or evil spirit supposed to attend at a call.

But Israel did not keep free from these abominations. King Saul consulted a familiar spirit when the Lord rejected him, and would not answer him. It is no uncommon thing in these days for those to seek to familiar or evil spirits, who never ask counsel of the Lord, and who have no reverence for his word. Also Manasseh, who was very wicked, and in whose reign Israel was taken captive by the Assyrians, "did evil in the sight of the Lord, like unto the abominations of the heathen . . . he observed times, and used enchantments, and used witchcraft, and dealt with a familiar spirit, and with wizards; he wrought much evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger." 2 Chron. xxxiii, 2-6.

One writer in a spiritual paper has undertaken to show that this restriction was placed upon the Jews alone, given in a law specially for them; that Gentiles were never bound by it, and in this dispensation neither Jew nor Gentile is holden to it. But the following facts disprove the assertion: (1.) The Lord calls them "the abominations of the heathen," and after naming them says: "For all that do these things are an abomination to the Lord: and because of these abominations the Lord doth drive them out from before thee." Deut. xviii, 12. (2.) The abominable, and sorcerers are condemned in the New Testament; Rev. xxi, 8. See also Gal. v, 19-21; Acts xiii, 6-11; Elymas the sorcerer, a false prophet, withstood the apostles, and tried to turn away others from the faith. This is ever their intent. To him Paul used the following language: "O full of all subtilty and all mischief, thou child of the Devil, thou enemy of all righteousness." This language is applicable to all sorcerers, and their co-workers, according to the testimony of the Bible respecting their works. See Acts viii, 5-11; xvi, 16-18.

The viiith chapter of Isaiah is doubtless a prophecy of the present time, or the last days. Of this there are several separate points of proof in the chapter, only one of which we will notice. Verses 20, 21, "And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and that mutter: should not a people seek unto their God? for the living to the dead? To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

If "seeking unto them that have familiar spirits," and "the living to the dead" does not imply the present work of consulting mediums and countenancing their sorceries, to what could it apply? or is the Scripture without meaning? Only ten years ago this scripture might have appeared almost meaningless. Then the sorrowing friends would anxiously surround the bed of the dying, eager to catch each word, which was often laid up in the heart as a memento of the lost one. Then if the departed had aught to tell, it was listened to with breathless interest, as all were well assured that no future communication could pass between them till the morning of the resurrection should loose the now silent tongue. But now, how changed the times! Parents no longer regard death as an enemy tearing their children from their embrace; but as the best friend, to transplant them as buds of promise, where they can sooner blossom in a happier clime, and mature in richer beauty. The infidel no longer sinks to the sleep of death with a "fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries," but he is led to expect to be released from the sinful surroundings and propensities of the present state, to awake where there is no suffering for sin, and all are progressing toward perfect bliss; thus making the cross of Christ of no effect, and rendering the gospel a nullity. Witness the case of the blasphemer, Thomas Paine, as revealed through Rev. C. Hammond, medium. Death is regarded only as a transition, not to be dreaded nor avoided. While wisdom cries, "all they that hate me love death," [Prov. viii, 36,] the foolish turn away from the paths of wisdom, and say, "We have made a covenant with death, and with hell [the grave] are we at agreement." Isa. xxviii, 5. The word of God counts death an enemy; 1 Cor. xv, 26; and Jesus is the great life-giver, conferring immortality on all who seek for it by patient continuance in well doing; Ro. ii, 7. Of course, they who attribute immortality to another source, or seek for it in another way, dishonor God by rejecting the gospel of his Son. They reverse the order of scripture, which says that the Lord will destroy death, and raise the dead to life. See the following from a spiritual paper:

"Fold us in thy embrace, sweet angel death,
So that no cloud can our twin being sever;
Come with soft lips and kiss away our breath
And let us take our heavenward flight together."

The Scripture says that the saints of God will all take their "heavenward flight together," not when they die, but when the Lord Jesus shall come and raise them from their graves. 1 Thess. iv, 13-18. And he will not only "abolish death," [2 Tim. i, 10,] but also destroy him that has the power of death, that is the Devil. Heb. ii, 14. The Devil introduced sin into the world, and sin produced death. Rom. v, 12; vi, 23; Jas. i, 15. If the spiritual theory were true, to destroy death and bring the saints back from under its power, would only be to reverse a "desirable transition," and bring them down again from a superior to an inferior condition. Thus they despise the word of the Lord by calling "evil good, and good evil," and rob Jesus, the life-giver, of his glory. But there is a day coming when he will vindicate his truth, and his enemies shall perish; for he says: "And your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it." Isa. xxviii, 18.

Now the fact is clearly established that Moses was withstood by enchantment and sorcery, which is the work of the Devil to oppose the truth; by counterfeiting and imitating the miracles of God. So, in like manner, will the truth be resisted in the last days. So was it resisted in the days of Christ and his apostles; evil spirits, demons, were cast out by the followers of Christ; but there never was a time when seeking unto them that have familiar spirits was so universal as at the present. Kings and peasants, priests and people, rich and poor, all go hand in hand in the abominable work. That "they speak not according to this word," or "resist the truth," will be shown in commenting on other texts.

Two questions are asked and answered in Matt. xxiv. One concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, and one concerning the coming of Christ, and the end of the world. The Saviour points out the long tribulation of the church, principally under the persecution by the Papacy, which was to continue more than 1000 years. The full time of Papal rule, according to Dan. vii, 25, and Rev. xii, 6, 14; xiii, 7, was 1260 years, which commenced in 538 and terminated in 1798. The Saviour said the days should be shortened for the elect's sake. History shows that the days of Papal rule were not shortened, as the power continued with the Papacy till the Spring of 1798; but the tribulation or persecution did not continue the full term of the days. The persecution was abated by the influence of the Reformation, and entirely ceased before the power of the Papacy was taken away. This gave room for the precise fulfillment of the prophecy, concerning the signs of our Saviour's second coming. According to Mark xiii, 24, the first was to take place "in those days after that tribulation." The sun was darkened in 1780; just 18 years before the end of the days; (years;) and as the moon cannot give any light when the sun is darkened, the second sign was also fulfilled at the same time. The falling of the stars occurred 53 years afterwards, in 1833.* Says the Saviour, while discoursing of his coming, and the end of these days, "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there, believe it not. For there shall arise false christs and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders, insomuch that if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." Matt. xxiv, 23, 24.

It is truly marvelous that any should be so blind to the sense of this scripture as to apply the caution against those who say "Lo here is Christ, or there," to those who preach the near coming of the Lord. A true Advent believer cannot possibly proclaim that Christ is here, either in the desert, or in the secret chamber: but they teach exactly what the Scriptures say, that his coming is future, and will be personal and visible to all, even as the lightening shineth from one end of heaven to the other.

But we think this scripture is now being fulfilled. There is a class, very numerous at present, and fast increasing in numbers, who do thus teach. There are false christs and false prophets, fulfilling this scripture, showing great signs and wonders, and preaching that the Lord is come. See the following from the Spiritual Telegraph, under the head of an "Important Announcement to the World."

"Hearken then to the voice of wisdom, O ye inhabitants of the earth, and be not blinded as to your Lord's appearing; for he is already in your midst." This is in harmony with the general tenor of all spiritual teaching.

But if Christ is come, how is he come? We have not seen him; our friends still sleep in the dust; and as Peter said of David, so we can say of them, they are dead and buried, and their sepulchres are with us to this day. The above "important announcement" we cannot believe, until we can be assured that the events connected with his coming have taken place; but they have not yet. This leads us to the remark that it must be utterly impossible for false christs to appear and deceive those who have correct views of Christ and his offices. Thus, those who firmly believe that Christ is a High Priest on the throne of his Father, and that when he leaves that throne he will descend with a shout, with the voice of the Arch-angel and the trump of God, and that at his coming the righteous dead will be raised, the living changed, and all caught up together to meet the Lord in the air, while the wicked will be slain all over the earth; those, we say, who firmly believe these facts, cannot receive the testimony of false christs. And so also of false prophets. The Scriptures furnish a shield on every point; and those who have living faith in God's word will not be deceived.

But many who profess to believe the word of God, only ask for a manifestation of supernatural power or superhuman intelligence to give full credit to the testimony of the power or spirit communicating. But if no false or spurious manifestations of power could be given, this scripture could never be fulfilled. Hence, it is not sufficient proof of their truthfulness, to see signs and wonders wrought; for the false christs and false prophets will show them. From all this it is plain that before any one can successfully proclaim himself christ, he must destroy confidence in the exalted nature and position of Christ, or so pervert the testimony of Scripture as to make Christ such an one as himself. This Spiritualists have done as the following quotations fully prove. The first is from the Spiritual Telegraph, No. 37, and is the testimony of a "spirit" through a "medium."

"What is the meaning of the word Christ? 'Tis not as is generally supposed, the Son of the Creator of all things. Any just and perfect being is Christ. The crucifixion of Christ is nothing more than the crucifixion of the spirit, which all have to contend with before becoming perfect and righteous. The miraculous conception of Christ is merely a fabulous tale." Telegraph, No. 37.

Many expressions to the same intent might be quoted. The next is from a paper read at the spiritual investigating class in the city of New York, by Dr. Weisse.

"Friend Orton seems to make rather light of the communications from spirits, concerning Christ. It seems, nevertheless, that all the testimony received from advanced spirits only shows that Christ was a medium and reformer in Judea; that he now is an advanced spirit in the sixth sphere; but that he never claimed to be God, and does not at present. I have had two communications to that effect. I have also read some that Dr. Hare had. If I am wrong in my views of the Bible, I should like to know it, for the spirits and mediums do not contradict me."

The third is from Dr. Hare himself, given also in the investigating class; though this remark of Dr. H. was made subsequent to that of Dr. Weisse, as above; of course Dr. W. refers to other remarks of a similar nature from Dr. Hare.

"He said that he had been thus protected from deception by the spirits of Washington and Franklin, and that they had brought Jesus Christ to him, with whom he had also communicated. He had first repelled him as an impostor; but became convinced afterward that it was really him. He related that he had learned from that high and holy Spirit that he was not the character Christendom had represented him to be, and not responsible for the errors connected with his name, but that he was, while on earth, a medium of high and extraordinary powers, and that it was solely through his mediumistic capabilities that he attained so great knowledge and was enabled to practice such apparent wonders."

In these quotations the infidelity of the authors is apparent to all. Dr. J. B. Dods, celebrated as a psychologist and spiritualist, is called a "christian spiritualist;" and to show that there is no great difference of faith between the infidel and so-called christian spiritualists, we quote the following from the report of a case of healing by Dr. Dods through spirit influence. He says, "After she was carried into the hall, and near the close of the ceremony (which was a written one) I used these words,— 'Betsy, in the name of the great Master Medium of our race, be whole of your infirmities. Arise and walk.'"

By what power he thought she was healed will be shown by another quotation from the same letter which will be presented on another text.

The above quotations from high spiritual authority show that the way is now fully prepared for false christs to make their appearance and present their claims. Christ "was a medium of high and extraordinary powers," and is now a "spirit in the sixth sphere," but yet behind others, for there are seven spheres. After this the reader will be prepared to believe that we have seen and now know of persons who claim, not only to possess the power that he possessed, but to be christs. Can any one doubt that our Saviour's words will be completely fulfilled in our very midst? "Many shall come in my name, saying I am christ, and shall deceive many." Surely with such warnings as the Scriptures give, with such faithful delineations of these works of darkness before us, we need not be deceived. But such as love not the truth will fall an easy prey to these deceptions. There is only one way of safety in these times of peril, that is to commit our ways, to the Lord, and seek the sustaining and protecting influence of his Spirit, by entire consecration to him, and a renunciation of everything selfish and worldly.

ROCKS AND SHOALS. AN EXTRACT.

SOME time since, a preacher of some note called on me, and with great earnestness asked me if I saw a notice in the papers of an "indignation meeting" held in his town not long before? On telling him I had not, he began to speak much in its praise, and especially to commend the brethren for their zeal, and spirited resolutions offered on the occasion. I confess I could not help the thought of Jesus and the Apostles recommending to the churches the propriety of holding indignation meetings, to condemn the wickedness of the "powers that be."

I fancied that I saw the church at Jerusalem assemble, with Peter at their head, who told them that the church was responsible for all the evils in the land, and said it was the duty of the church to show herself first and foremost in every good work, and Rome must be reformed, or it would soon be blotted out as a nation. To arouse them to action,

8. From the prophetic style of the chapter [Rev. xi.] it is evident that all that is said concerning the witnesses takes place before the second woe ends. The second woe ended in 1840. Subsequent to that date then we cannot look for a fulfillment of what is said of the two witnesses.

But it is urged that the saints will all be put to death from the testimony of Rev. xiii, 15 which reads as follows: "And he (the Two-horned beast) had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed." But we read right on in verse 16, "And he causeth all both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond to receive a mark," &c. Now are we all expecting to receive the mark of the beast? By no means; yet it says that he causeth all to receive the mark. Hence we see that the verb, cause, may be limited. And when therefore we read in verse 15, that he should cause some to be killed, which Wakefield renders, "Give orders that they should be killed," &c., we think the decree may be limited in its effects; and that the saints are to be delivered from it will appear from the following positive particulars:

1. They are to get the victory over the beast and his image. But, says one, it is not getting the victory over the beast to be passively delivered out of his hands? Admitted. But is it getting the victory over him to fall beneath his power? By no means; no more than we get the victory over death when we die. But let us suppose that when the beast attempts to enforce his decrees against us, when our enemies come against us in a transport of fury, to utterly exterminate us from the earth; suppose then that we can exercise so much faith, and are clothed with so much of the power of God, that their arms palsy before us, and their weapons fall from their hands, that they cannot stand in our presence, and that one saint can chase a thousand and two put ten thousand to flight, [Deut. xxxii, 20.] would not that be getting the victory over them? Verily. And that such will be the case with us we have no reason to doubt, but much to believe. See Experience and Views p. 17.

2. Paul says plainly that we shall not all sleep. His words are, "Behold I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." 1 Cor. xv, 51. Testimony so plain and positive as this can neither be set aside nor evaded. To say that it means that we shall not all be asleep is but an evasion of the most glaring kind. The text does not say that, but, we shall not all sleep, fall asleep; the verb being in the same construction as the following one, we shall be changed. Now if we are actually reduced to a state of death, if it is for no more than five minutes, we sleep as really as though it was for five thousand years; and Paul's declaration proves a failure. But we do not believe his world will fail; we do not believe that we shall all sleep.

3. Paul declares that some will be alive and remain. "Then we," says he, "which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them, (the resurrected righteous dead.)"

We close the testimony here, not because there is nothing more that might be said, or because there are not many more absurdities which necessarily attach themselves to the theory under consideration, but because we think enough has been offered. Eleven objections have been noticed each one of which is fatal to its existence. With one more consideration we leave the subject.

It is claimed by various persons who are just now originating and endeavoring to promulgate new views, that this is the way to get the "gold;" that the gold is some new truth to be developed, which we are to obtain by receiving it and acting upon it. But let us candidly answer for ourselves one question. Is the gold which we are commanded to obtain, a theory of the truth, or has it any connection with truth? We are now represented as poor and destitute, without the gold; we do not possess it. If then the gold is truth, it follows that we are yet destitute of truth—a summary way truly of throwing the Third Angel's Message and its kindred subjects into impenetrable shade. But again, if the gold is some new truth to be developed, it follows that there is truth yet to be brought out, which compared with the truth we now possess, is as gold compared with nothing. For, mark, we are without the gold yet, but we are to obtain it by the reception of new truth. This is the theory. But do any of our readers believe that there is truth yet to be developed, of such vitality and importance, that, compared with the great truths of the Third Angel's Message, the Sanctuary, the Sabbath, the Coming of the Lord, &c., it is as gold compared with nothing? The thought is unworthy of any believer in the Third Message. We do not say that there is no new truth to be brought out from time to time; but when the time comes for its development, it will appear in such force and beauty, that the church will be ready to yield to the one and acknowledge the other.

We apprehend that our poverty consists of a lack of spiritual graces rather than a theory of truth; and we think therefore, that, if there were more strenuous efforts after vital godliness, and less speculation upon doubtful and uncertain points, we should find ourselves more rapidly obtaining the true riches which will enable us to stand before our Lord with confidence at his appearing and kingdom.—Ed.

CONDITIONS OF SALVATION. No. 3.

BY M. E. S.

"All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine," &c. Everything written through the dictation of the Spirit of God must necessarily be harmonious, otherwise we would make the Holy Spirit sometimes a lying one, and no longer holy; also the Scriptures given by its inspiration would become contradictory and hence unprofitable. But Paul says they are profitable, and "God is not the author of confusion." 1 Cor. xiv, 33. Hence Bible testimony, regarding any one point of doctrine, will harmonize; the mysterious, being explained by the plain teachings. We will now proceed to consider New Testament evidences regarding the kingdom of God, endeavoring to find out the harmonious teachings of New Testament writers.

Many take the position that the kingdom of heaven, and kingdom of God, as brought to view in the holy Scriptures, is a "kingdom of grace," set up at Christ's first advent. I would ask such, were the patriarchs, prophets, and saints who lived previous to that time, excluded from the grace? i. e., the free favor of God? If he has been King of his Church only since the first advent, who governed his Church previously? God indeed is King and has been from all eternity, as he says, [Isa. lxvi, 1.] "The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool;" but he is no more ruler of his Church in this age, than any other; he no more reigns over the righteous than the wicked; for "he is a great King over all the earth." Ps. xlvii, 2. None, I think will contend that this is the kingdom of promise for which the disciples were admonished to seek; [Matt. vi, 33:] since they were already in this kingdom and could not therefore seek for it. Let us see if the New Testament can be harmonized with the view that the kingdom of heaven is the Church, and has existed more than 1800 years.

Matt. xiii, 24-30, 36-44. Here, "the kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field"—i. e., the Church according to modern theology. But lo! "while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat." The Saviour says, [John xv, 1.] "I am the true vine and my Father is the husbandman." Then it is his place alone to engraft branches. "Ye (disciples) are the branches," and we may be sure he will have no hypocrite among them; even the true branches, when they cease to bear fruit, he takes away; but here the enemy comes and engrafs tares; will the husbandman scruple to cut them off any more than he does the fruitless branches? But in this instance, he tells his servants, who come inquiring whether they may gather them up, to let them grow lest they should root up the wheat with the tares.

We see at once the vine and field cannot be the same. Then what is represented by the field? Jesus tells us, verse 38, "The field is the world, the good seed are the children of the kingdom."—(Not that they are really possessing the kingdom, for Paul says, [Rom. viii, 17.] "If children then heirs." Now an heir is an expectant to an estate, not an actual possessor.) "The tares are the children of the wicked one; the enemy that sowed them is the Devil." He first introduced sin into the world. Verse 41. "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity." "Out of his kingdom," i. e., the territory of his kingdom, the world, or the field in which the tares were sown, that are here gathered out. There will be none in the literal kingdom which do iniquity; for, says Paul, "the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, (right doing,) and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." That is, these are attributes of the kingdom.

Verse 43. "Then shall the righteous shine forth (when? after the harvest, which is the end of the world,) as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." This parable we see is not introduced to represent the kingdom of God after it is established, but to show the probationary season given to man as preparatory to the kingdom [verses 31-33.] The kingdom of heaven likened to a grain of mustard seed; and verse 33, the leaven which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened, we conceive represent the same thing; not the Church, however, evangelizing the world, till the whole become converted. The parable already noticed sufficiently confutes this idea.

At the time of harvest, which is the end of the world, there are tares which are to be gathered and burned; hence the whole world could not have been previously christianized. Nor can it mean the kingdom itself, for nothing will enter there that in any way defiles, and consequently needs leavening. 1 Cor. vi, 9, 10; Eph. v, 5. "For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of God and of Christ." What then is represented by the parable under consideration? Doubtless the "word of the kingdom," [verse 19.] in other words, the gospel and its influences. What answers to the three measures of meal? We answer, the three dispensations in which the gospel has been proclaimed: the Patriarchal, Mosaic and Christian. The people of God in two measures have already been "leavened," and but little time now remains for the completion of the third.

Verses 44-47. The kingdom of God is like treasure hid in a field, and like a pearl of great price, to secure which a man sells all he has. So will one leave all worldly interests and pleasures to obtain an inheritance in the kingdom of God.

Verses 47-52. This parable of the net is the same with that of the wheat and tares. Chap. xi, 12. "From the days of John the Baptist, until now, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." Why since his days? Because the kingdom of God began then to be especially preached. We think the latter clause of this verse is synonymous with Luke xiii, 24.—"Strive to enter in at the strait gate." Literally, agonize, because the time is short, and many will seek to enter in and shall not be able, "when once the Master of the house has risen up," &c. Macknight renders this passage, "Force your way through the strait gate," which sufficiently explains the text under consideration, showing the earnest endeavors that must be made in order to secure an entrance into the kingdom of heaven. Luke xvi, 16. "The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it." This passage is so nearly like the preceding that it requires little comment. We see, however, if it proves an establishment of the kingdom, it proves too much for modern theology, which teaches that Christ set up the kingdom, not John. (We will presently notice passages which show when the kingdom is established.)

Matt. xvi, 28. "Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." This declaration of Jesus was verified

"after six days." [chap. xvii, 1,] when he took Peter, James, and John and brought them up into a high mountain, and was transfigured before them. There was Jesus, the King, Elijah the representation of the saints who should be alive at Christ's second coming, and would be caught up as he was, [1 Thess. iv, 17,] and Moses, representing the resurrected saints. This however was the kingdom in vision, ("tell the vision to no man," &c., verse 9,) it was not that they were actually to see Jesus coming in his kingdom, for then all the holy angels should accompany him. Matt. xxv, 31.

Matt. xxi, 43. "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Jesus was here addressing the Jews, who were the literal descendants of Abraham, David, &c., to whom the promise of the kingdom (we have seen in previous numbers that they received nothing more,) was especially given. Being such, the kingdom, or rather the hope of the kingdom (since they could transmit to their posterity no more of the inheritance than they had actually received) would be theirs by natural descent; but they, forfeiting their title to it by sin and rebellion, Jesus tells them it (the hope which was all they had) should be taken from them nationally and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof, doubtless referring to the call of the Gentiles.

Luke xviii, 21. "The kingdom of God is within you." Would those who believe that the Church is the kingdom of God, be willing to take the position that it was within the hypocritical Pharisees! The margin reads, "among you," see also Doddridge, meaning the elements of the kingdom. The earth or territory of the kingdom, Jesus, and some of his followers were all there among the Pharisees.

Luke vi, 20. "Blessed be ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God." When is it theirs? Says James, [chap. ii, 5,] "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him." Then it is a subject of promise to those who love God, and are consequently already in the kingdom, according to popular teaching.

Matt. xi, 11. Is the least member of the Church greater than John the Baptist, of whom Jesus said, "Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist; notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he?"

Matt. xii, 28. "But if I cast out Devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you." Satan, being expelled, they were prepared to become the disciples of Christ and heirs of the kingdom, which, however, it was impossible for them at that time to enter, according to 1 Cor. xv, 50. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. How then were they ever to possess it, since they were here flesh and blood? "Behold, says Paul, I show (explain to) you a (or the) mystery; we shall not all sleep (die, says Macknight) but we shall all be changed."

Verse 53. "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Until this change is effected (which is at the last trump, verse 52) Paul teaches us we cannot expect to enter the kingdom. This agrees with the testimony of Jesus, [Matt. xxv, 34,] "Then (when the Son of man shall come in his glory, verse 31) shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Also 2 Pet. i, 5-12. Peter here exhorts his brethren to give all diligence, endeavoring to add one grace to another, and thus make their calling and elections sure. "For so," says he, "an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." Now what was the consistency of admonishing his brethren (who were of course in the Church) to growth in grace, in order that they might never fall, but obtain an entrance into the kingdom at some future time, if they were already in it? They could no more enter the kingdom again without first falling, than we could enter a room we were already in without first going out.

Col. i, 13. "Who . . . hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son," i. e., into the hope of the kingdom, otherwise this passage would contradict the above. Paul says he "callesh those things which be not as though they were." Rom. iv, 17. Rev. i, 9, may be harmonized in the same way. "I John who also am your brother and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ." John was then in tribulation. "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." Acts xiv, 22. He was also in patience. In the kingdom itself is "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." There will be no tribulation and no need of patience.

Mark i, 15. "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," i. e., next in order; here means of universal monarchies. We find from Daniel, chap. ii, that there were to be five universal kingdoms upon earth; first, Babylon, followed by Medo-Persia; next, Grecia, then Rome, and lastly, the kingdom of God. Now in the time of the Babylonish empire, it could have been said, the kingdom of Medo-Persia is at hand, but not the Roman, since it was not the next in order. In the days of the Medo-Persian, the Grecian was at hand. So in the last or Roman which bore rule in the days of our Saviour, it might have said in truth, "the kingdom of God is at hand;" but not before; (thus we find this express declaration was not proclaimed previously;) but it will be truth till the Roman kingdom gives place to the kingdom of God. Has the Roman passed away? It has not; but exists at present in the divided form which was to immediately precede the setting up of the everlasting kingdom of God. Dan. ii.

Christ tells us when we may know that the kingdom of God is "nigh at hand." See Luke, chap. xxi. He follows down the chain of events from the time that Jerusalem was compassed with armies, (i. e., the Roman army under Titus, which trod down the city, and caused its inhabitants to be led away captive into all nations,) through the years 1780, and 1833, which witnessed the signs in the sun, moon and stars. He then passes on till the powers of heaven are shaken, and the Son of man is seen coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. Then after introducing the similitude of the fig-tree, whose shooting forth proclaims the approach of Summer, Jesus says, "So likewise, ye when ye see these things come to pass (not before) know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." We are now many years past the signs mentioned, consequently we can say to-day, "the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."

SELECTIONS.

"I Mark only the Hours that Shine."

THERE is a sun-dial in Italy, with the above inscription upon it. It strikes us as a happy one, and quite suggestive. Well would it be if the children of men more generally did, what the sun-dial does; but they do just the contrary. Instead of "marking the hours that shine," they mark those that do not shine; instead of noting the pleasant days, those of prosperity, they note the unpleasant, those of adversity; instead of enumerating their mercies, they count and dwell upon their trials; they look upon the dark side of life, not upon the bright side. And what is the consequence! Just what we should suppose it would be. Instead of being grateful, contented and cheerful, they are querulous, restless and sad.

We are not as when we were originally created, in a state of innocence. We are sinners. As such, we are treated much better than we deserve.—"Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not." Instead of complaining at the evils which fall to our lot, those aches, pains, disappointments, and troubles which are inseparable from lapsed humanity, which others have suffered before us, and are suffering in common with us, for every heart knoweth its own bitterness, and "in Adam's fall, we sinned all," we should compare our afflictions with our guilt, think of many good things, which, notwithstanding this guilt, we are permitted to enjoy, think of that better world where sorrow is unknown, "a long eternity of bliss," prepare for it, and anticipate it, and, "mark the hours that shine."

The Garment of Self Righteousness.

SOME years ago, a white man and an Indian were deeply convicted under the same sermon. The Indian almost immediately was rejoicing in pardoning mercy, but the white man was for a long time in great distress and almost despair, until at last he too found peace in God's forgiving love.

Some time afterwards, on meeting his Indian brother, he asked him, "How was it that I should be so long under conviction, when you found comfort so soon?" "Oh, brother," replied the Indian, "me tell you: there come along a rich prince; he promise to give you a new coat; you look at your coat and say, 'I do n't know, my coat pretty good, it will do a little longer.' He then offer me a new coat. I look at my old blanket; I say, 'This good for nothing; I fling it right away, and take the new coat. Just so, brother, you try to make your old righteousness do for a little while, you so slow to give it up; but I, poor Indian, had none; so I glad to take at once the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ.'"

Phenomena at New Haven.

DR. W. PORTER, gives in the New Haven Journal and Courier, an account of phenomena witnessed at the house of Dr. Stiles, in that city, of which the following were the principal:

"I asked if the spirit could place the table on the top of my head; it answered, Yes. It was then raised up by an unseen power, and placed, legs up, upon my head. . . . Then an article was thrown from the opposite side of the room across where we sat, which proved to be a horn, a part of an umbrella handle; then came another article whizzing by our ears, which was found to be a tin half pint measure, which came from a closet at least twelve feet from where we sat, and was thrown a distance of twenty feet; then came a chair from the further end of the room, passing over our heads, and rested on the opposite side of the room from where it was first moved. The above manifestations were seen by a dim light. The gas was then turned on so as to produce a brilliant light, and the question was asked, 'Can you raise the table without our touching it?' The response was, 'Yes.' The table was then raised by invisible power clear from the floor at least one foot, and there held, without any one being in contact with it. The question was then asked the spirit, 'Can you dance?' It responded by dropping the table to the floor, and rapping to indicate 'yes.' One then commenced to sing in a lively manner Yankee Doodle, upon which the table commenced and continued to drum with its legs, and sounding every note very distinct until the tune was finished."

A Criticism.

A WRITER who has been discussing the "life and death" question through the columns of the Sabbath Recorder, gives the following stricture on Luke xxiii, 42:—

"Greek scholars tell us that the word 'Semeion,' which is rendered, 'To-day,' in our version, is not a noun, in the original, but an adverb, that it is used to give strength to the indicative form, and qualifies the verb say, instead of the verb shall be, and that the 'little dot with a quill to it,' called a comma, (no part of inspiration,) should be placed after the word to-day, instead of before, in which case, the mighty argument in favor of a conscious existence after death, vanishes in a moment."

IF the Roman army lost a single victory because the numerous mice that infested the country had gnawed their bowstrings, how many a victory has been lost by the soldiers of the cross, because the sinews of their spiritual strength had been cut by the sins of unbelief?—Burder.

THE REVIEW AND HERALD.

"Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

BATTLE CREEK FIFTH-DAY, NOV. 18, 1858.

THE CLOSE.

TIME in its rapid flight brings the close of another volume of the REVIEW. Thus another waymark is set up in our history; we pass as it were another milestone on our way to the land of promise—that good land of which the Lord has said, I will give it you. What feelings does it excite within you, reader, and what emotions, as you see the sands in time's great hour glass so near run out, and so swiftly falling? what feelings, as you behold the lines of prophecy which span earth's existence in its present state, converging to a common center just before you? what feelings, as you think of the allotted days of time growing less and less continually, and the approaching end—your day of deliverance, or your day of doom—drawing near and more near with every rising and setting sun? Is the revelation of the Lord Jesus in flaming fire the great waymark before you? Or are you putting far away the evil day? Are you becoming somewhat attached to this wilderness state, tarrying in your pilgrimage, and building your hopes in a region like this? Or are you laying up treasure above, centering your affections on things around the throne, and pressing onward to enjoy them there? Can you adopt from day to day the language of the poet,

"One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er,
I'm nearer my home to-day,
Than ever I've been before?"

Or are you seeking

"a home below
Which flames devour, and waves o'erflow?"

The danger of worldliness, covetousness, carelessness, pride, indifference, and lukewarmness, different writers have endeavored faithfully to set forth in the REVIEW during the past volume. How far they shall be heeded, remains for each to say, not in word only, but in the daily walks of life also. Admonitions and exhortations have enough been given to produce, if heeded, a living church, with loins girded and lamps burning, waiting for the coming of their Lord. We are responsible, brethren, for all these.

The evidences we have had during the past twenty-six weeks of the spread and triumph of the truth in different places, has been a source of no small comfort and encouragement. The leaven of truth is still working. The cause is still onward. We know its destiny, and that of all those who stand stiffly in its defense.

Let us keep on board the old ship Zion which the Lord has piloted through all the perils of the sea of time for six thousand years. Many have entered false crafts, and the worldly churches have taken to the huge raft of popularity and worldly honor, which Satan has towed along by its side, to lure the mariner from the only ark of safety, by promising him a better or an easier passage to his desired haven. Floods of Jehovah's wrath will swamp and swallow up all these ere long. But the bark of truth will safely anchor in the harbor of eternal safety.

"We've looked astern and many toils,
The Lord has brought us through;
We're looking now ahead, and lo!
The land appears in view."

THIS GENERATION—THE PERIOD OF ITS APPLICATION.

The generation of Matt. xxiv, applies to a class of people that are connected with certain events of a particular period, which are the signs of Christ's coming.

"Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." The phrase "all these things" refers to the signs and the events which are specified in verses 29, 30. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened and the moon shall not give her light; and the stars shall fall from heaven; and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven," &c. "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." Luke xxi, 28. "When ye see all these things, know that he (margin) is near, even unto the doors. Truly I say unto you, this very generation will not pass away till all these things are fulfilled." Whiting's Translation.

Nothing in the Bible is more definite and clearly expressed than the period of this generation. It commenced with the beginning of these events—the darkening of the sun and moon in A. D. 1780, and continues throughout their whole period, even until the Son of man is seen coming in the clouds of heaven. There is now living a remnant of the generation that witnessed the first signs—the darkening of the sun and moon—seventy eight years ago; and according to the course of nature, they cannot continue many years longer; but when we rely upon the words of Christ, that it shall not pass away until all these events are fulfilled, we have a strong pillar to rest our faith upon that is not easily shaken.

O. NICHOLS.

Dorchester, Mass.

REMARKS The difference of opinion that exists concerning the intent of the phrase "this generation," among those who give it an application to our own days, we look upon as not of essential importance, since none claim that anything very definite is brought to view by it, and since either view represents the generation as fast ebbing away, and makes the end to be, therefore, very near at hand. Concerning the view set forth above, it might be asked how many the generation would include; whether it would embrace those who were in the earliest stages of infancy at the time the sun was darkened, or whether it would include only those who were at that time of such an age as to retain the memory of the event, and to understand the feelings which its occurrence excited among the people. If it includes absolutely all whose ages do not date this side of the event, it must take in the youngest who were then living. But persons of one, two, or three years, at least, could retain no knowledge of the event; and to all such, it is as much a matter of history, as to us. So far, therefore, as a personal knowledge of the event is concerned, they are no better qualified to belong to the generation, than we, whose lives have fallen in a later time; for they are dependent, as well as we, for a knowledge of the event, upon the records of history. But if we recognize those only as belonging to that generation, who were able to understand the nature of the event, and retain the memory of it, we might be at a loss where to draw the line among those then living, and it may be a question how many such are still alive.

If we apprehend the Saviour's teaching, an essential feature of the generation which he is addressing, is "the seeing of these things." When ye see these things, &c., lift up your heads for your redemption draweth nigh. But we are not aware that these things were particularly seen, or regarded, as signs and precursors of the great day of the Lord, till the First Angel commenced his proclamation, and the attention of the people was called to them as such. We are therefore inclined to the opinion that the generation of which the Saviour declares that it shall not pass away, embraces all those in a situation to understand the proclamation of the First Angel, and who were taught to look upon the signs in the sun, moon and stars as precursors of the great and notable day of the Lord. It would be but just and reasonable to suppose that the great body of those who heard that proclamation as it went forth, who received the message with scorn and its heralds with contempt, who persecuted the honest souls who walked up to the light they had, who mocked and exulted over their disappointments and their trials—it would be but right and proper, according the best conception we can have of things, that the mass of these should live to behold the triumph of the little despised flock, and to be themselves overtaken by that destruction from the presence of the Lord which they have so long affected to despise. Such we believe will be the case. We do not believe this generation will pass away, or in other words, that the great body of those who have personal knowledge of the Advent movement of the past, will give place to, and be supplanted by, a generation of their posterity who have not such knowledge, ere all these things are accomplished, and the Lord fulfills his promises in the deliverance of his people. Should this application be correct it shows, no less than the view above taken, that the consummation of the believer's hope cannot be far distant.

BUT few of those to whom we gave notice in No. 17, that their papers must be discontinued unless heard from, have responded to our appeal. It only remains that we fulfill our intention, and, as we copy our books, drop their names. We are sorry thus to part with any of our subscribers; for we do not believe they can well do without the REVIEW; nor do we want to do without them, if they are willing and desirous to do what they can to advance what we are confident is the best cause on earth. But we think we set forth no unreasonable terms, since all we required was that those who wished the paper and could not pay, should simply write and inform us of the fact; and we cannot believe that many are so reduced as not to be in possession of a scrap of paper, an envelope and a postage-stamp. All we can say then is that those who do not receive their paper after this date, will understand the reason.

Note of Explanation.

I FEEL that an explanation is due to those friends who have written to me, calling for my labors. To them and others I wish to say, their letters have been unanswered for want of time. My father came from Missouri, where he had been to visit his sons, early in October: he was taken sick on the road, and was very sick at my house up to the time of his death, on the evening of the 6th inst. This has greatly hindered my preparations for winter, yet I expect from this time to devote a part of my time in the cause of truth, and will answer calls as far and as fast as I possibly can.

KEEP THY HEART.

SAYS Solomon, "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life." Prov. iv, 23. As the heart is the seat both of all good and of all evil, the injunction of this text is one of vital importance; one that all should carefully heed.

Let the heart be given unreservedly to the Lord; let it be brought into subjection to his righteous will, and kept with all diligence; and an inestimable treasure of good things will ever be found there.

But neglect the heart; let it be devoted to self and the love of the world; suffer not the love of God to enter there; crowd out the influences of the Holy Spirit; and it becomes the fountain of evil, the center of all wickedness.

Says the Saviour, "O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things; and an evil man out of the evil treasure bringeth forth evil things." Matt. xii, 34, 35. "For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies." 1b. xv, 19.

"My son give me thine heart," is the language of inspiration. But how reluctantly, how sparingly do men give to God their hearts, while its avenues are made large and opened widely for this world, for a treasure of dust and of dross. Oh what folly! Oh how wretched the choice made by the great majority of the children of men!

But how is it with us, professing to walk in the light of the last message of mercy? Do we keep a diligent watch of our hearts? Are we buying the gold tried in the fire? Shall we be found with the

GOD EVERY WHERE.

Thy guiding finger, Lord, I view,
Traced in the midnight planets' blaze,
Or glistening in the morning dew;
Whate'er is beautiful or fair,
Is but thine own reflection there.

I hear thee in the stormy wind,
That turns the ocean-wave to foam;
Nor less thy wondrous power I find,
When summer airs around me roam;
The tempest and the calm declare Thyself,—for thou art every where.

I find thee in the noon of night,
And read thy name in every star,
That drinks its splendor from the light,
That flows from mercy's beaming car:
Thy footstool, Lord, each starry gem
Composes—not thy diadem.

And when the radiant orb of light
Hath tipped the mountain-tops with gold,
Smote with the blaze my weary sight
Shrinks from the wonders I behold:
That ray of glory bright and fair,
Is but thy living shadow there.

Thine is the silent noon of night,
The twilight eve—the dewy morn;
Whate'er is beautiful and bright,
Thine hands have fashioned to adorn:
Thy glory walks in every sphere,
And all things whisper, "God is here!"

MISCELLANEOUS EXTRACTS ON HELL.

[In last week's REVIEW, we gave an article from the Independent, in which the writer said, that we needed to hear again the voice of an Edwards, Bellamy, Taylor, &c., on this subject. The reader will find below specimens from some of them.—ED.]

In Sermons, Vol. iv, p. 287, and onward, Pres. Edwards says:

"The woes of sinners in hell will not be a cause of grief to the saints in heaven, but of rejoicing. This rejoicing will be the fruit of an amiable disposition, and a perfect holiness and conformity to Christ. At the Judgment you may be ready to fly to some godly friend, but you will see them unconcerned for you, with joy ascending to meet their Lord, and not the less joyful for the horror in which they see you. When they hear you groan and gnash your teeth, these things will not move them to pity you. After your godly parents shall have seen you lie in hell millions of ages, in torment day and night, they will not begin to pity you then; they will praise God that his justice appears in the eternity of your misery."

Pages 260-1. "But to help your conception, imagine yourselves to be cast into a fiery oven, all of a glowing heat, or into the midst of a glowing brick-kiln, or a great furnace; imagine also that your body were to be there for a quarter of an hour, full of fire, as full within and without as a bright coal of fire, all the while full of quick sense, how long would that quarter of an hour seem to you? If it were measured by a glass, how long would the glass seem to be running? But what would be the effect on your soul, if you must endure the torment twenty-four hours? O then how would your heart sink if you knew you must endure it forever and ever! That after millions of ages your torment would be no nearer an end than when it began. But your torment in hell will be immensely greater than this illustration represents!!"

The above is a specimen of five sermons from him on this subject. "Professor Finny," says Blain, "slanders God far worse by saying that the torment will eternally increase!"

Newton's Works, V. vi, London edition, 1787. "Imagine such a state of misery you may, but you can never seriously believe it, nor reconcile it to God and goodness."

Blain says, "Catholics may keep ignorant enough still to believe in their purgatory. But a great reason of this continued belief is, that their hell is almost infinitely better than the Protestant hell; as their popes and priests can pray all out of it; while from the Protestant hell, divines say the Almighty himself can deliver none!"

Dr. J. Watts was a more reasonable man, and says in his work on the "World to Come," p. 161, "Nor do I think we ought usually, when we speak concerning creatures, to affirm positively that their existence shall be equal to the blessed God, especially with regard to the duration of their punishment. * * * If the blessed God should at any time, in consistence with his perfections, release those wretched creatures from their acute pains in hell, either with a design of the utter destruction of their being, by annihilation; or to put them into some world upon a new foot of trial, I think I ought joyfully to accept this appointment of God, and add my joys and praises to all the songs of the heavenly world, in the day of such a glorious release of those prisoners."

On p. 191 he says, "Dr. Thomas Burnet published a treatise in Latin, against the eternity of punishment; and in it advised ministers, whatsoever they concluded, whether the nature of punishment was eternal or not, that they ought to use the 'common doctrine' in their preaching; especially as those sinners of a lower rank would 'run headlong into vice,' and could only be restrained by 'fear of punishment.'" And Dr. B. further adds to the clergy, that "If any should translate these sentiments into English, I shall think he does it with an evil design, and to a bad purpose." Would that men would write all their wicked doctrines in Latin, and preach the truth to those whom they style sinners of a lower rank.

How true it is, as Mr. Blain remarks, "The heathen reason better. In Siam a priest came to our missionary and asked how long his God tormented men in a future state; and when he replied, 'Forever,' he answered, 'Our god torments the worst of men only one thousand years, so we will not have your American God here in Siam!' Death not life, p. 116.

A few more horrors of this doctrine may be found in Dr. Beecher's "Conflict of Ages," pp. 190, 191. "Who can describe the gloom of him who looks on such a prospect? How dark to him appears the history of man! He looks with pity on the children that pass him in the streets. The more violent manifestations of this depravity seem to be the unfoldings of a corrupt nature, given to them by God, before any knowledge, choice or consent of their own. Mercy now seems to be no mercy, and he who once delighted to speak of the love of Christ, is obliged to close his lips in silence, for the original wrong of giving man such a nature, seems so great that no subsequent acts can atone for the deed. In this state of mind he who once delighted to pray, kneels and rises again, because he cannot sincerely worship the only God he sees. His distress is not on his own account. He feels that God has redeemed and regenerated him; but this gives him no relief. He feels as if he could not be bribed by the offer of all the honors of the universe, to pretend to worship or praise a God whose character he cannot defend. Never before has he felt so deeply a longing after a God of a spotless character. Never has he so deeply felt that the whole light and joy of the universe are in him, and that when his character is darkened, all worlds are filled with gloom. * * * In contrast with this it would be appropriate to place the experience of one who retains all the radical facts as to human depravity, and the system that grows out of it, but passes from the deep gloom of the last experience, into the sunshine of divine glory, by discovering a mode in which these facts can be so adjusted as to harmonize with the principles of honor and right in God."

If Dr. Beecher has discovered a mode of adjustment to harmonize such a doctrine with principles of honor and right in God, others have been less fortunate; one at least, in the person of Rev. A. Barnes. See Practical Sermons, pp. 123-125. "That the immortal mind should be allowed to jeopard its infinite welfare, and that trifles should be allowed to draw it away from its God, and virtue, and heaven; that any should suffer forever, lingering on in hopeless despair, and rolling amidst infinite torments without the possibility of alleviation, and without end; that since God can save men, and will save a part, he has not purposed to save all; that, in a word, God, who claims to be worthy of the confidence of the universe, and to be a Being of infinite benevolence, should make such a world as this—full of sinners and sufferers—and that when the atonement had been made, he did not save all the race, and put an end to sin and woe forever;— * * * I have read to some extent what wise and good men have written. I have looked at their theories and explanations. I have endeavored to weigh their arguments; for my whole soul pants for light and relief on these questions. But I get neither; and in the distress and anguish of my own spirit, I confess that I see no light whatever. I see not one ray to disclose to me the reason why sin came into the world; why the earth is strewn with the dead and the dying; and why men must suffer to all eternity. I have never seen a particle of light thrown on these subjects that have given a moment's ease to my tortured mind, nor have I an explanation to offer, a thought to suggest, which would be a relief to you. I trust others, as they profess to do, understand this better than I, and that they have not the anguish of spirit which I have. But I confess, when I look upon a world of woe, filled with hosts to suffer forever—when I look upon friends, and upon a whole race, all involved in this sin and danger, and when I see the great mass of them wholly unconcerned, and when I feel that God alone can save them, and yet he does not do it—I am struck dumb—it is all dark, dark, dark to my soul, and I cannot disguise it."

J. Blain says: "A pious minister lately told me this fact in his experience. 'The first I ever heard of a God, was by my mother's telling me, when two years old, that there was a God, and if I was bad he would burn me forever in such a fire as I saw on the hearth. My reply was, If God does so he is a bad man.' He added, 'I grew up an infidel, till I heard the doctrine of immortality through Christ alone.'"

The sad fact is, that under this doctrine of "immortal-soul-ism," children grow up with a horror of their Maker, and think as little of him and the future as possible!

Prof. Finney says, "It agitates our hearts as storms do the mighty ocean; and if any are strangers to such difficulties, they are to be pitied for ignorance, or a want of sympathy, which seems to be among the first elements of our social nature." It also led Prof. Stuart to remark the soul-chilling sentence, "Perhaps God may, in mercy, extinguish our social susceptibilities in heaven!" Edwards, it seems, did not think so.

Such doctrine as this dishonors God. Satan, though he delights in sorrow, does not torment "creatures of his own creating and preserving"—Truly unto the froward, God shows himself froward, and to the pure he is pure.

But it must not be forgotten that the men who traffic in such merchandise as the above, are the D. D's., Presidents of Theology, "the great men of the earth, the merchants of Babylon, that great harlot, who has corrupted the whole earth with her fornication; and while we cannot help lamenting the miseries and agonies which this heresy has caused its own preachers and leaders, who, like Mr. Barnes, have written commentaries in its defense; how must the heart feel for thousands upon thousands of illiterate and simple creatures, who still look up to such men as their oracles, and seem to think of them: "These be the gods, O Israel, which led thee out of the land of Egypt." These are the blind guides who strain out a gnat and swallow a camel. And the mass of the people and professors of religion love to have it so, and breathe out nothing but contempt and wrath upon the messengers of the Lord, who would present the truth in its purity and loveliness. Shall not the land mourn for this? Behold the day is at hand that shall bring a "howling among the shepherds, and a wailing shall be heard among the principal of the flock, for the Lord will spoil their pasture, and the shepherds shall find no way of escape!"

SOME REMARKABLE FACTS.

It is a remarkable fact that at the time of the rise of the "two-horned beast," in the Revolutionary war with Great Britain, the sun and moon were supernaturally darkened, the first great sign for the last days.

The U. S. declared themselves free and independent July 4th, 1776. The sun and moon were darkened May 19th, 1780. Wm. Miller was born Feb. 15th, 1782. The treaty of peace took place 1783.

Wm. Miller commenced his public lectures in the autumn of 1831. And soon after this the second great sign took place in the heavens, "The falling of the stars," Nov. 13th, 1833. And the powers of the earth were shaken 1848.

The Lord has been preparing the way for scenes connected with his people at the going down of the political sun in the western horizon. The time cannot be long at the most, when he that is to come will come and will not tarry.

THE ADVERSARY OF SOULS.

WE cut from one of our secular exchanges the following:

THE DEVIL AN IMAGINARY BEING.—Rev. Dr. Bushnell, a distinguished orthodox preacher in Hartford, Ct., repudiates the old idea of the personality of the Devil. In Dr. Bushnell's book, entitled, "Nature and the Supernatural," he says:

"Satan, or the Devil, taken in the singular, is not the name of any particular person, it is a personation merely of temptation, or impersonal evil, the name is one taken up by imagination to designate or embody, in a conception the mind can most easily wield, the all, or total, of bad minds and powers."

How are we to know from Scripture whether God and angels are real persons or not? How are we to be assured that the Almighty is not simply the first great Cause, a blind Influence or Power instead of a person? How but, from the fact that the Bible always speaks of God and angels as persons, and imputes to them the acts of living agents? It is true that the adversary of souls is not brought forward so prominently as are other persons in Scripture narrative, for he was not the subject upon which the inspired writers employed their pens. But whenever he is introduced it is as a spirit, a being—speaking, acting, working.

In the Old Testament we find laws against witchcraft and sorcery, and the intercourse with familiar spirits; in the New, narratives of possessions of devils, which, on account of attendant circumstances, can by no possibility be regarded as diseases. In the Epistles are allusions to fallen angels who kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation and were cast down to hell. The Bible is chiefly a record of events here on earth. The history of events in heaven, from the creation of the first angel to the creation of the first man, has never been written. Had we such a record, doubtless there would be a full account of the manner and cause of the fall of celestial spirits. As it is, there are here and there allusions to these mighty events, introduced only when needful to throw light upon some doctrine or event in the scheme of man's redemption. But these allusions, whatever obscurity surrounds them, are clear in this particular; namely, that there is an adversary of souls who is a person. And as in the case of a company of men wandering in the wilderness, none are in so great danger of beasts of prey as they who believe there are no such seeking to devour them; so we may be sure none are in such hazard of that adversary of souls as they who deny his existence. But we curtail our remarks here for the purpose of introducing to our readers an extract from a sermon by Charles Kingsley, author of Alton Locke. The subject is the miracle of our Lord in casting out the legion of devils.—Chris. Mess.

There is a notion got abroad that it is only a figure of speech to talk of evil spirits, that all the Bible means by them are certain bad habits, or bad qualities or diseases. There are many who will say when they read this story, "This poor man was only a madman. It was the fashion of the old Jews when a man was mad to say that he was possessed by evil spirits. All they meant was that the man's own spirit was in an evil diseased state, or that his brain and mind were out of order."

When I hear such language—and it is very common—I cannot help thinking how pleased the Devil will be to hear people talk in that way. How can people help him better than by saying that there is no Devil? A thief would be very glad to hear you say, "There are no such things as thieves; it is an old superstition, so I may leave my house open at night without danger;" and I believe, my friends, from the very bottom of my heart, that this new-fangled disbelief in evil spirits is put into men's hearts by the evil spirits themselves. As it was once said, "The Devil had tried every plan to catch men's souls, and now, as the last and most cunning trick of all, he is shamming dead." These may seem homely words, but the homeliest words are very often the deepest. I advise you all to think seriously on them.

But it is impossible surely to read this story without seeing that the Bible considers evil spirits as distinct persons, just as much as each one of us is a person, and that the Lord spoke to them and treated them as persons. "What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?" And again, "If thou cast us out, suffer us to go into the herd of swine!" What can show more plainly that there were some persons in that poor man besides himself, his own spirit, his own person? and that he knew it, and Jesus knew it too? and that he spoke to these spirits, these persons, who possessed that man, and not to the man himself? No doubt there was a terrible confusion in the poor madman's mind about these evil spirits, who were tormenting him, making him miserable, foul and savage, in mind and body—a terrible confusion! We find when Jesus asked him his name, he answered, "Legion," that is an army, a multitude, "for we are many," he says. Again, one gospel tells us that he says, "What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God?" While in another gospel we are told that he said, "What have we to do with thee?" He seems not to have been able to distinguish between his own spirit and these spirits who possessed him. They put the furious and despairing thoughts into his heart; they spoke through his mouth; they made a slave and a puppet of him. But though he could not distinguish between his own soul and the devils who were in it, Christ could and Christ did.

The man says to him, or rather the devils make the man say to him, "If thou cast us out, suffer us to go into the herd of swine, and drive us not out into the deep." What did Christ answer him? Christ did not answer him as our so-called wise men in these days would: "My good man, this is all delusion, and a fancy of your own, about your having evil spirits in you—more persons than one in you—for you are wrong in saying we of yourself. You ought to say, 'I,' as every one else does; and as for spirits going out of you, or going into a herd of swine, or anything else, that is all a superstition and a fancy. There is nothing to come out of you, there is nothing in you except yourself. All the evil in you is your own, the disease of your own brain, and the violent passions of your own heart. Your brain must be cured by medicine, and your violent passions tamed down by care and kindness, and then you will get rid of this foolish notion that you have evil spirits in you, and calling yourself a multitude, as if you had other persons in you besides yourself."

Any one who spoke in this manner now-a-days, would be thought very reasonable and very kind. Why did not our Lord speak so to this man, for there was no outward difference between this man's conduct and that of many violent mad people who we see continually in our land? We read that this man possessed with devils would wear no clothes; that he had extraordinary strength; that he would not keep company with other men, but abode day and night in the tombs, exceedingly fierce, crying and cutting himself with stones, trying in blind rage, which he could not explain to himself, to hurt himself and all who came near him. And above all he had this notion that evil spirits had got possession of him. Now every one of these habits and fancies you may see in many raging maniacs at this day.

But did the Lord treat this man as we treat such maniacs in these days? He took the man at his word, and more; the man could not distinguish clearly between himself and the evil spirits, but our Lord did. When the devils besought him, saying, "If thou cast us out, suffer us to go into the herd of swine," our Lord answers, "Go;" and "when they were cast out they went into the herd of swine; and, behold, the whole herd of swine ran violently down a steep place into the sea, and perished in the waters."

It was as if our Lord had meant to say to the bystanders—ay, and to us, and to all people in all

FAITH OF JESUS.

IN another column will be found a reply to our remarks on this subject in the REVIEW of Feb. 2d. We are glad the writer appreciates the feelings of kindness with which those lines were penned, and which it is our purpose ever to maintain as well in the unpleasant arena of controversy, as under more favorable circumstances. We cheerfully accord to our Seventh-day Baptist friends space to correct whatever they regard as misrepresentation; and whatever portion of our remarks places them in a wrong light, we cheerfully withdraw, while on those points wherein we rightly judged that a difference does exist, and wherein they endeavor to maintain the correctness of their position, it will devolve upon us here to say a word in defense of our own. We are glad to see an avowal on their part of a belief in the personal coming of the Saviour in the clouds of heaven, the resurrection of the dead and a general judgment; but we should hear this avowal with greater pleasure did we not know that our friends who make it are still cherishing in their bosoms a belief which saps the vitality of these doctrines, destroys their practicability, and renders them but little better than effete and withered items of their creed: we refer of course to the doctrine of the consciousness of the dead.

We could wish that the writer had been a little more explicit on some points: thus, he does not tell us in regard the coming of the Lord, whether they believe it to be near at hand, or whether with the great majority of professors of religion, they are expecting a thousand years wherein peace and safety shall smile upon the converted world prior to that event. The coming of the Lord under the first aspect, and the same coming under the second, could hardly be called the same doctrine, though there should be no difference of opinion in regard to the nature and manner of the event.

The Seventh-day Baptists we are told, have not fixed upon any time for the Lord to come. In that respect there is no difference between us and them: we have no time fixed upon for the Lord to come. And we wish it distinctly understood, that we have no connection with those who have been of late years continually setting times for that event. We have set no time since 1844; and the nature of the mistake we then made is now clearly understood. Of this there is no occasion for an explanation here. But the Seventh-day Baptists do not concur with us in our eccentric views of the signs in the sun, moon and stars. "They do not agree in remembering when the literal sun has been darkened," &c. Happily this event is not left to the memory of any one. The testimony of history abundantly assures us that on the 19th of May, 1780, the sun was supernaturally darkened, and the moon the following night: an event which aroused an expectation in many minds that the day of Judgment was at hand. But the question may be asked, Have there not been many such phenomena, and how then can any importance be attached to this? We answer, There may have been; but it matters not if there have; the Saviour locates this beyond the possibility of mistake. See Mark xiii, 24. But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light. Those days refer to the time of the papal persecution, commencing in 538 and ending in 1798. Now mark the accuracy of the Saviour's prediction; in those days, after the tribulation. The persecuting power of the papacy was restrained by the reformation before the end of the days. And between that time and 1798, the sun was darkened, as the Saviour foretold. Will any one deny that this was one of the signs which he said should take place as the forerunner of his advent? "And the stars shall fall from heaven." The memory of thousands will agree upon the 13th of November 1833, as the time when this phenomenon occurred. Not that the literal stars fell, or that the prophecy contemplated any such event; for it would be impossible for the stars, being larger bodies than our earth, to fall to the earth; but there was a shower of meteors which had every appears ance of falling stars, over no inconsiderable portion of the earth's surface; and eye-witnesses were compelled to go back for a description of the event to the language in which it was foretold almost eighteen hundred years before. See Rev. vi, 13.

But the greatest portion of our friend's effort seems to be against our declaration that the only hope Christ ever held out to his disciples of being with him was through the medium of his personal return. To disprove this, the case of the rich man and Lazarus, the thief on the cross, Rev. xiv, 13, and Phil. i, 23, are brought forward. In regard to the rich man and Lazarus, that is evidently a parable; and being such it cannot be relied on to prove a doctrine. On the use of metaphorical language in proof of any doctrine, Dr. Clarke thus speaks: "Let it be remembered that by the consent of all except the basely interested, no metaphor is ever to be produced in proof of a doctrine. In the things that concern our eternal salvation, we need the most pointed and express evidence on which to establish the faith of our souls." We may therefore dismiss this parable from the controversy, since not being literal, whatever doctrine it may be designed to illustrate, must be sustained by other and positive scriptures. It was doubtless designed as a rebuke upon the Jews for their hardness of heart and unbelief: the grand conclusion arrived at being, "If they will not hear Moses and the prophets, they would not be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

The thief on the cross is referred to with the remark, "This is certainly a promise of being with Christ not through the medium of his personal coming." We think not. The promise was that he should be with him that very day, or else it brings to view no definite and appointed time when this should take place. But the Saviour could not mean that the thief should be with him that very day, for three days afterwards he said that he had not yet ascended to his Father, or in other words, had not yet been to Paradise. See John xx, 17; 2 Cor. xii, 2, 4; Rev. ii, 7; xxii, 1, 2. Since therefore the promise has reference to the future, it does not by any means follow that the only hope of the thief of being with Christ was not through the medium of his personal return; especially when the hope of a future life is elsewhere so often and so expressly made to hang upon that event.

As to Rev. xiv, 13, we cannot admit that the expression, "from henceforth," has reference to the time of the person's death; for where would be the propriety of making the declaration at that particular time, when all who had died in the Lord at any previous time, were equally blest? There would be none. And again, the phrase, from henceforth, does not modify the word, blessed, but the word die. It is not, blessed are they from henceforth, but blessed are they who die from henceforth: and to make from henceforth signify the time of their death, and to say that blessed are they who from the time of their death die in the Lord, is making sad nonsense of the sacred text. Let it be noticed that in this case a particular time is reached in a chain of prophecy, and from henceforth, that is from the time these special events take place, a blessing is pronounced upon those who die in the Lord. But again, the term blessed does not necessarily imply conscious happiness; for it is applied to inanimate objects. Gen. ii, 3; Matt. xiii, 16; Titus ii, 13.

Phil. i, 23, is referred to show that at death a person departs to be with Christ. There seems to be a contradiction here in our friend's own theory; for a few lines further on he says, "From the above it may be seen that the Seventh-day Baptists do not sympathize with such as hold . . . that man at death goes to his final reward." But if he goes to be with Christ, who is at the right hand of the majesty on high, where the Psalmist says there is fullness of joy, and pleasures forevermore, what more could be asked? what greater reward could be bestowed? But Paul does not necessarily locate the being with Christ at the time of death. He had a desire to depart, and, as the next event upon which his mind would naturally rest, to be with Christ. When we go to be with Christ he many times tells us in other places. It is when we experience the redemption of our bodies [Rom. viii, 23]; it is when this corruptible puts on incorruption, and this mortal puts on immortality, at the last trump [1 Cor. xv, 51-54]; it is when we are clothed upon with our house from heaven, the immortal spiritual body, or when mortality is swallowed up of life. 2 Cor. v, 1-4. Between the departing and being with Christ, in Phil. i, 23, we must necessarily suppose a space of time to make it harmonize with Paul's other writings.

But most of all we are not told in the article under review how the doctrine of the consciousness of the dead can be made compatible with the doctrine of a future judgment and the resurrection of the body. The point we made on this in our previous article, we are sorry to see passed by in silence. It does not help the matter at all to say that they do not enter upon their final reward at death; for if they have a foretaste of their final reward as is claimed in remarks on the rich man and Lazarus, decision must have been passed on their characters just as much as though they were receiving their real happiness or punishment. And then we ask again, What need is there of a judgment to come? and what necessity is there of a resurrection of the body? and on what ground can these doctrines be defended? And again we say, as in our former remarks, let this point be carefully considered: there is an incongruity here, which we are sure it will cause our brethren of the opposite belief, infinite trouble to harmonize with their present views.

But Paul will not admit for a moment into his religious belief the idea that there is consciousness in death or any future life, without the resurrection. On this event he makes everything depend; and he does it in the following strong and emphatic language: "If the dead rise not, then they that are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Thus the only avenue to a future life which Paul points out to us, is through the resurrection: there is no conscious existence between death and that event. If the dead are not raised, then they that are fallen asleep in Christ are perished.

A few texts to show that the coming of the Lord is the great hope held out to the people of God, and we close. John xiv, 1, was referred to in our first article: we call attention to it again. I go away to prepare a place for you, says Christ, and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also. Would any disciple gather from this language, that he would be with his Lord before his return to receive them to himself? No one. The declaration is express, that the very object of his coming is that that they may be with him.

Again, in Luke xiv, 12-14, Christ instructed the Pharisee, with whom he reclined at meat, when he made a feast, to call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, for they could not recompense him; but, he told him, he should be recompensed, not at death, but at the resurrection of the just. In 1 Thess. iv, 16, 17, we are told that the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. So, not by consciousness in death, but by the coming of the Lord, and by our being caught up to meet him in the air. Again, in 2 Thess. i, 6, 7, we are told that the Lord shall recompense rest to his people, not in death, not before his return, but "when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels." Again, the aged apostle Paul writes to his son Timothy concerning receiving his crown of righteousness; and surely if any one would be entitled to receive his crown when he laid down his armor on the field of battle it would be the illustrious apostle to the Gentiles. But hear what he says, "For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight. I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." Yes, he was about to lay down his life for Jesus; and does he say that he shall then receive his crown of life? No; but he adds, "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." We understand then that notwithstanding he should lie down in death, he was not prepared yet to receive the crown: it must still be "laid up" for him. How long laid up? Let him inform us: "Which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give me at that day, and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." Thus all is made to hang upon the appearing of Jesus, and the bestowal of the reward is deferred till that time shall come.

Peter bears testimony to the same effect. When he would encourage the shepherds to take proper charge of the church of God, he points them forward to their reward in these words: "And when the chief Shepherd shall appear [not before] ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." 1 Pet. iv, 4. Paul again tells us that this is the time when we are to be with the Lord. Col. iii, 4. When he who is our Life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.

We forbear quoting further, having brought forward sufficient, as we think, to show conclusively that the hope of the church in being gathered together unto their Lord, hinges wholly upon his return and the resurrection of the dead.

IDOLATRY.

THERE is a great difference between tyranny and anarchy. Some who have escaped from the trammels of unjust restraint, are unwilling to suffer any restraint whatever. It has been a cause of regret to many that those who call the churches Babylon should so readily run into confusion. This is sometimes manifested in our meetings. Leaving churches where there is apparently nothing but formality, and attending meetings mostly in private houses, all ideas of order seem to be discarded, and the children are allowed to run about the house and make any amount of noise with impunity. And this passes for religious liberty!

But what we wish to call particular attention to at this time is the habit of some of not only letting their children run around and play, but they seem to enjoy the pastime about as well as the children. Professing to assemble for worship, their minds seem to be all absorbed in the sports of the juveniles. I have seen some who do not often enjoy the privilege of preaching, with their minds all taken up with playing across the house. Is this becoming? Is it Christian?

To all such we would say: Of all false worship, perhaps child worship is as agreeable as any; but as it is not likely that you will be able to get a great many to worship your children with you, (there being so many who enjoy privileges equal to your own), it would perhaps be advisable to relinquish all efforts for social worship of that nature, and confine it to your own fire-side.

REVEREND BLASPHEMERS.

THE Apostle Paul in 2 Tim. iii, 1-5, has given us a bird's eye view of the state of the popular churches in the "last days." His own words are: "For men* shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof; from such turn away." See also Amos vi, 3-7.

Mark a few of the specifications in this startling portrait of apostate Christianity. Paul says they will be "blasphemers," "false accusers," "fierce," &c. The word rendered false accusers here is diaboloi, and is the same expression which is found in Rev. xx, 2: "And he laid hold on that old Serpent, which is the Devil (Gr., diabolos), and Satan, and bound him a thousand years." "Diabolos" is translated Devil in the New Testament thirty-five times. This may seem like pretty strong language to apply to a religious people, but it must not be taken in too rigid a sense—it does not mean that such are really Devils, but only like the Devil or devilish. It is of the same import as a declaration in the Apocalypse: "Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of Devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and the cage of every unclean and hateful bird."

That professors now-a-days have got to be fierce is sufficiently proved from the desperate and frenzied manner in which they often attack the truth. It is no uncommon thing for some to boil with rage when we insist on the claims of the fourth commandment.

* Wakefield translates, "For Christians," &c. That is, professors.

This only goes to prove such have arrived at the state which Paul long since predicted. That they are becoming blasphemers, and that too in the most terrible sense of the word, we think is very easily proved. We will here give a few blasphemous expressions which have fallen from the lips of popular ministers, for it is clerical blasphemy of which we speak.

About two years since while Bro. Loughborough was lecturing in the village of Allegan, this State, his discourses became the topic of much conversation in the place and thereabout. Said a man who was somewhat interested, to a minister, "We are having some lectures over in the village on the prophecies, have you heard them?" "Poh!" said the minister, "those old prophecies are all fulfilled long ago. You and I have nothing more to do with them." "Well," said our friend, "he is also lecturing on the law of God, and says that the seventh day is the Sabbath, and that we ought to keep it." "Does he," retorted the minister, "well he lies like h—ll." "But," said our interested friend, "he brings Bible which seems to prove it, and I do n't know but he is correct." "Well," said the minister, "he lies like h—ll if he says so," and this was about all the satisfaction he could get from him. This man was a Methodist preacher.

With this agrees what Eld. B., another minister in Vermont said in an inflammatory speech against the law of God, the ten commandments. He called it "a rickety, miserable old thunder and lightning law, which was always a curse to man," and which said he "is dead and buried and don't deserve a grave stone." I once knew an infidel who while riding along the road at the height of a thunder storm dared "the Almighty to strike his horses dead!" and so shocked was his wicked companion that he afterwards declared "the hair stood up on his head;" but which was the worst the infidel or this minister?

Akin to these are a few remarks of another minister, a part of which I heard with my own ears. Said he in a prayer at the close of an effort against the truth, "O Lord God of eternity, have mercy on those who have gone away from their father's house to follow old women's whims!" and a hearty "amen" from one of his brethren showed with what gusto this irreverent thing was appreciated. The same individual while "resisting the truth" at the house of a brother declared, that as for our faith there was "neither head nor tail to it," and in speaking of the chart said that we had "heads and horns, skunks and woodchucks so mixed up that we ourselves did n't know anything about what we did believe." If this is not blasphemy, and a perfect fulfillment of Paul's words, in the name of enlightened reason what would be? The brother to whom this furious invective was made calmly reproved him for "reviling" the "things of the Spirit of God," although he was his kinsman according to the flesh.

When I embraced the truth eight years ago I wrote to a Presbyterian minister in Ohio, a former friend of mine, asking his advice about what I had heard. And what was the answer? Why, he said he was tempted "to give a laugh a yard and a half long," and that he thought "one more letter like that would give the mail carrier the cholera." And in speaking of the advent and Sabbath question he said, "Bah!—dish-water! who did ever hear of such a silly thing—so it has come to this that a man must believe that the world is going to come to an end, and that the seventh day is the Sabbath or he'll be damned and sent to hell in less than no time." But he did alter his tone enough before he got through to tell me that the "world was round," and the "seventh part of time" was all the Sabbath required, and that if I didn't "have sense enough to to keep clear of such heresy" I had better stay away from the meetings. But the sequel shows that I lacked the "sense," and I am now not sorry for it, for I think more than ever that "that which is highly approved among men, is abomination in the sight of God."

I will not multiply more testimony concerning those who blaspheme against God and fight his people. We are not better than our Master. If they called him Beelzebub, much more those of his household. The Scriptures declare that we "shall be taken up in the lips of the talkers," become "the song of the drunkards," "a derision to our neighbors," and be "accounted as the filth and offscouring of all things." In this we may truly rejoice when all manner of evil is spoken against us lying for Christ's sake. This with the grace of God we can bear, but when men—professed ministers of Jesus Christ—utter such bold blasphemies against the truth, and so against the God of truth, who that has got any love for God and zeal for his truth will hold silence? If men in their hot-headed zeal dare utter such maledictions against high heaven they must expect to hear of it. Truly, as the sacred writer says, "A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land; the prophets prophesy falsely, the priests bear rule by their means, and my people love to have it so, and what will ye do in the end thereof?"

Brethren, let us "be wise as serpents, and harmless as doves." Paul says, "Do all things with good will, without murmurings and disputing; that ye may be blameless and uncorrupt, spotless children of God, amidst a crooked and twisted race: among whom shine ye forth as luminaries in the world."†

THE FRENCH MISSION.

BRO. SMITH: I am happy to inform you that our French mission is in a prospering condition; especially among the French Baptists in this vicinity.

About three years ago, soon after I embraced the third angel's message, Eld. Letourneau commenced to preach to the French in this place, and he opposed us greatly, inasmuch that but a few individuals manifested any anxiety to search the truth. Fourteen honest souls however, at that time, decided to turn away their feet from the Sabbath, and embraced the third angel's message. And notwithstanding the indifference the French people manifested in regard to the truth, we watched every opportunity to converse with them, hoping that a way might be opened for us to give them a series of lectures.

About two weeks ago Bro. Czechowski and myself visited a few French families in this place, and on the 21st ult. we held a meeting in Bakersfield. The next day, being the first-day, we met with the French Baptists at Montgomery, in their new meeting-house, twelve miles east of Enosburgh, where we gave nine lectures, and went from house to house presenting the word of truth during six days.

At the commencement of our meetings a man from B. informed Eld. L. of our doings, and there was no small stir among the French Baptists in Enosburgh about it. The elder promised to attend our meeting on the evening of the second day, and the French people assembled together to that extent that they could not all be seated in the meeting-house. But to their disappointment the elder was not present. At the close of the meeting two individuals influenced the congregation against us, and they decided in one accord to not let us occupy their house any longer; but we presented them a few words in a meek and quiet spirit, and before twenty minutes had elapsed they repented and a full vote was taken in favor of our lectures being continued. The next day a man went to Enosburgh to invite Eld. L. to attend our next meeting which was held in the evening of the same day. He promised to do so; but disappointed them a second time. We preached to a large and attentive congregation, and sold all our French tracts, which was an evidence in our minds that the truth which they had heard had already found a place in their hearts. Our hearts were cheered and we were encouraged to work with new zeal in this glorious cause. The day following, a man who made no pretension to religion went after the elder with his team, who could not refuse to accompany him under such circumstances. The elder heard us preach with freedom on the preparation for Christ's coming; and after we closed our lecture we invited the congregation to speak for themselves, but they looked towards their pastor, expecting to hear him speak, but he uttered not a word. At the close of the meeting he expressed a great deal of astonishment because we had given them the privilege to speak when, according to his estimation the privilege was theirs and not ours. We answered him to the satisfaction of the congregation, in a few words.

"Sanctify them through thy TRUTH; thy word is truth."

THE SEVEN CHURCHES.

"I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet, saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last; and, What thou seest write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia: unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea." Rev. i, 10, 11.

The words, "which are in Asia," are found in a table of spurious readings, in the New Testament translated by Macknight, Doddridge and George Campbell, published by A. Campbell. The text there reads:—

"What you see write in a book, and send it to the seven congregations, to Ephesus, and to Smyrna, and to Pergamos, and to Thyatira, and to Sardis, and to Philadelphia, and to Laodicea."

Sawyer translates, "What you see write in a book, and send to the seven churches, to Ephesus," &c.

Whiting translates, "What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven congregations, to Ephesus," &c.

Wesley translates, "What thou seest write in a book, and send to the seven churches, to Ephesus," &c.

Adam Clarke says, "In Asia. This is wanting in the principal MSS. and versions. Griesbach has left it out of the text."

The American Bible Union recommends that "the words which are in Asia be omitted."

John is commanded to write in a book what is shown to him, which embraces the entire book of Revelation.

In chap. xxii, 18, it is called "the words of the prophecy of this book."

The book of Revelation is dedicated to the seven churches, which, as we shall endeavor to show, represent seven conditions of the Christian church, in seven distinct periods, covering the ground of the entire Christian age.

This book is a prophecy. "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein." Chap. i, 3. This blessing can be enjoyed only by those who live in the time of the fulfillment of certain portions of the prophetic book down to the end, where it may be enjoyed in its fullness. Hence the wisdom in dedicating the book to the Christian church during her seven periods. Prophecy relates to the future. It is history in advance. History is the record of events past and present. Therefore Rev. ii and iii is not a historical description of churches existing eighteen hundred years since. Those chapters form one of the great chains of the prophetic book.

The great design of the book of Revelation is to foretell future events, with which the church should be connected, in the Christian age. "The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass." Chap. i, 1. In a few instances, past and present events are mentioned in this book, as in the case of the woman with the crown of twelve stars, and the man-child which was caught up to God and his throne [Rev. xii, 1-5], but in all such cases the past and the present are alluded to only to introduce future events, which in every case are the burden of the prophecy.

We will now take up the churches in their order as given in the Revelation. We give the definitions of the names of the churches as significant of the character of the several periods of the Christian church. Let them have the weight they deserve.

FIRST CHURCH.

"Unto the angel of the church of Ephesus write: These things saith he that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, who walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks: I know thy works, and thy labor, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil; and thou hast tried them which say they are apostles and are not, and has found them liars: and hast borne, and hast patience, and for my name's sake hast labored, and hast not fainted. Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love. Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent. But this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate. He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God." Rev. ii, 1-7.

Ephesus signifies, "desirable, chief." This was true of the first age of the church, in the apostles' days. They had received the doctrine of Christ pure from the mouth of the great Teacher, and the Holy Spirit was poured out and rested upon them. The gifts of the Spirit were in the church. It was noted for "works," "labor," and patience, and could "not bear them which were evil." God could dwell with such a church, and manifest his power in their midst. Yet there were some things against this church in consequence of which they were called upon to repent.

SECOND CHURCH.

"And unto the angel of the church in Smyrna write: These things saith the first and the last, which was dead, and is alive: I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty, but thou art rich; and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan. Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: behold the Devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried, and ye shall have tribulation ten days: be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." Verses 8-11.

Smyrna signifies "myrrh," denoting that the church in this age would be a sweet-smelling savor to God, while passing through the fiery ordeal of persecution; which has always served to keep out pride, popularity, and self-dependence—the bane of true faith, piety and devotion. This state reached down to Constantine, covering much of the period called the ten persecutions. See Buck's Theological Dictionary pp. 332, 333. For want of room we can give here only his statement of the last.

"The tenth began in the nineteenth year of Diocletian, 303. In this dreadful persecution, which lasted ten years, houses filled with Christians were set on fire, and whole droves were tied together with ropes and thrown into the sea. It is related that 17,000 were slain in one month's time: and that during the continuance of this persecution, in the province of Egypt alone, no less than 144,000 Christians died by the violence of their persecutors; besides 700,000 that died through the fatigues of banishment, or the public works to which they were condemned."

The tribulation of "ten days," mentioned in the testimony to the Smyrna church, may well apply to the last of the ten persecutions, which continued ten years; yet some apply it to all ten. The continued scenes of martyrdom and dreadful cruelty continually before this church were sufficient to keep hypocrites and worldlings out of the church; and the constant expectation that some dreadful death would end their probation, led them to purity of life. There is no fault found with this church. "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life," was the only hope before this church.

THIRD CHURCH.

"And to the angel of the church in Pergamos write: These things saith he which hath the sharp sword with two edges: I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is; and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith, even in those days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth. But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumblingblock before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication. So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which thing I hate. Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth. He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth, saving he that receiveth it." Verses 12-17.

Pergamos signifies, "very earthy, elevated." This period reached from Constantine, about 313, down to the rise of antichrist, about 538. During this period the church became very earthly, having her worldly policy, and, like the church of this day, attending to the ceremonies and forms of religion, and neglecting inward piety, the graces of the Spirit, and the life and power of the religion of Jesus. Here was the falling away mentioned by Paul. 2 Thess. ii, 3. Fault is found with this church, and it is here called upon to repent. But this was the age that prepared the church to receive to her bosom the monster, "man of sin," "son of perdition."

FOURTH CHURCH.

"And unto the angel of the church in Thyatira write: These things saith the Son of God, who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire, and his feet like unto fine brass: I know thy works, and charity, and service, and faith, and thy patience, and thy works; and the last to be more than the first. Notwithstanding I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols. And I gave her space to repent of her fornication, and she repented not. Behold, I will cast her into a bed, and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, except they repent of their deeds. And I will kill her children with death; and all the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts; and I will give unto every one of you according to your works. But unto you I say, and unto the rest in Thyatira (as many as have not this doctrine, and which have not known the depths of Satan, as they speak), I will put upon you none other burden; but that which ye have already, hold fast till I come. And he that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations. And he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers; even as I received of my Father. And I will give him the morning star. He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Verses 18-28.

Thyatira signifies, "sweet savor of labor, or sacrifice and contrition;" and is a description of the church during the 1260 years of Papal supremacy. This age of dreadful cruelty, and martyrdom of the true church, improved her real condition. "I know thy works, and charity, and patience, and thy works; and the last to be more than the first." How necessary to the purity and prosperity of the church, has been persecution and affliction! and how corrupting and destructive to holiness has been worldly prosperity.

Verse 20 is strong testimony that we have correctly applied these churches. Jezebel is a figurative name, alluding to Ahab's wife, who slew the prophets of the Lord, led her husband into idolatry, and fed the prophets of Baal at her own table. A more striking figure could not have been used to denote the Papal abominations. See 1 Kings xviii, xix, xxi. It is very evident from history, as well as from this verse, that the church of Christ did suffer some of the Papal monks to preach and teach among them. In verse 25 is the charge, "Hold fast till I come." Here is evidence that some who lived near the close of this age of the church would live until the Lord should come. The signs in the sun and moon were fulfilled in 1780, eighteen years before the close of this period; and in reference to these signs the Saviour said, "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth near." Luke xxi, 28. The time had come for the church to look up and expect her coming Lord in the clouds of heaven; hence it is said to some in Thyatira, "Hold fast till I come;" to the Sardis church, "If therefore thou shalt not watch I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee;" and to the church in Philadelphia, "Behold I come quickly." The coming of the Lord is not named in the testimony to the churches before this; but, "be thou faithful unto death," is the charge to them. They could not scripturally look for Christ's second coming in their day. Says Paul, "Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed." Here the church is carried down past the apostasy, and the revelation of the Papacy—down to the period of the special signs of the second advent before she can scripturally expect Christ's second coming. These facts are overwhelming evidence that the seven churches denote seven periods of the entire Christian church from the first advent down to the second advent of Christ.

FIFTH CHURCH.

"And unto the angel of the church in Sardis write: These things saith he that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven stars: I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead. Be watchful, and strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die; for I have not found thy works perfect before God. Remember therefore how thou hast received and heard, and hold fast and repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee. Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments, and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy. He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment, and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Chap. iii, 1-6.

Sardis signifies, "song of joy, or that which remains." If we are correct in the application of the first four churches, then Sardis represents the nominal churches for the last half century, or more. This church has a name that it lives, but is dead. Look at the exalted position, and name which the nominal churches have had among the nations of the earth. Look at her high-sounding titles, and the applause she receives from what is called the world. The nominal churches have the name of the churches of Jesus Christ, and have the credit of doing much for the world. But they are dead—dead to the pure principles of the gospel, and to good works, as laid down by Christ and the apostles.

But there are "a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments," &c. To this church the message of the coming of the Lord is given, and the cry, Come out of her my people. A few hear, believe and obey. These came out of all the several denominations, and united upon the glorious theme of Jesus' coming, leaving their denominational tenets behind, and formed the

SIXTH CHURCH.

"And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write: These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth: I know thy works: behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it; for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name. Behold, I will make them of the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie: behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee. Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth. Behold, I come quickly; hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown. Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out; and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God; and I will write upon him my new name. He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Verses 7-13.

and to the world, and pointed to the coming of the Son of man as the consummation of the true believer's hope. Selfishness and covetousness were laid aside, and a spirit of consecration and sacrifice was cherished. The Spirit of God was in every true believing soul, and his praise on every tongue. Those who were not in that movement know nothing of the deep searching of heart, consecration of all to God, peace, joy in the Holy Ghost, and pure, fervent love for each other, which true believers then felt. Those who were in that movement are aware that language would fail to describe that state of "brotherly love."

It will be necessary, for want of room, to pass by many things of interest in the testimony to this church as we have in the testimonies to the former churches; but we call especial attention to verse 7, which establishes the chronology of the church of brotherly love. "These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth." That Christ is here described, no one will deny. He is the rightful heir to David's throne, hence has the key of David, which may represent power. The throne of David, or Christ, on which he is to reign, is in the capital of his kingdom, the New Jerusalem now above. The opening and shutting can refer only to the change of ministration from the holy to the most holy of the heavenly sanctuary, at the end of the 2300 days, in 1844. It was then that the ministration in the holy place closed, and the ministration in the most holy for the forgiveness of sins, and to cleanse the sanctuary, was opened by him that hath the key of David. "Behold, I set before thee an open door." "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. xi, 19. We can apply texts of this class to no other events than Christ's entering the most holy, in 1844, and opening his ministration there, where the ark of ten commandments is, hence, since that time the Sabbath, with the whole law of God, has been present truth in a special sense.

Compare with the above texts, Dan. vii, 13, 14; Ps. ii, 8, 9; Rev. xi, 15; Matt. xxv, 10. That Christ receives the kingdom, takes the throne of David, before his second advent, is plainly taught. This union is represented by the marriage [Matt. xxv, 10], and is called "the marriage of the Lamb." Rev. xix, 7. Since 1844, has been the patient, waiting, watching time. "Here is the patience of the saints, here are they that keep the commandments of God." Rev. xiv, 12. "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord when he will return from the wedding," &c. Luke xii, 35, 36.

SEVENTH CHURCH.

"And unto the angel of the church of the Laodiceans write: These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true Witness, the beginning of the creation of God: I know thy works that thou art neither cold nor hot. I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth. Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing: and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see. As many as I love I rebuke and chasten; be zealous, therefore, and repent. Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me. To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Verses 14-22.

Laodicea signifies, "the judging of the people," or, according to Cruden, "a just people," and fitly represents the present state of the church, in the great day of atonement, or judgment of the "house of God," while the just and holy law of God is taken as a rule of life.

It has been supposed that the Philadelphia church

reached to the end. This we must regard as a mistake, as the seven churches represent seven distinct periods of the true church, and the Philadelphia is the sixth, and not the last state. The true church cannot be in two conditions at the same time, hence we are shut up to the faith that the Laodicean church represents the church of God at the present time.

The conditional promises to the Philadelphia church are yet to be fulfilled to that portion of that church who comply with the conditions, pass down through the Laodicean state and overcome.

But, dear brethren, how humbling to us as a people is the sad description of this church. And is not this dreadful description a most perfect picture of our present condition? It is; and it will be of no use to try to evade the force of this searching testimony to the Laodicean church. The Lord help us to receive it, and to profit by it. What language could better describe our condition as a people, than this addressed to the Laodiceans? "Neither hot nor cold," but "lukewarm." It will not do, brethren, to apply this to the nominal churches, they are to all intents and purposes "cold." And the nominal Adventists are even lower than the churches, who justly look down upon them with horror for the infidel views held by many of them, of no Sabbath, no family prayer, no Devil, no operation of the Holy Ghost, no pre-existence of the Son of God, and no resurrection of the unjust.

The word "hot," represents the fervency, zeal and good works which are in accordance with the Scriptures. This is not our condition; yet the feeble efforts put forth by us as a people are such that we cannot be said to be "cold." We are "lukewarm." "So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth." These are words of dreadful import. A thorough change is the only hope of the remnant. Here follows the reason why we are so offensive to the Lord: "Because thou sayest, I am rich and increased with goods and have need of nothing." We may not have boasted of our gold, silver, or of this world's goods; but have we not had, more or less, an exulting and an exalted spirit, in view of our position on plain Bible truth? Our positions are fully sustained by an overwhelming amount of direct scriptural testimony; and certainly a theory of divine truth is indispensable; but we as a people, have evidently rested down upon a theory of truth, and have neglected to seek Bible humility, Bible patience, Bible self-denial, and Bible watchfulness, and sacrifice, Bible holiness, and the power and gifts of the Holy Ghost, which the church may enjoy, according to the plain testimony of the Bible. Hence it is said, "And knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." What a condition!

And it is to be feared that many a poor Laodicean is so fast in this delusive snare, as to never fully feel the force of the counsel of the Saviour, to buy of him "gold tried in the fire," "white raiment," and "eyesalve." These we cannot regard as representing the present truth, but rather the graces of the Spirit, and attainments in the Christian course, which the present truth should lead us most earnestly to seek for. "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten; be zealous therefore and repent." God's honest people will feel greatly rebuked and chastened by this description of their condition and they will repent heartily, zealously; but from the words, "as many," &c., we may fear for some whose self-righteousness, and self-dependence, have carried them beyond the reach of the reproving Spirit, and the counsel of the true Witness. Dear brethren, read and weep over the touching language from His lips which follows. It is to you.

"Behold I stand at the door and knock; If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." How careless many of you have been of the reproofs and warning which the dear Saviour has given for your benefit. He has been slighted and shut out by you till his locks are wet with the dew of night. O, open your hearts to him. Let your hard hearts break before him. O, let him in. A deep work of consecrating yourselves and all you have to him, will be necessary to prepare the way for him to come in and sup with you and you with him. We dwell with pleasure upon this affectionate, this touching figure. What an illustration of communion with Christ! Who would not joyfully spread the table and open the door for the dear Saviour to partake with them the last meal of the day, were he now a pilgrim on earth as at the first advent? This we cannot do; but we can do those things required of us and prepare the way of the Lord in our own hearts. Covetousness, pride, selfishness, and love of the world must be put out of the heart before the Saviour will come in. O, be not deceived. Take the declarations of Christ and the Apostles, which point out your duty as Christians, especially those which apply to you in the last stage of the church, while waiting for the coming of the Son of man, and let that word, like a two-edged sword, pierce your heart. O, ye Laodiceans, our mouth is open unto you. Be not deceived as to your real condition. Christ will spue you out of his mouth unless you are zealous and repent. Are you honoring the Lord with your substance, or are you covetous and worldly? Are you laying up treasure on earth, or in heaven? Is your love for the cause and the salvation of your fellow men increasing? or is it waning away? Are you more watchful of your words, and the Spirit you manifest? or are you growing careless and losing your power to watch? Are you dying daily, so that pride is put out of your heart? or does it find a rich soil, and flourish there? If the latter be your case in all these questions, no marvel that the dear Saviour is shut out and now knocks for admission.

Dear brethren, we must overcome the world, the flesh, and the Devil, or we shall have no part in the kingdom of God. Read the gracious promise to those of the Laodiceans who overcome. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Those only who suffer with Christ will reign with him. We have much to overcome. May God help us to set about the work with zeal. Our guide in this work must be the plain word of God as it reads. That exposes our sins, and declares what we must be. If we are zealous and repent, and overcome, according to that word, we shall reign with Christ. If not, Christ will spue us out of his mouth, cast us off forever.

Dear brethren, lay hold of this work at once, and in faith claim the gracious promises to the repenting Laodiceans. J. W.

BREVITIES.

EVIDENCE. We cannot condemn a brother on the evidence of common fame; but he who seeks to bridle his iniquities, and cloak his crimes under this principle, throws himself upon the vengeance of Him whose eye and ear are never closed, and whose retributions are terrible.

WHOSE ARTICLE IS THIS? Suppose a person should rise in social meeting, and exhort in disguise with a concealed name, and leave us so; would it indicate modesty? I know it is customary for some to write under an assumed name; but this is the relic of a dark age. I assure you brother, it would be pleasing to us away here in the back settlements, to know the names of those who write. It is our only way of getting acquainted with you. Suppose all who write for the Review should assume a star, or a Latin, or Greek, or Hindoo name, what a farcical masquerade we should have! No need of the commandment-keepers being so excessively modest. We are not ashamed of our cause, nor afraid of our principles.

TEMPTATIONS must be resisted instantly, and overcome promptly. Christ did not wait a moment when he had occasion to rebuke Satan; in every case he reproved at the moment of the offense. Our hearts may be compared to a fort, besieged by the enemy, who if once admitted, will not relinquish his ground without a terrible struggle, if at all. Promptness, decision, courage—all are necessary.

"MAKING BELIEVE." Christ compared the Jews to children in their plays, imitating the most solemn employments of their superiors (as children often play this and that, perhaps having a meeting or school), so now, some who would not call themselves children, with grave recklessness, receive from their priests the consecrated wafer, while the aforesaid priests guzzle the wine. This is "making believe" take the Lord's supper. Others sprinkle a few drops of water upon an infant—this is "making believe" baptize; and many more observe Sunday, visiting, going to meeting, feasting &c.; this is "making believe" keep the Sabbath, and a certain number of these practices combined with a decent exterior (often hollow and painted, which makes it more decent in common parlance), make what is by a "make believe" people considered a tolerable "make believe" Christian.

SHALL BE ADDED. Christ does not say seek first the world and its treasures, and heaven shall be added (as Wordly-Wiseman preaches), but seek first the kingdom of heaven. Let this be first, be paramount to everything else, the one leading consideration, swallowing up every other, the governing, regulating principle, which like the heaven diffuses itself throughout the whole man, and stamps the character of every act; to such a man God will send the raven with food rather than he should want.

Wordly-Wiseman hardly assents to the above. Hear him. "I would recommend to every young man on setting out in life, to get religion, and lead a moral life. It is the surest means of establishing a character in the world. I never lost anything by it. It has been a gain to me. I have got a good property by this course, and now I can help the poor by this means. I hardly ever lose by helping the poor. If they cannot pay now, I charge a little more to make it up. Nothing hurts a poor man like giving him gifts. Thus you see religion can be made to pay as we go. Thus I find godliness with contentment to be gain. And as to any day being holy, I believe all days are holy. It is the heart God looks at," &c., &c. Thus reasons Wordly-Wiseman; and he considers his knowledge and experience sufficient to qualify him to teach. What is lamentable is, that Wordly-Wiseman is a living specimen of a host of like character.

WATCHING. Some think the command to watch, is for them to take a general oversight of their teachers; and so diligent are they in this, they neglect their own hearts, until some rank weeds flourish, to the danger of themselves and others. Such remind one of the astronomer who watched the course of heavenly bodies with such solicitude, that finally he got to fancy himself a sort of guide to these celestial systems, and in his wild flights, would talk of the danger of his getting asleep, or off his watch, and these planets thus running into disorder.

LOITERING upon the walks, and in the stores, is a very unprofitable practice. Christ was in the marketplace, but only as a teacher, or physician, or reprove; and as soon as his errand was accomplished, how he delighted to repair to the solitude of the mountain, or forest. Devotion loves retirement, and here she nerves her powers for action; and when duty calls us to remain upon the walks or public places of resort, when we find inquirers there who desire light, and truth, and salvation, there is the place for action; but when this duty is discharged, and no other presents itself to detain us, we will haste to where we can be in the way of duty, and in the paths of peace.

THE GRUMBLER. He is afraid of freshets when the rain is plentiful, and of drouth if it is scanty; he always looks a great ways ahead. If it is warm enough for corn he is afraid for the wheat, and if it is cool enough for wheat he is afraid for the corn crop. If he is rich he quarrels and goes to law, and if this makes him poor he quarrels with those who try to assist him. He can't bear a gift, yet wants all he can clutch by legal means. He thinks God is his God, and that all light and bounty should reflect upon so worthy a Christian as himself. There are too many grumblers. Let us contemplate their fall when the manna became for them too light food. Alas, poor man knows not how indulgent his heavenly Father has been. Oh how bountiful! Count his daily mercies to all men, in all ages, in all climes—mercies suited to every season, and every climate, repose for the weary, food for the hungry, clothes for the naked, in heat and cold, in sickness and health, in childhood and age, mercies for all; yet all abused, all slighted, all supposed to be due. And if by heavy provocations these are for a moment withheld, these wicked murmurers blaspheme God, who holds back his anger, lest his poor murmurers should die in a moment. Oh what love! J. CLARKE.

WORLDLY SORROW.

WORLDLY sorrow worketh death
Sink not beneath its power;
'Twill darken much that else were bright,
In mercy's lingering hour.

Forgotten be the trials past,
The present meekly borne;
Our burdens cast upon the Lord,
Who comforts those that mourn.

With heavenly wisdom we shall know,
What God would have us do;
While moving in his order on,
Our hope and strength renew.

Revived and strengthened we're prepared
To spread the truth abroad,
Beseeching men in Jesus' stead,
Be reconciled to God.

Then jewels will be gathered in,
The church built up again,
And all prepared to meet the Lord,
Who's coming soon to reign.

MRS. R. SMITH.

West Wilton, N. H.

CHOOSE YE THIS DAY WHOM YE WILL SERVE.

How necessary that we make a wise choice. "What man is he that feareth the Lord, him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose. His soul shall dwell at ease, and his seed shall inherit the earth. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will show them his covenant." The promises are to such as choose the Lord for their guide, protector and Saviour. In the case of Abel, who made choice of the firstlings of his flocks and of the fat thereof, we read that the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offerings; but unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect; but the Lord said unto him, If thou doest well shalt thou not be accepted? Cain had the opportunity to make the wise choice as you and I have to-day, dear reader; but if we do not, it must be with us as the Lord told Cain, "If thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door."

It may be with you as it was with Joseph who was sold by his brethren, and endured many severe trials; but he chose the Lord as his protector, and he in due time was wonderfully blessed. There are others who have chosen God to lead them, and then have forsaken him. We read of the children of Israel choosing the Lord, and of the Lord's presence with them, by the hand of Moses, he choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward, fearing not the wrath of the king; for he endured as seeing him who is invisible; he with the children of Israel being delivered from Pharaoh. And Israel saw that great work which the Lord did upon the Egyptians, and the people feared the Lord.

But we find them forsaking the Lord after he had so wonderfully blessed them, as we read in Ex. xxxii, 1. "And when the people saw Moses delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron and said unto him, Up, make us gods which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him." Are there not those who, like the children of Israel, have chosen the Lord and run well for a season, but have said finally Let us make unto ourselves gods. In this we perceive that they are leaving the Lord. As the children of Israel were inclined not to care what became of Moses, so is it with those that have forsaken to heed the commands of God. The command to Israel was, Thou shalt have no other gods before me; and again, The Lord said unto Moses, Thus thou shalt say unto the children of Israel, Ye have seen that I have talked with you from heaven, ye shall not make with me gods of silver, neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold. But how soon they disobeyed.

God has spoken from heaven unto us by his Son saying, Keep my commandments as I have kept my Father's commandments. Our blessed Saviour kept his Father's commandments—all of them—without any exception, and has told us to keep them without any ex-

In the case of the widow's son [Luke vii] Christ speaks of it to John's disciples [verse 22] as follows: "Then Jesus answering said unto them, Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard: how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised up," &c. See also the account of the resurrection of Lazarus.

The brother says, "Why not say of these that they were restored to life and health?" That is just what constitutes a resurrection. A resurrection is the "bringing into life and activity that which was dead and inactive." As to whether these six cases were raised to immortality or not, I would not claim in the absence of testimony. But admitting that they died again, that would not prove that they never had been raised from the dead.

It is asked whether the resurrection of the widow's son, &c., was by virtue of Christ's resurrection, and the brother quotes, "The Lord heard the voice of Elijah and the soul of the child came into him again and he revived." I ask, Why did the Lord hear the voice of Elijah? It must have been because his prayer was put up in faith. A faith that sees the grave opened, must be a faith that lays hold upon Christ as a conqueror of death and the grave. This, instead of mystifying the Scriptures, is the doctrine that produces a harmony in the Bible, in that it reveals Christ as the only source of life. J. N. LOUGHBOROUGH.

EVIDENCES OF THE END.

ABOUT eighteen hundred years ago a class of subtle persons came to the Saviour, and demanded a sign from heaven. He denounced their wicked motives, and told them they very readily judged of the weather by the aspect of the heavens, but inquired why they could not discern "the signs of the times." The Lord gave them to understand by this that we might just as readily judge of the moral condition of the world by the signs of the times, as we could the weather by the appearance of the heavens. We believe it is the duty of the "wise servant" to be well posted up on the signs of the times. We believe God has given certain signs, easily enough understood by all who want to understand them, by which we may certainly determine when deliverance will come to God's people. Believing it is an excellent thing to stir up our minds to things we already know, we will point out some of those prominent signs which declare that we are on the eve of the fulfillment of the promises. And,

1. "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come." Matt. xxiv, 14. This must either mean the gospel in its broad sense, or some distinctive feature of it. The word gospel means literally good news, and embraces the doctrine of the incarnation, death, resurrection, ascension and second coming of Christ. Paul says the gospel in his time had been preached to every creature, and its sound had gone into all the earth; but not in the sense spoken of in Matthew, for then would the end have come. We don't believe that a distinctive message on the Second Advent was preached in all the world in Paul's day, for it would not have been present truth. The burden of the apostles' labors and the primitive Christians, was to make the world believe in the first advent; but in our day a special message has been sounded in all the enlightened world that the Lord is coming. Missionaries also have spread the gospel all over the earth, as their printed works show, and in this we have the most convincing evidence that the end of all things is at hand. We will now pass to another evidence of the end.

2. Knowledge shall increase. "But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words and seal the book, even to the time of the end; many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." Dan. xii, 4. Here we are told that at the time of the end there shall be a remarkable increase of knowledge. This must include knowledge in general or knowledge on the prophetic Scriptures. Taking it either way, though it probably refers to knowledge on the prophecies, how wonderfully it has been fulfilled. What an age of improvement, of invention, of enterprise and discovery is ours. It is a time when science reigns, literature abounds, and mechanical skill astonishes us with her useful productions. But what shall we say of knowledge on the Scriptures? It is a day when Bible Societies flourish, Tract Societies exist in wonderful numbers, religious institutions are found all over the world, and for a few shillings a man may purchase more reading than he can despatch for a twelvemonth. Bibles and religious books are sent all over the world by tons and shiploads; and when we speak of knowledge on the prophecies and the Second Advent, it cannot be fathomed. For over twenty years have faithful watchman traversed the globe, telling the story of Jesus' coming, whether men would hear or forbear. The press has also mightily assisted in sending forth this message from heaven. Books have been published in vast quantities, tracts, millions of pages, have flown all over the earth, papers, magazines, journals, &c., exist in such numbers that all can hear and understand if they will. This then becomes our second mighty reason for believing we shall soon see the King in his beauty. And,

3. The great signs in the sun, moon and stars. It says in the gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke, that the "sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven," prior to the closing up of God's great day of probation on earth. If we take the most authentic histories of the past few years, times in the remembrance of many living witnesses, we shall find how minutely and yet grandly these prophecies have been fulfilled, and the exciting effects they had on the people at that time. It is needless for us to say much on this point, for the "dark day" of 1780, and the "falling stars" of 1833, are facts familiar to all. But what do they teach the Christian, God's humble believer? They teach him to believe and prepare for the event mentioned in the verse following the description of these celestial phenomena—"And they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Reader, do you believe this? If so, keep your lamp trimmed and burning, for as certain as the sun rolls through the heavens, so sure is Jesus soon coming. Let us discern all the signs of the times.

4. The increase of riches as in the present day. Hear the apostle: "Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days." Jas. v, 1-4. Here is a sign which any one with the least particle of discernment knows how to apply. The insurance companies, the banking institutions, brokers' shops, land offices, speculations, schemes, lotteries, railroad operations, begun, carried on, and finished in fraud, guile, deceit and covetousness, show how devoutly the "god of mammon" is worshiped, and how graphically this scripture is illustrated before our eyes. This is a money-making age. All the mass do is to lay plans, reckon interest, buy, sell and get gain. But what of all this? Why, to us, it constitutes a most startling sign of the times we live in. Heaven help us to understand our position.

5. Scoffers and mockers. The apostle says, "Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, where is the promise of his coming?" 2 Pet. iii, 3, 4. No one who has any acquaintance with the Advent doctrine will be at a loss to know how to interpret this scripture. It has received its fulfillment from the lips of all ranks and classes. The pulpit, the press, the infidel, the professor, the great man and the mean man have joined hands and derided the little company who are waiting for the Consolation of Israel. Peter's scoffers and Jude's mockers are here, and this is fearfully significant of our position in this world's history.

6. The state of Christianity. Says Paul, "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." 2 Tim. iii, 1-7. Here we have an inspired portrait of the popular church in the last days. This is a delineation of church sins, and millions now living know every word of it to be true. It is purely gratis to apply this to the world, for this has always been their condition; but how severely it fits the masses who have a form of godliness and deny the power; who pay great devotion to God with their lips, but in their hearts are to every good word and work reprobate. Who owns 660,000 slaves? The church. Who traffics in human beings, parts families, and are up to their eyes in a system the vilest and cruelest that ever saw the sun? The church. What does all this fraud, and selfishness, and mammon-worship, and hypocrisy become to us? A sign of the last days—an evidence of the close of probation. So teach the Scriptures, and so we believe.

7. The rise of Spiritualism. The record says, "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils." 1 Tim. iv, 1. Has there any system come up within a few years that exactly answers to this description? Most certainly so. Who teaches that the Bible is a fable, Jesus Christ a mere man, the atonement a myth, and the God of the Bible a tyrant and impostor? Modern Spiritualism. What is the corner-stone of their religious foundation? The doctrine of the immortality of the soul. Who first preached it? The Devil in the garden of Eden. What does Paul rank this teaching with? The doctrines of devils. What has the prophet Isaiah said of Spiritualism? Answer. "When they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and that mutter; should not a people seek unto their God? What is the chronology of this? "And I will wait upon the Lord that hideth his face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for him." Then when somebody is looking for Christ's return, others will depart from the faith, as myriads now are doing, and give heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of the Devil. What does all this teach us? That we are in the last end of the indignation, and that soon God will rise up and sweep the world in the storm of his wrath. What shall we do in view of this? Believe, watch and pray.

8. A reform on the Sabbath and law of God. In the fourteenth of Revelation we have three messages which should be sounded just before the great and dreadful day of the Lord. The first two have gone forth, and the last is now going; and its main feature is, "the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." The Bible tells us that to "fear God and keep his commandments is the whole duty of man." These commandments bring to view the Sabbath; but the world keeps Sunday. By so doing they have made a breach in God's law, which must be made up by the "repairers of the breach," before the house of Israel will be prepared to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord. But does the Bible call Sunday the Sabbath? No, not once. It never speaks of it as any more holy than Monday or any other day; it never tells us to keep it; it never speaks of it as sanctified time; don't say the apostles ever kept it; it don't speak of it but six or eight times;—and on the contrary, we are warned against the mark of the beast; against substituting the doctrines of men for the commandments of God;—we are also told that Jesus kept the law, the apostles kept it, and if we fulfill the royal law according to the Scriptures, we shall do well. The prophet Isaiah speaks of the restoration of the Bible Sabbath just before the second advent. See chap. lvi, 1, 2. And in chap. viii, 16, he speaks of binding up the testimony and sealing the law among the disciples, which seems to exalt it from its present downtrodden position, and prevail on men to keep it. This of course will make trouble in the world, and so we read, "The dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed which keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." But is this now being fulfilled? Yes, for more than twelve years a faithful few have been canvassing the country proclaiming, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," "Here is the patience of the saints," "Jesus is coming, get ready to meet him." What may the world understand by this? Answer. That it is Bible truth, and that soon the books will be opened and every one judged according to the deeds done in the body.

9. Likeness of the last days to those of Noah and Lot.

Said the Saviour, "And as it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days the Son of man. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." Luke xvii, 26, 28-30.

This testimony shows us that the world will go on just as usual, until Jesus comes in the glory of the Father and the angels. The farmer will be at his toils, the merchant at his counter, the student at his books, the drunkard at his cup; there will be mocking, scoffing, carousing, eating, drinking, buying and selling, until the harvest is past, the summer ends, and the world find that they are lost. When men tell us that the end is not yet, for this is such an age of improvement, it is all very significant to the student of prophecy, and all who truly discern the signs of the times. It is just what Christ predicted. May heaven help us to be like the wise who shall understand.

We have now passed over the most important signs which are portentous of the time we live in. They admonish us in trumpet tones to get ready for the day of war and battle, to prepare for the reception of the King of kings and Lord of lords. There are other events and signs, fulfilled and fulfilling, which go hand in hand with what we have written, which declare we are in the day of God's preparation.

We refer to the ending of the prophetic periods, which places us emphatically in the waiting position—the fulfillment of the parable of the ten virgins, and the midnight cry of 1844—the general absence of faith as declared by Christ—signs and fearful sights in the earth—blood, fire, and pillars of smoke—men's hearts failing them for fear and for looking after those things coming on the earth—fiery chariots with the speed of lightning running through the land—the anger of the nations and a general premonition of coming trouble, on our own soil as well as in foreign lands—the decline of the papacy and consumption of that system, as the prophet declared they should take it away and destroy it unto the end—the parable of the fig tree—the general increase of wickedness, all, all of these things unite in telling that soon "a King will reign in righteousness," when the nations will be "dashed in pieces like a potter's vessel," and "the ransomed of the Lord will return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads."

Glorious hope! Blissful prospect to the saint of God! May we ever be co-workers with God and the angels until we finally rest in the Eden of love.

THE DEVIL OUTDONE.

In those portions of God's truth that delineate the last days we read that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." We suppose this means in plain English that they will get to be as bad as they can be, or as expressed by Scripture, until every imagination of their heart shall be evil and that continually. This was the condition of the earth before the flood, and Christ says it will be so when the Son of Man is revealed. We should judge by the following extract that certain portions of the world have perfectly fulfilled the prediction, and are as fully prepared for the wrath of God Almighty as they ever can be. Read it if you can without shuddering. It came from the unholy lips of one Joseph Treat, in a speech at the Paine celebration in Cincinnati, Sunday, Jan. 30, 1860.

G. W. A.

"There is no God! God is the first, great eternal mistake of the Age of Reason! God is the grand, pivotal mistake of all systems! God is the great central Superstition, round which all other Superstitions cling! God is the sole foundation of Bibles, Sabbaths, Priesthoods, Religions, Resurrections, Judgments, Heavens, Hells, Spirits, Spirit Worlds, all! I strike home at this root." "If there is a God, men can know it; but nobody does know it. If there is a God, there must be proof of the fact; but there is no proof." "Not one argument—that is an argument—in favor of a God, has ever been framed; and not one can be." "There is no need of a God! There is nothing for a God to do." "Call for a God when there is occasion for a God—but the Eternal Universe has none! And what there is no occasion for does not exist, and God does not exist! "There is no room for a God! There is no place where God could be." "God is an evil! He is the evil under which the earth has always been groaning." "A good God is a contradiction. Any God dwarfs, enslaves, dehumanizes. A man and a God cannot live in the same universe!" "God is the curse of curses!" "God will be blotted out! It is written in the book of fate! It is the future of this planet! Over the whole extent of this wide, wide world—among all its unnumbered millions of inhabitants, and during almost endless ages that shall roll, there will be no God! God will be lost out of the history of the race. Eternal generations will come and go, and never hear of a God, nor know that ever preceding generations talked about one! God will be swallowed up in an infinite oblivion! His very name will die out of human language!" "No-God will be the world's millennium!" "Then will indeed be proclaimed that everlasting gospel, 'Peace on earth, good will to men,' when all the dwellers of earth shall lift up their voice together, and say with a shout, 'God is dead, and we are glad of it!'"

WAITING FOR CHRIST.

We wait for thee, all-glorious One,
We look for thine appearing;
We bear thy name, and on the throne
We see thy presence cheering.

Faith even now
Uplifts its brow,
And sees the Lord descending,
And with him bliss unending.

We wait for thee, through days forlorn,
In patient self-denial;
We know that thou our guilt hast borne
Upon thy cross of trial.
And well may we
Submit with thee
To bear thy cross, and love it,
Until thy hand remove it.

We wait for thee. Already thou
Hast all our heart's submission;
And though the spirit sees thee now,
We long for open vision,
When ours shall be
Sweet rest with thee,
And pure, unfading pleasure,
And life in endless measure.

We wait for thee with certain hope—
The time will soon be over;
With childlike warning we look up
The glory to discover.
O bliss! to share
Thy triumph there,
When home, with joy and singing,
The Lord his saints is bringing.

HINTS ON TEACHING.

[As the season has arrived in which many of our brethren have engaged, or are about to engage in the business of teaching, they may be interested in any remarks and suggestions upon that point.—Ed.]

If there is a situation which requires patience, combined with every other heavenly virtue, it is the office of the teacher.

Many of those now in the faith of the third message, are teachers of common schools, and as such, are subjected to the usual trials of, the peculiar and trying ordeal to which this class are subject.

The apostasy of the present age renders this task far more difficult than formerly. Disobedient children are of course disobedient scholars, and every experienced teacher will bear witness to the fact, that well regulated families are the stay and support of the school, while those who are disorderly at home, bring their habits to the school, where such habits spread like the plague, without the benefit of quarantine.

About every winter we hear of sad accidents (if accidents they may be called), happening in school; sometimes a teacher is killed by his rebellious pupils, or at another time, the teacher in his hot haste, seizes some heavy weapon, and partly in self-defence, partly in discipline, mingled with rage, deals the fatal blow upon his pupil.

With such well-attested facts before the public, the applicants for this responsible office are yearly increasing, and often without preparation sufficient to fill the place. One is well educated, but hot tempered; another is slack, and another ignorant of good manners; one in this and another in that particular; for home education being neglected, parents thus neglecting duty, the benches are filled with graceless pupils, and of course the graduating class turns into active life the graceless teacher, who educates pupils ten-fold worse than himself.

In this sad state of things an honest-hearted teacher is called into the third message. With many disqualifications as a teacher, he is nevertheless sought after, as successful in the main, and perhaps superior to the mass of teachers, and his greatest fault and most obvious weakness is perhaps a hot, hasty temper.

Dear brother or sister, whoever you are, let me warn and entreat you to beware. Be assured that every spasm of anger only weakens your bodily and mental power, and destroys your moral influence over the pupil, and shames yourself, and humbles your brethren, shocks the feelings of tenderest friends, grieves the angels, and disgusts the dignities of heaven.

Can you not overcome this passion, that disgraces the cause, casts down your own influence, alienates your bosom friends, grieves the good, and exasperates the bad? Be assured, dear brother or sister, whether parent, or teacher, or guardian, that this same temper, this hasty temper is the recruiting office of Satan's troop; it has no apology, no excuse, no good trait, and is of no benefit at all.

Can you not overcome? Fast, pray, watch. Do not put it off, and keep sinning and repenting, sinning and repenting. Do not speak so hastily to that little one. What if he is bad? Reproaches, be sure of it, reproaches will not benefit him. Love, love, largely mixed with firmness, patience, gentleness, goodness. Come to your school all aglow with love to God, come from the closet with a heart of pity, and love, and wisdom.

But says one, teaching is a practical business, and love will not do it all; the penalty of disobedience must be applied. Just so, dear brother. "Foolishness is bound up in the heart of a child, but the rod and reproof will drive it far from him."

But be sure not to do this in anger. Let the offender stand upon the floor until your anger has wholly subsided. Rather wait until your contract expires, than punish in anger. You can let him wait until you have lifted your heart in prayer to God, until you have chastened your soul into love and humility. Be deliberate in executing penalties: slowly, calmly, considerately. If ever in the world you should be calm, it is in administering reproof and correction.

As we are upon the subject of penalties and discipline, if it is in order, I will subjoin the opinion of a Mr. Ogden on this point. Many parents as well as teachers may perhaps profit by it.

"THE PHILOSOPHY OF FLOGGING. Mr. Ogden, a teacher in Ohio, has published a volume on the 'Science of Education, and the Art of Teaching.' We make from it the following extract on the use of the rod:

"As a strictly reformatory measure, for certain cases, it has scarcely an equal, and surely no substitute."

"He advises the application of the 'strokes upon the back, shoulders, and lower extremities, but never upon the hands, head, or face, or any other place where it would injure the person or offer any indignities. The clothing upon the parts should not be so abundant as to demand heavy blows, or injury might result from that quarter. Hence, portions of it might be removed, under certain circumstances, and its thickness tested before the operation commences. This will also serve to convince the offender that you are really laboring for his benefit."

"The instrument should be a switch; not a pole, nor a club, nor a paddle, but a light switch; one with which you would not be likely to injure the muscle or bone. The chastisement should be confined to the surface. There, perhaps, is not a case, within the reach of reformation, so hardened as not to be reached without going below the surface.

"As to frequency, the blows should not be repeated oftener than about once in a half a minute; and for some purposes the intervals might even be prolonged beyond this time; first, because the child wants time for reflection between the strokes; second, he wants

PRAYER FOR VICTORY.

Jesus, help conquer!
My spirit is sinking,
Deep waters of sorrow go over my head;
Weeping and trembling,
And fearing and shrinking,
I watch for the day, and night cometh instead.
Bitter the cup
I am hourly drinking—
How thorny the path that hourly I tread!

Jesus, help conquer!
For, fainting and weary,
Scarcely my hands can their weapons sustain;
The way seems so desolate,
Painful and dreary—
How shall I ever to heaven attain!
Jesus, great Captain,
If thou be not near me,
How shall I ever the victory gain?

Jesus, help conquer!
Earth holds out her lure,
And mortal affections yearn after the prize;
Scarcely my heart
Can the struggle endure;
Scarcely can I lift up my tear-blinded eyes.
Jesus, Redeemer!
Thy promise is sure—
Speak to my spirit, and bid me arise.

Jesus, help conquer!
There is not an hour
Of sorrow or joy but is ordered by thee;
Thou dost out down,
Who hast planted the flower—
Tempest or calm at thy bidding shall be.
Look on my sorrow,
And give me the power
Humbly to wait till thou comfortest me.

Jesus, help conquer!
Lord, turn not away!
See with what power the billows increase!
Give me thy love
For my comfort and stay,
Then shall my trembling and murmuring cease.
Then shall my spirit
Grow strong for the fray—
Then shall my weary heart rest in thy peace.

Jesus, help conquer!
I cry unto thee!
Hardly my heart its petitions can frame;
All is so dark
And so painful to me,
All I can utter, sometimes, is thy name.
Jesus, help conquer!
My portion now be,
Though all else should change, be thou ever the same.

A SHORT SERMON ON 1 PET. IV, 7.

BY B. F. SNOOK.

"But the end of all things is at hand; be ye therefore sober and watch unto prayer."

We will show (1.) where this scripture has its application. (2.) Upon what authority the Apostle makes the statement, "The end of all things is at hand." (3.) We will thence draw some important practical conclusions.

I. Where does this text apply? Much depends upon correctly settling this question. Was it true in the Apostle's time that the end of all things was at hand? i. e., the second coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and the general judgment? We think not. No man can believe so who takes the Bible for his guide. The text must therefore be applied down in the waiting time [Luke xii, 36]; in the time when the second coming of Christ is near at hand. This is also proven by other scriptures which have a very important bearing upon this point: "Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." 1 Pet. i, 13. Here is an address which can apply to none others than those who live in the generation which extends up to the second advent. For none others can hope to the end. He did not say, Hope till death, as many would have it; but hope to the end. The hoping is a work which must extend entirely up to the end. The same idea is adduced in the following: "Looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Tit. ii, 13. The fact that watching and prayer are enjoined in immediate connection with the text is conclusive proof that it cannot apply in any other than in the waiting and watching time. "Be ye therefore sober and watch unto prayer." "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." Matt. xxiv, 42. These plain and unequivocal scriptures are sufficient to settle this question, and we submit it to the reader.

II. We will in the next place show upon what authority the statement, "The end of all things is at hand" is made.

1. This is upon the authority of prophecy. In the second and seventh chapters of Daniel's prophecy is given the outlines of the history of the world from the time of the Babylonian kings to the second advent of Christ and the setting up of the kingdom of God. In chap. ii, is given the record of a great and terrible image. This image represents four universal empires: The Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian and Roman. It also represents the division and subdivision of the fourth. This is brought to view by the two legs and ten toes; showing that Rome would be divided, first into two divisions and secondly into ten kingdoms. The same ideas are brought out in chap. vii. The dreadful and terrible beast represents the fourth kingdom, the ten horns the subdivided state of Rome into ten kingdoms; for the ten horns are ten kings. Verse 4. And the little horn the papal power which is to endure till the day of judgment. Verses 21, 22; 2 Thess. ii, 3-8. Succeeding these four universal empires is presented the fifth, which is the kingdom of God. Chap ii, 44, and vii, 14, 18, 22, 27.

Where now are we? What link of this great prophetic chain do we occupy? and what way-marks to the kingdom of God have we passed?

We have passed Babylon the head of gold, and the lion with eagles' wings. Hab. i, 6. The Medo-Persian empire, the silvery breast and arms and the bear with three ribs in his mouth, is also passed away. Greece, the sides of brass, the leopard with four heads and four wings of a fowl, which once ruled the nations of the earth, with all her terrestrial glory, has fallen to rise no more.

We have also passed Rome with her world renowned Caesar. History records the mournful account of her great fall. We have passed Eastern and Western Rome, the legs of iron. We have traveled for more than 1260 years among the ten kings, the toes of the image and the horns of the beast. And up to near 1798 our path has been stained with the blood shed by the little horn, in which are the eyes of a man and a mouth speaking great things, into whose hands the saints, times and laws of God were given for 1260 years. What do we look for next? The rise of another earthly power? No. We look next to see the image smitten upon the toes, and all worldly powers to be dashed to pieces [Ps. ii, 9], and then to see the kingdom of God set up; for "in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed." Chap ii, 44.

This evidence brings us down into the last link of this prophetic chain—down into the link which is to be succeeded by the everlasting kingdom of God. Truly, therefore we are now living in the time when the "end of all things is at hand."

2. The fulfillment of signs. Jesus taught his disciples that he would visit this earth again. And that his people might know when to look for him he gave certain signs, and assures us that when these are fulfilled we may know that his coming is near even at the doors. He has given us signs in the sun, moon, stars and earth. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven; and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Matt. xxiv, 29, 30. A number of very important items are brought to view in this scripture. 1. Those days. 2. The tribulation of those days. 3. The signs which were to appear after this tribulation. 4. The second coming of the Son of man to take place after the fulfillment of the signs.

1. Those days. This declaration must refer to the 1260 years of Papal supremacy. For the pope was to have dominion 1260 days [Rev. xii, 6] of prophetic time, which is just 1260 years.

2. The tribulation. This stands in connection with the days spoken of and hence must refer to the Papal persecution. The pope was to persecute the saints and make war with them. "I beheld and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them." "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High. . . . and they shall be given into his hand until a time times and the dividing of times." Dan. vii, 21, 25. And there was given him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months." Rev. xiii, 5. The length of time spoken of in each of these scriptures is the same, being 1260 years. During this time millions of God's dear saints were put to death in the most cruel and painful manner. This was truly the greatest tribulation that ever came upon any people since the world was. Matt. xxiv, 21.

3. The signs. These were in part to succeed the tribulation, but not the 1260 days or years. Our Saviour said the tribulation should be shortened for the sake of the elect. Matt. xxiv, 22. The tribulation was shortened under the influence of the reformers, so that after about the year 1775 or near that, there has been no general persecution. What comes next? Immediately shall the sun be darkened and the moon shall not give her light. Here we call attention to a very important axiom in the study of prophecy: "No false fulfillment of prophecy can fill both the event and the time of the event." The events are that the sun shall be darkened and the moon shall not give her light. The time is immediately after the tribulation of those days, but in the days; or, as Mark says, "In those days after the tribulation of those days," &c., [chap. xiii 24], which locates the time near 1798. The sun was darkened May 19th 1780, and the night following, the moon utterly refused to shine. Here we have the events fulfilled with a fulfillment of the time also, which shows that we do not mistake in our views of this prophecy. The facts of this matter are beautifully expressed in verse by one who no doubt was a witness of the events:

Let us adore and bow before
The sovereign Lord of might,
Who turns away the shining day
Into the shades of night.

"Nineteenth of May, a gloomy day,
When darkness veiled the sky,
The sun's decline may be a sign
Some great event is nigh.

"Let us remark how black and dark
Was the ensuing night;
And for a time the moon's decline,
Which did not give her light."

The next event in order is the falling of the stars. This was fulfilled in 1833. This brings us down into the time of which our Saviour says, "So likewise ye when ye shall see all these things know that it is near even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." Verses 33, 34.

4. The coming of the Son of God. This therefore is the next great event before us. The foregoing is but a small amount of the testimony which might be adduced on this subject. This however is enough to warrant the language of the text: "The end of all things is at hand."

III. We will now draw some important practical conclusions. 1. We should now live soberly, righteously, and godly. Tit. ii, 12. We should pray without ceasing. 1 Thess. v, 17. 3. Being the children of light we should not walk in darkness, but in the light, that that day come not upon us as a thief in the night. Verses 4-6. 4. We should ask the blessing of God upon all our works, and in thanksgiving receive every blessing given to us. Verse 18. How considerate then should we be lest we engage in something in which we cannot ask the blessing of God to follow us!

MISTAKES IN RELIGION.

To point out with precision all the mistakes which exist at the present day on the awful subject of religion, would far exceed our limits. No mention therefore is intended to be made of the opinions or the practice of any particular body of people; nor will any notice be taken of any of the peculiarities of the numerous sects and parties which have risen up among us. It will be sufficient for the present purpose to hazard some slight remarks on a few of those common classes of characters which belong more or less to most general bodies.

There are, among many others, three different sorts of religious professors. The religion of one consists in a sturdy defense of what they themselves call orthodoxy, an attendance on public worship, and a general decency of behaviour. In their views of religion, they are not a little apprehensive of excess, not perceiving that their dandles on the other side. They are far from rejecting faith or morals, but are somewhat afraid of believing too much, and a little scrupulous about doing too much, lest the former be suspected of fanaticism and the latter of singularity. These Christians consider religion as a point which they, by their regular observances, having attained, there is nothing further required but to maintain the point they have reached, by a repetition of the same observances. They are therefore satisfied to remain stationary, considering that whoever has obtained his end is of course saved the labor of pursuit; he is to keep his ground without troubling himself in searching after an imaginary perfection.

These frugal Christians are afraid of nothing so much as superfluity in their love, and supererogation in their obedience. This kind of fear however is always superfluous, but most especially in those who are troubled with the apprehension. They are apt to weigh in the nicely poised scales of scrupulous exactness, the duties which must of hard necessity be done, and those which without much risk may be left undone; compounding for a larger indulgence by the relinquishment of a smaller; giving up, through fear, a trivial gratification to which they are less inclined, and snatching doubtingly, as an equivalent, at one they like better. The gratification in both cases being perhaps such as a manly mind would hardly think worth contending for, even were religion out of the question. Nothing but love to God can conquer love of the world. One grain of that divine principle would make the scale of self-indulgence kick the beam.

These persons dread nothing so much as enthusiasm. Yet if to look for effects without their predisposing causes; to depend for heaven on that to which heaven was never promised, be features of enthusiasm, then are they themselves enthusiasts.

The religion of a second class we have already described. It consists in a heart devoted to its Maker; inwardly changed in its temper and disposition, yet deeply sensible of its remaining infirmities; continually aspiring, however to higher improvements in faith, hope and charity, and thinking that "the greatest of these is charity." These, by the former class, are reckoned enthusiasts, but they are in fact, if Christianity be true, acting on the only rational principles. If the doctrines of the gospel have any solidity, if its promises have any meaning, these Christians are building on no false ground. They hope that submission to the power of God, obedience to his laws, compliance with his will, trust in his word, are through the efficacy of the eternal Spirit, real evidences, because they are vital acts of genuine faith in Jesus Christ. If they profess not to place their reliance on works, they are however more zealous in performing them than the others, who professing to depend on their good deeds for salvation are not always diligent in securing it by the very means which they themselves establish to be alone effectual.

There is a third class—the high flown professor, who looks down from the giddy height of antinomian delusion on the other two, abhors the one and despises the other, concludes that the one is lost, and the other in a fair way to be so. Though perhaps not living himself in any course of immorality which requires the sanction of such doctrines, he does not hesitate to imply in his discourse that virtue is heathenish, and good works superfluous if not dangerous. He does not consider that though the gospel is an act of oblivion to penitent sinners, yet it nowhere promises pardon to those who continue to live in a state of rebellion against God, and of disobedience to his laws. He forgets to insist to others that it is of little importance even to believe that sin is an evil (which however they do not always believe), while they persist to live in it; that to know everything of duty except the doing it, is to offend God with an aggravation, from which ignorance itself is exempt. It is not giving ourselves up to Christ in a nameless, inexplicable way, which will avail us. God loves an humble, not an audacious faith. To suppose that the blood of Christ redeems us from sin while sin continues to pollute the soul, is to suppose an impossibility. To maintain that it is effectual for the salvation, and not for the sanctification of the sinner, is to suppose that it acts like an emulet, an incantation, a talisman, which is to produce its effect by operating on the imagination, and not on the disease.

The religion which mixes with human passions and is set on fire by them, will make a stronger blaze than that light which is from above, which sheds a steady and lasting brightness on the path, communicates a sober but durable warmth to the heart. It is equable and constant; while the other, like culinary fire, fed by gross materials, is extinguished the sooner from the fierceness of the flame.

That religion which is merely seated in the passions, is not only liable to wear itself out by its own impetuosity, but to be driven out by some other passion. The dominion of violent passions is short. They dispossess each other. When religion has had its day, it gives way to the next usurper. Its empire is no more solid than it is lasting, when principle and reason do not fix it on the throne.

The first of the above classes consider prudence as the paramount virtue in religion. Their antipodes, the flaming professors, believe a burning zeal to be the exclusive grace. They reverse St. Paul's collocation of the three Christian graces, and think that the greatest of these is faith. Though even in respect of this grace their conduct and conversation too often give us reason to lament that they do not bear in mind its genuine and distinctive properties. Their faith, instead of working by love, seems to be adopted from a notion that it leaves the Christian nothing to do, rather than because it is its nature to lead him to do more and better than other men.

In this case, as in many others, that which is directly contrary to what is wrong, is wrong also. If each opponent would only barter half his favorite quality with the favorite quality of the other, both parties would approach nearer to the truth. They might furnish a complete Christian between them, i. e., provided the zeal of the one was sincere and the prudence of the other honest. But the misfortune is, each is as proud of not possessing the quality he wants, because his adversary has it, as he is proud of possessing that of which the other is destitute, and because he is destitute of it.

Among the many mistakes in religion, it is commonly thought that there is something so unintelligible, absurd, and fanatical in the term conversion that those who employ it run no small hazard of being involved in the ridicule it excites. It is seldom used but ludicrously, or in contempt. This arises partly from the levity and ignorance of the censurer, but perhaps as much from the imprudence and enthusiasm of those who have absurdly confined it to real or supposed instances of sudden or miraculous changes from profligacy to piety. But surely, with reasonable people we run no risk in asserting that he who being awakened by any of those various methods which the Almighty uses to bring his creatures to a knowledge of himself, who, seeing the corruptions that are in the world, and feeling those with which his own heart abounds, is brought, whether gradually or more rapidly, from an evil heart of unbelief, to a lively faith in the Redeemer; from a life, not only of gross vice, but of worldliness and vanity, to a life of progressive piety; whose humility keeps pace with his progress; who, though his attainments are advancing, is so far from counting himself to have attained, that he presses onward with unabated zeal, and evidences by the change in his conduct, the change that has taken place in his heart—Such a one is surely as sincerely converted and the effect is as much produced by the

ALTHOUGH we have found many unequivocal declarations in the oracles of God that the Son of man is to return to this earth personally and visibly in power and glory, and have produced an amount of evidence on the point, which must be more than satisfactory to every candid mind, there are other scriptures which we are unwilling to pass entirely by.

The coming of the Lord is inseparably connected with other scenes. A series of events of which this forms a part is often spoken of in the word of God as a whole; the day in which it is to take place we find many times and uniformly described. This being the case, it follows that those scriptures which foretell any of these events, or declare to us that such a day is approaching, become so many direct prophecies of the coming of Christ, though this event may not be particularly specified therein. To a few passages of this class we now propose to call attention. "For yourselves know perfectly," says Paul in 1 Thess. v, 2, "that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night." But what about this day of the Lord? Has this anything to do with the coming of Christ. Is the latter one of the events to take place therein? See the connection. In the previous chapter, verse 16, Paul had been discoursing directly about the coming of the Lord, and laying down declarations plain and strong like this: "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God." And he continues in the first verse of chap. v, "But of the times and seasons [when these things shall take place] ye have no need that I write unto you." Why? "For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord cometh," &c.; and since you know about this, you of course know about the coming of Christ, which is one of its primary events.

Again, we have in Rev. vi, 12-17 a record of the events which John saw transpiring under the sixth seal. After mentioning the signs in the sun, moon and stars, he brings us to the closing event of the series when the heavens depart as a scroll, and every mountain and island move out of their places, and the great, and rich, and noble of earth cry to the rocks and mountains, saying, "Fall on us and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come and who shall be able to stand!" There can be no mistaking the fearful scene here brought to view. But it involves the presence of him who sitteth on the throne, the revelation from on high of the once insulted, but now exalted and avenging Lamb; for otherwise they could not pray to be hid from his presence or buried from his wrath. So we may add Rev. vi, 16, to the long catalogue of inspired announcements that the Lord will come.

In Isa. xiii, 6, 9, 10; Joel ii, 31; Zeph. i, 14, we have portrayed before us, in the graphic and sublime strains of inspiration, the great day of the Lord, which is appointed for all the earth. But no surer does the day of the Lord burst upon us, than our Redeemer appears to the salvation of all them that look for him. Heb. ix, 28.

Before leaving this division of the subject, we must notice a few more scriptures which speak to us of the great fact of the second coming of our Lord; not that they are necessary to the establishment of the point in question, but simply for the gratification which the heavenward traveler feels as he sees his hope recorded before him in line upon line, line upon line, here and there, throughout the book of God. To the weary pilgrim who mourns the ruins of the fall, no prospect can be more cheering than a restoration of all things to their primeval state, a cure of all the evils that sin has wrought. And such a restitution has been graciously promised. But what shall introduce this glorious era? Nothing less than the second coming of the Lord. Peter speaks in Acts iii, 19, of the times of refreshing which shall come from the presence of the Lord, and adds, "And he shall send Jesus Christ which before was preached unto you, whom the heavens must receive till the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Very much after the tenor of this passage is another found in 1 Tim. vi, 14, 15: "That thou keep this commandment without spot, unrebukable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, which in his times he shall show," &c. It is here declared that the appearing of Jesus shall be shown; in Acts iii, that God shall send him; and when the Almighty utters his purposes with a shall, who is he that dare disbelieve!

1 Thess. i, 10. "He shall come to be glorified in his saints." 2 Thess. ii, 8. "And then shall that wicked be revealed whom the Lord shall consume with the Spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming." To harmonize this scripture with their soporific theory, advocates of a temporal millennium tell us that a personal coming is not here intended, but a coming in the sense of an increased power imparted to the truth, and a universal spread of the gospel; and that by this means the man of sin is to be destroyed and consumed, or, in other words, be converted to the religion of Jesus. Had such persons never read beyond verse 8, although their interpretation would then be marvelous in the extreme, it might still be looked upon with greater allowance. But we feel warranted in utterly scouting such an idea, from the verses immediately following in which we are told that those who perish, are such as did not receive the love of the truth, and were therefore given over to strong delusion, not that they might be converted and saved, but that they all might be damned. Nothing less than a personal coming, and that, too, in inconceivable power and glory, can produce the results mentioned in verse 8. Such it will therefore be.

Paul in his letter to Titus [ii, 11-13] tells us that the grace of God hath appeared to all men teaching us that we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ," or as it might better be rendered, the appearing of the glory of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

But Paul is not the only witness here. The other sacred penmen all come forward as if impatient to bear testimony to the glorious theme. Peter dwells in glowing terms on the coming day of the Lord, and carries us forward to the delightful scene of the new earth wherein righteousness alone shall dwell. And Jude, in his brief letter to Christians, is careful not to omit the fact that Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied, saying, Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints.

ALL EXPLAINED.

BRO. D. W. Canright writes from Kinderhook, Mich.: "It is remarkable how professors and infidels all agree in opposing present truth. Not long since one of the brethren was preaching on the signs of the times, the falling of the stars, &c. After preaching he gave liberty for any to speak that wished to. An infidel Dr. got up and explained how it happened that the stars fell at that time. He said it took place according to nature, and consequently there was nothing in it. A Baptist minister who was present, responded, Amen. He said that was right; and that if the falling of the stars in 1833 was a fulfillment of Matt. xxiv, then it had been fulfilled a great many times since its prediction by the falling of meteors."

REMARKS.—The attempt is made to dispose of the darkening of the sun in 1780 in a similar manner. That can constitute no sign of the end, it is said, because many such events have taken place, in different ages of the world. But the fact that that darkening was connected with particular events, takes it completely out of the hands of our opponents. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days" (the 1260 years of Papal persecution), or as another Evangelist has it, "In those days, after that tribulation," the sun shall be darkened, &c. The tribulation was shortened by the rise of the Reformation, the time arrived for the accomplishment of that prediction and it was fulfilled. Now it matters not if the sun has been darkened a thousand times in past ages of the world, that darkening which was to constitute a sign of the end was to take place at that time, and there it did take place; and being expressly foretold as a sign of the end, no sophistry can explain it away. So with the falling of the stars. The phenomenon of Nov., 1833 was the most remarkable of any of that kind on record. It was foretold in connection with the darkening of the sun and moon. And so we find it following right on in that great series of events by which nature herself seems, as it were, to have been appointed to herald forth to mankind the approaching restitution of all things. Infidels and professors may strike hands to explain these things away; scoffers may scoff at our hope; but the glorious day is coming, redemption is nigh. Let sinners tremble; let the saints rejoice.—Ed.

A CALL FOR HELP.

In the Millennial Harbinger for Dec. 12, 1860, published at Seneca Falls, N. Y., we see the following:

"A Request.

"Will Bro. Stephenson answer the following question through the Harbinger? Was it the ten commandments that slew Paul? My reason for asking this question is this, James White asserted that it was. I think that the 29th verse of the 20th chap. of the Acts is applicable to him. J. JEFFREY.

"Freeport, Stephenson Co., Ills."

It is supposed from the above that Mr. Jeffrey refers to Paul's conversion and not to his martyrdom, yet he does not state which.

At our recent call at Crane's Grove, Ills., we spoke to the people one evening on the subject of Bible conversion. We referred to the statements of Paul in Rom. vi and vii, where the law of God is shown to act an important part in the conversion of the sinner. We stated,

1. That the epistle to the Romans was written A. D. 60, at least twenty-five years after the "hand-writing of ordinances" was nailed to the cross; therefore,

2. Paul, in such language as is found in Rom. vii, 9, "For I was alive without the law once, but when the commandment came sin revived and I died," must mean, by the word law, the precepts of the moral law; for,

3. It would be folly in the extreme for him to speak thus of a law that had been dead at least twenty-five years.

These plain facts, with many others stated in that discourse, seem to have caused trouble in the no-Sabbath camp at Crane's Grove, and Mr. J. M. Stephenson is called upon for help.

But how is Acts xx, 29 "applicable?" "For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in, not sparing the flock." We went to Crane's Grove single-handed and alone, therefore that part of the passage which speaks of grievous wolves, plural, is not applicable to us. If the passage be at all applicable it must be in this way.

We preached one Pauline discourse at Crane's Grove, and after we left, grievous wolves (Clark, Collins, Jeffrey, & Co.) entered in to do their work, but as the sheep's clothing has fallen off these men, they appear in their true character, and none of the flock are deceived by them.

In the Millennial Harbinger for Jan. 2, 1861, we have "Response to Bro. Jeffrey's Question." On reading the response our first impressions were that Mr. Stephenson in his round about course had thrown as much darkness as he had light, even upon the mind of his brother Jeffrey, that some would regard it as very deep, while others would discover that it was very muddy. People sometimes make just such a mistake. Because they cannot see to the bottom of a muddy pool of water, conclude it must be very deep. Perhaps Mr. Jeffrey had better send to the Harbinger another "Request," and ask Mr. Stephenson what is meant in his response by "the bond-man whose children are the Jews," and "the Revision party." BRO. H. C. WHITNEY'S QUESTION.

merely artificial barriers which may be raised up against them; for our great enemy is as formidable from a seeming distance as in close combat; where he cannot come he will send.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH. THIRD-DAY, FEB. 19, 1861.

THOUGHTS ON THE ADVENT.

(Concluded.)

LET us now look at a few of the evidences bearing directly upon the time of the second coming of Christ. That coming events cast their shadows before, is a saying to the truthfulness of which the world readily assent. But if this is true of any event, it certainly is, as it is natural that it should be, true of the last great event which is to close the stormy and troublesome drama of this unfortunate earth. No surer does the mariner know from manifold signs that he draws near land, or the husbandman know from all the indications of nature that summer is nigh, than we may know that even now, the great day of the Lord, the end of the world, and the coming of Christ, are even at the doors.

To enter into a full exposition of the evidences on this point would not be in accordance with the design of these articles. We shall give but an outline which the reader can fill up at his leisure. We are taught, then, that the end of this world is near,

1. By the prophetic periods. Periods of time are given in the word of God to mark certain great events. The rule by which to interpret these periods is also furnished us. Their commencement, intermediate dates and termination are all clearly established. And by the nature of the events which they are given to mark, we are brought down step by step till we know with absolute certainty that we are now in the time of the end.

Take for instance the 2300 days of Dan. viii, 14. By the aid of chap. ix, the commencement of this period is indubitably established; and it is shown to end in A. D. 1844. But what bearing has this on the end of the world? It does not say, to be sure, that at the end of this period, the Lord shall come; but at that time the Sanctuary shall be cleansed. We are thus introduced to another great subject, than which there is scarcely one in the word of God more beautiful, harmonious and clear. The subject of the Sanctuary! The law of Moses with its types and ceremonies is here brought into requisition. By those types we now see plainly prefigured before us the work of our great High Priest in the antitypical Sanctuary in Heaven. In the type the cleansing of the Sanctuary was the last work of its yearly repeated service. The cleansing of the Sanctuary in Heaven is the last work of that antitypical service which is accomplished once for all. When this is finished, the plan of salvation, the day of probation, will be forever ended. Our great High Priest will then lay aside the priestly for the kingly robe, and proclaim to his waiting people that the day of vengeance, the year of his redeemed, is come. Isa. lxiii, 4. To the commencement of this solemn work, that period which ended in 1844 introduced us. Sixteen years have since elapsed. The thoughtful reader can for himself judge whether this work will not shortly be accomplished. We are taught that the end of all things is near,

2. From the course of empire as marked out in the prophetic word. From the time of Daniel, onward, the rise and fall of earthly kingdoms was shown to the end of time. They were four in number: Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome. These were to be succeeded by a fifth universal and everlasting kingdom, the kingdom of God, to be possessed by the saints of the Most High forever and ever. The outline of this world's history is three times repeated in this manner in the book of Daniel; and all the events in these chains of prophecy, with all their varying particulars, except the setting up of the fifth and everlasting kingdom of God, are now in the past. No person of even moderate intellect will deny this. So that, as far as these lines of prophecy are concerned, the setting up of the kingdom of God is the next event before us.

Supplementary to the predictions of Daniel, are several chains of prophecy in the book of Revelation, furnishing additional particulars, and leading us to the same result. We are taught that the end of all things is at hand,

3. By the signs given to mark its approach. These may be divided into four distinct classes: 1st. In the literary world. 2d. In the political world. 3d. In the natural world; and 4th. In the moral world. Let us look a moment at these in order:

1st. Says Prof. G. R. Graves, "It is one of the pleasing signs of the times that the prophetic declaration of Dan. xii, 4, is fulfilling before our eyes." He then introduces Michaelis' translation of that passage as follows: "But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words and seal the book, even unto the time of the end, when many shall give their sedulous attention to the understanding of these things, and knowledge shall be increased." In whatever way we understand this prediction of Daniel, that in the time of the end knowledge shall be increased, whether we understand it as an increase of knowledge in the prophetic word, or of new discoveries and attainments of science, it is most completely and strikingly fulfilled before us. In this respect there never was an age of the world equal to the present; and the reader has but to see held up side by side, this declaration of the prophet and the scientific attainments of the present age, to behold the word of the Lord fulfilled in all its force. Under this head we may rank the special proclamation of the gospel of the kingdom brought to view in Rev. xiv, 6-12,—the messages of three angels, symbolizing classes of religious teachers, following each other in consecutive order, to call out a people to meet the Son of man on the great white cloud. These messages began to be fulfilled with the proclamation of the advent, a little more than 20 years ago. Two of these are already in the past. We have witnessed their fulfillment. The third and last is now going forth. The next event in this chain of prophecy is one like the Son of man on a great white cloud, symbolizing the coming of the Saviour in the clouds of heaven. Would it be possible for Inspiration to give us more impressive instruction of the shortness of time and the nearness of the coming of Christ?

2d. Signs in the political world. These were predicted by our Saviour as recorded by Matthew in chap. xxiv, and its parallels. Its principal features were to be an unexampled complication of affairs among the nations of the earth, causing in them anger, distress and perplexity. Here again comment is scarcely necessary. Those who have eyes to read the leading news of almost every paper in the land, or ears to hear the remarks upon topics which are just now in all men's mouths, know that such is the present state of the world in an unprecedented degree. The affairs of earth are hopelessly complicated; and every attempt at adjustment only involves them in more perplexity still. Extended exposition would detract from the force of the fulfillment. We only ask the worldly man, or the professor who yet sees no occasion to believe that the Lord is near at hand, to look at the prophecy and look at the present state of the nations, and then say if one is not the exact counterpart of the other.

3d. Signs in the natural world. It was predicted by the prophet Joel that the sun should be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before the great and notable day of the Lord come. Chap. ii, 30, 31. Our Saviour in Matt. xxiv and other places, adds the falling of the stars to the catalogue, and tells when these signs were to take place. Authentic histories and living witnesses afford us abundant proof on this point. In the dark day and night of 1780, and the falling stars of 1833, these predictions were minutely and magnificently fulfilled. Connected with these events in such a manner as to leave no room for the intervening of many years, is the coming of the Son of man in power and great glory.

4th. Signs in the moral world. A general declension of piety, a lack of the vital power of godliness, the abounding of iniquity, increasing numbers, and increasing wickedness, of evil men and seducers, are all held forth in the Bible as characteristics of the last days. "This know also," says Paul in 2 Tim. iii, 1, "that in the last days perilous times shall come." And then follows a description, in a black catalogue of eighteen sins, of people in the last days. Of the world?

No: of those who have a form of godliness but deny the power. Peter says, Knowing this first that there shall come in the last days scoffers walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning. 2 Pet. iii, 3, 4. Reader, have you ever seen any of these scoffers? If not, just begin to talk about the coming of the Lord and you will develop them all around you. This text affords incidental proof that the doctrine of the second advent will be proclaimed in the last days; for what occasion have these scoffers to inquire, "Where is the promise of his coming?" if there is nothing said about his coming, and none are believing that he is about to come? Jude also speaks of mockers in the last days walking after their own ungodly lusts. Verse 18. "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse." 2 Tim. iii, 13. And here we may properly introduce that gigantic delusion. Spiritualism, which within a few years has arisen and spread with unwonted rapidity over all the land. It is thus described in the word of God: "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils." See also 2 Pet. ii, 1.

What need we say more? What need we of further proof? The declarations of the word of God are unequivocal that the Lord will come again, and is now at the door. All the signs that could be required or asked to herald his approach have been accorded; and of all the long catalogue, there are none but such as have been already fulfilled, or are now fulfilling before our eyes. Yes, the great day of the Lord is near. It towers up as the great waymark directly before us. The crowning scene of earth's history is soon to transpire. The great day to which all other days are but conductors, is soon to come. The greatest displays of God's power and glory are soon to be revealed. Great events have transpired on earth, but the greatest is yet before us. Kingdoms have risen and crumbled; a flood has enveloped the earth in its liquid waves; fire and brimstone have been poured upon the corrupt cities of the plain; desolating armies have been the ministers of God's vengeance to punish the sins and rebellions of the people; but no scene has yet been witnessed which can compare with that great day when the heavens shall depart as a scroll when it is rolled together, and mountains and islands shall be moved out of their places, before the face of Him who cometh with the glory of the Father and all the holy angels.

Who is preparing for this event? Who are boldly and joyfully looking forward to the great day? Behold the sad state of the world. They are lulled in the arms of a strong delusion and think they have the truth. They are drunken, though not with wine, yet think they are sober. They lie in the embrace of an unconquerable lethargy, yet think they wake. Thus are all things ready for the great day to come upon them, as the apostle says, like a thief in the night, or a snare upon the unsuspecting game. But what says the apostle to us who see the day approaching? "Therefore let us not sleep as do others; but let us watch and be sober." 1 Thess. v, 6. And again he says that "knowing the time, it is now high time to awake out of sleep; for now is our salvation nearer than when we [first] believed." Rom. xiii, 11. May it be the lot of both writer and readers to share in this great salvation, when the longed-for day arrives, which brings the Lord of life and glory to his waiting people.

MINNESOTA CONFERENCE.

BRO. SMITH: It seems to be my duty to give you a brief report of the Conference held at Pleasant Grove, Olmstead Co., Minn., Feb. 2 and 3, 1861. At an early hour we found the house of worship quite well filled with brethren and sisters from different parts of our new State, many of them entire strangers to each other. Two came one hundred miles, walking over thirty miles of the distance.

In the commencement of our meeting the sweet Spirit of the Lord rested down upon us in such a manner that it was quite evident we were of one heart and mind, although strangers to each other. We were some disappointed in not meeting Bro. J. N. Andrews at this ways: from the arrows of God's conviction on the one hand, and by the Devil's holding his thumb on the organ of fear on the other. If those who suffer in this way would learn wisdom by their experience, they might avoid this cross-fire, and feast on the milk and honey of the sanctuary with their brethren.

Christian believers are often compared to soldiers, but camp life is not always pleasant to the military man; neither is it to us who are tenting out till we go to a city that hath foundations. It is not always a privilege for the soldier to march out on the field of battle and confront a mortal foe; nor is it a privilege for the Christian warrior to combat with the prince and power of the air. The man of war springs at the blast of the bugle, and the man of God must move at the watch-word of the Spirit.

Let us all remember that we are God's witnesses, and ever be ready to testify of his daily and weekly mercies. G. W. A.

"FLEE FROM IDOLATRY."

DURING the lukewarm state of the remnant, when their love has waxed cold, they have been in a right condition to be captivated with the numerous idols of the last days. Probably but few are entirely free from every species of idolatry. Any person that will take the trouble to compare Isa. i, and ii, with Rev. xviii, will see that when the great day of the Lord is introduced, "the land is full of idols," and "they please themselves," and "just after the abundance of her (Babylon's) delicacies."

Idolatry does not alone consist in literally bowing down to an image, but Webster says an idol is "anything upon which we set our affections inordinately," and, idolatry is "excessive attachment or veneration for an object." An idolater is "a great admirer" (of the creature). If we cultivate an attachment for any object, animate or inanimate, above, or equal to, our love to God, we are idolaters. "Thou shalt have no other gods before me" (or in my sight), is the first commandment.

When the ten tribes were in captivity, their idolatry consisted in having several objects of adoration. "They feared the Lord, and served their own gods." 2 Kings xvii, 33.

Some make a god of their appetite. Phil. iii, 19. "Covetousness is idolatry." Col. iii, 5. A longing desire for any article of food or dress which is either useless or hurtful, is, therefore, idolatry. If we love or admire any thing above God, or esteem any thing so dear that we could not freely give it up for his sake, we have certainly set up another god before the only true object of our supreme affections.

How is it, dear brethren and sisters, about tobacco, tea, coffee, hoops, jewelry, &c., &c.? Are you willing to give up these idols, and give your time and whole heart's adoration to the one living and true God? He will accept of nothing but the whole heart; we can not come to God with divided affections.

But I hear a brother say, I am not willing to give up tobacco. What, not for God's sake, for the truth's sake, nor yet for the regard you have for your brethren and sisters? Paul would give up an essential article of food, and eat no more as long as he lived, for charity's sake. 1 Cor. viii, 13.

When we press the testimony in regard to the tobacco idol, the lover of tobacco asks to be let alone, and complains that we have not charity. But charity does not require that we let a man alone in his sins, but that we faithfully warn him. Enough has been said on the tobacco question, it would seem, to satisfy all except the most stubborn that tobacco should be given up. We entreat you then most affectionately and earnestly to give it up at once for your soul's sake. Let also the ear-rings, finger-rings, and hoops, be put away at once and forever from the ranks of God's people. There is no excuse. The Scriptures are too plain to be misunderstood. We must live up to our discipline, the Bible. Those who will not abide by the wholesome rules of that book, ought not to desire or to expect a place among the Seventh-day Adventists.

There is another species of idolatry that is very general at the present day, namely, the inordinate love of children. Many worship their children. By making pets of their offspring, they destroy them and ruin their own souls. But some fond parent will say, Does Bro. Cornell want us to hate our children? No, my dear brother or sister, neither does the Lord want you to hate them; but many of you do by over indulgence hate your children. "For whom the Lord loveth he correcteth; even as a father the son in whom he delighteth." Prov. iii, 12. "He that spareth his rod hateth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes." Prov. xiii, 24.

The true principle is that genuine love should lead to faithfulness; not to excessively punish in anger, but to be decided and uniform, and correct with discretion. If a parent has such inordinate and unnatural love for the child that he or she cannot endure to faithfully correct and "train up the child," the child has become dearer than the command of God; and such parents are in the fullest sense of the word, idolaters. When I see parents laugh at little foolish tricks and witty speeches of their children, and thus flatter their vanity, and nourish pride in their hearts, I think, O foolish parents, why will you thus destroy the dear ones entrusted to your care? If a child does that which is right, noble, and generous, and the parent in a sober manner praise the child for it, it might serve to encourage in the right way. But when their follies and little sins are winked at, seeds are being sown which may, and probably will, ruin them.

But there is still another species of idolatry prevalent at this time, which is the worst of all. It is that of self-worship. If by looking in the glass they find this god is a little fairer than some other one, they begin to admire, and admire, until they are perfectly captivated with adorable self. Then how soon they will (after the manner of heathens and barbarians) begin to decorate the object of their worship. This god is very jealous of rivals in dress, and so to appease his anger, or to please him, they watch with all diligence for new fashions, that they may replenish him "from the east."

How often do we see mothers teaching this worship to their children. They will dress up the little ones like poppets, and then praise them to their face until they are perfectly inflated with pride. O parents, beware how you train your children, lest you be found fitting them up for the plagues. If we would "flee from idolatry," let us shun the very appearance of it, exercising all diligence to avoid it in all things. "Little children, KEEP YOURSELVES FROM IDOLS." 1 John v, 21. M. E. CORNELL.

MEETINGS IN WISCONSIN.

DEAR BRO. WHITE: According to appointment I met with the church at Lodi and Hundred Mile Grove, and although we had a severe snow-storm, a goodly number of brethren and sisters were present to hear the word. The gifts of the Spirit, and more perfect order in the church, were the burden of the message that we had for the people; and truly it was a heart-searching time; such as I have never seen among the remnant before. When we called on those who had forsaken all their idols, and were determined by the assisting grace of God to keep all his commandments and the testimonies of Jesus, twenty-four arose, while a few stood back. Some of them, however, said they would try to get ready and go with us. The twenty-four then signed their names to the covenant, after which they elected a clerk, and a treasurer for S. B. Then the subject of holding quarterly meetings came up, and after some consideration the church thought best to have regular quarterly meetings, the first of which was held Dec. 7 and 8, 1861; and at every quarterly meeting they will hold one business meeting. At the quarterly meetings they expect to attend to the Lord's supper.

Last Sabbath and first-day I met the church at Marquette, and after laboring with them as I did at Lodi, twenty-one united together in church covenant, choosing a clerk and treasurer. Their first quarterly meeting was held Dec. 14 and 15, 1861. Quite a number stood back at this meeting, some of whom we have hope that the Lord will open their eyes, that they may see more clearly the high and holy way to mount Zion, and come and go along with God's remnant people.

O, how true it is that God is cutting his work short in righteousness. I rejoice to think the time is just before us when we shall discern between him that serv-eth God, and him that serveth him not. But that is when we all shall have returned to the Lord. See Mal. iii, 18.

EVENTS OF THE SIXTH SEAL.

THE sixth seal was opened in 1775. All students of prophecy admit that we are living in a solemn time. Events of the most grand and thrilling importance are transpiring daily within our own observation. Signs as precursors of the day of the Lord, are every where looming up before us. To these the faithful saint can look as to so many witnesses, unitedly testifying that the last day is near, that the end of all things is at hand. And seeing them, he can lift up his head and rejoice in anticipation of the great blessings just before him, which he will receive when his Lord shall come. The way is truly plain, the light is clear, and the testimony sure. We can know that the time is near, that the day is at hand. In the book of Revelation the Christian dispensation is divided into seven different periods. These are represented by seven churches, seven seals, and seven trumpets. We call especial attention to the sixth seal, it being under this that the signs are manifested and the great day of wrath appears. "And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and lo, there was a great earthquake, and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood." Rev. vi, 12. Three important events mark very clearly the date of this seal.

1. The great earthquake.
2. The darkening of the sun.
3. The darkening of the moon.

These events must appear in the order stated. An earthquake after the darkening of the sun and moon will not answer the specifications of the prophecy. Neither will any darkening of the sun and moon before the occurrence of the earthquake fulfill the prophecy. In order therefore that we arrive at the true date of this seal, we must learn definitely when this great earthquake occurred, for that is the great event designating the time when the seal was opened.

1. The great earthquake. When did it occur?

1st. It could not have occurred during the great Papal persecution against the saints. When the fifth seal was opened, those who had been slain under the fourth seal were seen, and told that they should rest for a little season until their fellow-servants and their brethren should be killed as they were. Verse 11. This great tribulation was gradually slackened from A. D. 1700 till we come down to the latter half of the eighteenth century. We have no record of any general persecution against the saints by the pope since that time.

2d. The great earthquake occurred Nov. 1, 1775. "Lisbon was destroyed by the most terrible earthquake that has ever occurred. Sixty thousand persons perished in six minutes. The sea first retired, then rolled in rising fifty feet above its usual bed. The largest mountain in Portugal rocked and split asunder, and sent forth flames and clouds of dust. The shock was felt nearly all over Europe, in the north part of Africa, in the Atlantic, and even in the West Indies. A vast wave swept over the coast of Spain, and in some places sixty feet in height. Near Morocco the earth swallowed up about ten thousand persons with their herds, and then closed over them." Cyclopaedia Hist. p. 639.

This was the greatest earthquake known to historians. It occurred at the right time—soon after the tribulation of the 1260 years, but in the years, as they extended to 1798. We have now located beyond doubt the beginning of the sixth seal. It began in A. D. 1775. We may from that date forward begin to look for those signs to appear which precede and point to the coming of the Lord.

2. The darkening of the sun. This is the second and next event that marks the time when the sixth seal was opened. We understand this to be an unnatural darkness, a darkness caused directly by God himself, as an unmistakable sign of the approaching dawn of the last day. When did this event occur?

1st. It must occur before the 1260 years run out. "In those days after that tribulation the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light." Mark xiii, 24. This testimony shows very clearly that this sign should appear within the 1260 years. Now as the 1260 years ran out in A. D. 1798, this sign must appear prior to that date.

2d. It is the first sign following the great earthquake, and as that occurred in A. D. 1775, the sun must be darkened this side of that date.

3d. Therefore we are now shut up to this conclusion, that this sign must occur between 1775 and 1798. Here therefore, is the time in which it must appear. Did it appear in that time? If so, in what year? It did appear in that time, and in the year 1780. We refer to the testimony of many living witnesses. We will also give one historical testimony out of many that we might give:

"In the dark day of May 19, 1780, the heavens were covered with a dense cloud for three or four hours. During this time the clouds were tinged with a yellowish or faint red for hours, for which no satisfactory cause has been assigned." Noah Webster, LL. D., New Haven Daily Herald.

We give this testimony more for the purpose of proving the nature than the reality of the event. No man of literature will call in question the ability of this witness to decide a case of this kind. This sign makes its appearance at the right time and in the right manner, and is therefore a fulfillment of the prophecy.

3. The darkening of the moon. This is the next sign following in consecutive order, and occurred on the night of the 19th of May, 1780, the night following the dark day. The points above which locate the time when the sun was darkened will also apply here, and prove the time for the moon to cease to shine to be the same. Our Saviour has carefully pointed out these signs in other places. Matt. xxiv, 29.

4. The next sign spoken of in this prophecy is the falling of the stars. "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind." Verse 13. This wonderful sign appeared Nov. 13, 1833. And what an awe-inspiring sight to those who witnessed it! They witnessed the greatest display of celestial fireworks that ever occurred. They saw the heavens rain fire. How highly favored were they! The wise men who saw one star point to the first advent were truly favored by heaven. Matt. ii, 7, 10. But pre-eminently honored were they who saw millions and millions of bright and shining stars point to the second advent.

5. The parable of Matt. xxiv, 32. "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree. When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh." This is a natural and very apt illustration. When we walk forth into the grove in early spring, and behold the trees budding and putting forth leaves and blossoms, we know that the summer is coming—is at hand. But suppose on our return we meet a man who says, Well, sirs, don't you think we are going to have a long time of cold weather? we answer, Why, no, my dear sir, the warm season is at hand; for see these buds and blossoms. O, says he, I don't see any difference between the trees now and the trees in the dead of winter; they all look alike to me. What would you think of such a man, reader? I should consider him a blind man.

So likewise when we see the foregoing signs, we may as certainly know that the end is nigh, even at the doors. Verse 33. The man who does not see it must be blind: is either in nature's darkness, or bound with the heavy chains of unbelief.

6. The next event brought to light in the prophecy before us is the "great day." "And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together, and every island and mountain were moved out of their places. And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens, and in the rocks of the mountains; and said unto the mountains, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" Verses 14, 17. Grand and sublime are the scenes here depicted! Awful indeed is the event here spoken of. And O, what an important question here follows: Who shall be able to stand? We answer, 1st. It will not be the great men of earth. Kings with their wicked counselors will perish with all their greatness. The rich, proud, and haughty, will all be destroyed. God will receive no excuse from the willful sinner. 2d. Those who love God and do his will shall be able to stand. "Wherefore the rather, brethren, give all heed to make your calling and election sure; for if ye do these things ye shall never fall." 2 Pet. i, 10. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." Rev. xxii, 14. These are blessed promises, and surely belong to the remnant who keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Chap. xiv, 12.

That awful day will soon appear. The storm is already gathering. The dark and heavy clouds appear in the distance. The heavy rolling of the thunders may be distinctly heard, and the red flashes of glaring lightning play furiously upon the angry heavens. Sinners begin to tremble, and men's hearts to fail them for fear of the things coming upon the earth. The sea and the waves roar, while distress and fearful perplexity characterize the angry nations. But in this time the saint looks up, and by faith looks beyond the distress, fear, and perplexity that surround him, to the happy morn that is beginning to dawn, when he will see his Lord coming in great power and glory, when he will be redeemed from all that is mortal, and delivered into the bright joys of eternal life in the kingdom of God. Yea, while here, he groans and prays for the time to hasten when he will part from the wicked, and the persecutors of God's dear children, and meet with the immortal saints on the sunny shores of perpetual joy. There with all the saints he hopes to dwell amid the resplendent and unfading beauties of the world to come. May the Lord help us to be faithful and diligent. Mercy yet lingers, and Jesus yet intercedes. But soon he will leave the sanctuary, and mercy's sweet voice will be heard no more in behalf of the sinner forever. While, therefore, there is time and opportunity, let us prepare to stand in the great day of his wrath.

CONFESSION.

It is my duty to make confession on several points; and I do it cheerfully, and with sincerity of heart. I am satisfied that I have not exerted that direct influence in behalf of the testimony of the Spirit of God, given through vision to sister White, that I ought to have done. I deeply regret that I have been slow to act in a matter of so great importance. I now see that I have come far short of my duty in this matter, and that I have thus grieved the Holy Spirit. May God forgive me. It is the purpose of my heart, not merely to believe the testimony of the visions, but to impress the importance of their testimony upon others.

I see also that I have been remiss in bearing a pointed testimony against sin, and reproving the wrongs that have come under my observation, with the faithfulness that was requisite on my part. In other words, I have failed to declare with faithfulness the whole counsel of God. Deeply do I lament my fault in this thing. Yet such is my natural infirmity that I can only hope to be an overcomer through the special assistance of divine grace. Brethren pray for me.

NOTE TO SISTER RICE.

DEAR SISTER RICE: Your letter in the Review, Vol. xix, No. 2, reminds us that we should speak often to each other, and as far as possible cheer the fainting mind. We remember the days when we were with you in the M. E. Church in St. Lawrence County, N. Y., and how the principles of reform brought us out of that church. We remember too, that God thrust us out again as he did Israel out of Egypt, when he brought us to keep his holy Sabbath; and we never shall forget the interview we had with you at your present home in Western N. Y. We may never meet again on this earth while it is under the curse, but may we meet on the earth made new.

We are trying, though in weakness, to do something for the Lord. After returning this fall from Indiana we thought further efforts should be made in our own school district. We therefore invited Bro. Cornell to come and labor with us. The meetings have been very interesting. Since he left we have had meetings twice in the week, and the house was well filled. The district are willing we should use the house every Sabbath; quite a number are obeying the truth.

In much love.

MIRACULOUS POWERS.

This work will be delayed until Bro. White returns from his Northern tour.

Some have misunderstood my call for extracts. I do not design to publish personal experiences of our own people, unless it should be some rare instance with which I am acquainted. The object is to show from the books of those who now oppose spiritual gifts, that such power still exists, themselves being judges.

FAITH WITHOUT WORKS IS DEAD.

FAITH is a dependence on the veracity of another. This trust is called faith, because it relies upon the truth of a promise. Faith, in the propriety of expression, is an assent on account of the veracity of the speaker. God has spoken unto us by his servants, and says, "Even so, faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." James ii, 17. Again, "Not of works, lest any man should boast." Eph. ii, 9.

I notice in the word of God that faith and works belong together; as James has said, Show me your faith without your works, and I will show you my faith by my works. All of the ancient worthies pleased God through faith; their works corresponded with their faith. I find by an examination of the word of God that his people have accomplished all that has been done through faith; and what wonders have been accomplished through his people.

There is a work for the people of God in our day. What did the blessed Saviour say unto us before he went away? He says, The works that I do, ye shall do; and greater works than these shall ye do, because I go to my Father. We find also that when he commissioned his disciples, as we read in Luke ix, 1, then he called his twelve disciples together, and gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diseases. And he sent them to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick. And they departed and went through the towns preaching the gospel and healing every where. Has there been any thing taken from this commission since it was given? if not, then it is the same now.

Then let us contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints; and when we ask our heavenly Father for the things that we need, let us ask in faith, believing; for without faith it is impossible to please God. O may we all be wise enough to ask for nothing unless we expect to receive it; and like Jacob of old, wrestle until the break of day, or until we receive the blessing. God is pleased when he beholds his children thus holding on to his promises by faith.

Are we sick? let us use the remedies prescribed in his word, with faith, and we shall be healed. Are we in perils on the sea or on the land? let us exercise faith, God will deliver. Are we surrounded with temptation? let us believe that God will deliver; he will, if we are loving him and keeping all of his commandments blameless.

My prayer is, O Lord, help thy people to come up to the high calling of God which is in Christ Jesus; and throw off every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us, that we may run the race set before us.

THOUGHTS ON THE REVELATION.

CHAPTER VI.

The Seals.

THE symbols under the first four seals, at least, show the spirit of the periods covered by them.

Verses 1, 2. And I saw when the Lamb opened one of the seals, and I heard, as it were the noise of thunder, one of the four beasts, saying, Come and see. And I saw, and behold, a white horse: and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him: and he went forth conquering, and to conquer.

The white horse denotes the purity of faith, and consequently of life, of the first ministers, and followers of Jesus Christ. This seal probably covers the period of the Ephesus church of chap. ii, 1-7. The conquests of the gospel during that period are here represented.

Verses 3, 4. And when he had opened the second seal, I heard the second beast say, Come and see. And there went out another horse that was red; and power was given to him that sat thereon to take peace from the earth, and that they should kill one another: and there was given unto him a great sword.

The red horse denotes blood and carnage, and has reference to those times of persecution of the followers of Jesus Christ, covering much of the period called the ten persecutions, the same as the Smyrna church of chap. ii, 8-11.

Verses 5, 6. And when he had opened the third seal, I heard the third beast say, Come and see. And I beheld, and lo, a black horse; and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand. And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say, A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny; and see thou hurt not the oil and the wine.

The black horse denotes error and darkness, the opposite of that symbolized by the white horse. The events under this seal cover the period of the Pergamos church, chap. ii, 12-17, from Constantine, A. D. 313, to the unlimited rule of the Papacy, A. D. 538. On this seal Wm. Miller, Lectures, p. 181, remarks as follows:

"When the church became connected with worldly power and wisdom, she lost her purity of doctrine and practice, and adopted in her creed maxims and principles congenial with the natural heart, and forms and ceremonies for show and parade, rather than the humbling and cross-bearing life of the followers of Jesus. The balances denoted that religion and civil power would be united in the person who would administer the executive power in the government, and that he would claim the judicial authority both in church and state. This was true among the Roman emperors, from the days of Constantine until the reign of Justinian, when he gave the same judicial power to the bishop of Rome. The measures of wheat and barley for a penny denote that the members of the church would be eagerly engaged after worldly goods, and the love of money would be the prevailing spirit of the times, for they would dispose of anything for money. The oil and wine denote the graces of the Spirit, faith and love, and there was great danger of hurting these, under the influence of so much worldly spirit. And it is well attested by all historians that the prosperity of the church in this age produced the corruptions which finally terminated in the falling away, and setting up the anti-Christian abominations."

Verses 7, 8. And when he had opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth beast say, Come and see. And I looked, and behold, a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and hell followed with him. And power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth.

The rider upon the pale horse is named Death. Hell, the grave, followed with him. The symbols under this seal denote great persecution, and martyrdom of the church. The period of this seal cannot be mistaken. It must have been during the unlimited, unrebuked, unrestrained, persecuting rule of the Papacy, from about A. D. 538, to the time when the reformers commenced their work of exposing the corruptions of the Papal system.

Verses 9-11. And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held: and they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled.

It seems proper that a period of time should be given to the events under the fifth seal, the same as the other six, which time, it may appear evident from the following remarks, was from the rise of the reformation to near the time when civil power was taken from the Papacy.

1. It is evident that these souls were not in heaven when John had this vision, from the fact that they had not been born. A. Barnes makes the following remarks in reference to this subject:

"We are not to suppose that this literally occurred, and that John actually saw the souls of the martyrs beneath the altars—for the whole representation is symbolical; nor are we to suppose that the injured and the wronged in heaven actually pray for vengeance on those who wronged them, or that the redeemed in heaven will continue to pray with reference to things on the earth; but it may be fairly inferred from this that there will be as real a remembrance of the wrongs of the persecuted, the injured and the oppressed, as if such prayer were offered there; and that the oppressor has as much to dread from the divine vengeance as if those whom he has injured should cry in heaven to the God who hears prayer, and who takes vengeance. The wrongs done to the children of God, to the orphan, the widow, the down-trodden, to the slave and the outcast, will be as certainly remembered in heaven as if they who are wronged should plead for vengeance there, for every act of injustice and oppression goes to heaven and pleads for vengeance. Every persecutor should dread the death of the persecuted as if he went to heaven to plead against him; every cruel master should dread the death of his slave that is crushed by wrongs; every seducer should dread the death and the cries of his victim; every one who does wrong in any way should remember that the sufferings of the injured cry to heaven with a martyr's pleadings, saying, 'How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood?'"

2. The scenes which John was viewing were upon the earth, hence, in the absence of proof that any other altar is meant, it seems a necessary conclusion that John saw the place of slaughter of the church of God by Papal Rome, where the earth has drunk up the blood of martyrs slain, under the figure of an altar of sacrifice.

3. These slain are represented as crying to God to have their blood avenged on them that dwell on the earth, the same as the voice of Abel's blood from the ground, Gen. iv, 9, 10; or the cry of the stone from the wall, and the answer of the beam out of the timber, Hab. ii, 11; or the cry of the hire of the laborer, James v, 4. If it be said that these souls must be in conscious being in heaven in order to cry, then we reply, that Abel's blood, the stone and the beam, and money, are also conscious, as they are all represented as crying. But, really, if these souls are in heaven in the participation of fullness of joy, and pleasures forevermore, why are they represented as crying for vengeance on those who cut short their mortal life with all its woes, and hastened them to the enjoyment of the perfect bliss of heaven?

4. The Scriptures sometimes attribute life, action, intelligence, and personality, to inanimate objects to show how God regards those connected with those objects, hence the unconscious slain are represented as crying from beneath the altar of Papal sacrifice. Justice, long trampled in the dust, now cries for judgment and vengeance on the Papacy which was spilling the blood of the church of Jesus Christ. Luther and his associates were imbued with the spirit of this cry which went up from the earth that had drunk the blood of millions of the martyrs of Jesus slain, and they exposed the corruptions of the Papacy, which trembles before the reformers, and in A. D. 1798 was stripped of its civil authority. Thus the blood of the martyrs was avenged on those that dwelt on the earth. This has no reference to the final judgment and punishment of the wicked; but refers to the change in the condition of the Papacy. "He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity; he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword." Chap. xiii, 10.

5. White robes were given to every one of them. They had been denounced by the Papacy as vile heretics, and executed as such, and thus their character had been robed in darkness. But the Reformation exposed the crimes of the Papacy, turned the scale, vindicated the cause of the holy martyrs of Jesus, and clothed them with white robes. Hence, the sermons, the prayers, and songs of praise of the Christian church, have held these millions of the slain for Jesus' name, forth to the world in spotless purity.

6. They were to rest yet a little season, until their fellow-servants and brethren should be killed as they had been. We stated that the opening of this seal commenced when the reformers began to expose the Papacy, and vindicate the cause of the martyrs. But the cry of justice was not answered at once. Time must be given to bring about these grand events. Their cause must rest yet for a little season. For notwithstanding the influence of the Reformation, the Papacy clothed with authority to punish heretics, did put to death more of the followers of Jesus. This done, the little season, or the period of the fifth seal, closed.

Verses 12-17. And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bond man, and every free man, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand.

The events of the first five seals have been described in a style highly figurative; but with the sixth seal there seems to be a complete change to the narration of literal facts. The events under this seal are,

1. A great earthquake, which, probably, was the great earthquake at Lisbon, in 1755, in which 20,000 persons were killed. The Encyclopedia Americana states: "It extended from Greenland to Africa and America."

2. The sun became black as sackcloth of hair, which was the same as the darkening of the sun, Matt. xxiv, and was fulfilled in the wonderful dark day of May 19, 1780. See Exposition of Matt. Twenty-four, advertised in the Review and Herald.

3. The moon became as blood. The night following the dark day, the moon, when visible at all, looked like blood.

4. The stars of heaven fell unto the earth, which is the same as the falling stars of Matt. xxiv, and had a wonderful fulfillment Nov. 13, 1833, as described by John, of which thousands now living were eye-witnesses.

5. The heavens will depart as a scroll when it is rolled together. This is in the future, to be fulfilled when the voice of God shakes not only the earth, but also the atmospheric heavens. Heb. xii, 22-27; Joel iii, 16; Jer. xxv, 30, 31; Rev. xvi, 17.

6. Mountains and islands will be moved out of their places. The voice of God that shakes the heavens will also shake the earth. Mountains will be thrown down, and islands sunk. The earth's surface will be broken up to prepare the way for

7. All classes of the lost to hide in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains from the burning glory then being manifested of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. They have witnessed the shaking of the earth, the casting out of the rocks of the mountains; all hope of mercy is gone, and they desire and pray that some rock or mountain may cover them from the awful glory of God and the Lamb.

JAMES WHITE, EDITOR.

The Opening of the Sixth Seal.

THE sixth seal is the one which embraces in the number of its momentous events, the coming of the Son of man, and the end of this present world. Its opening was to be marked by the occurrence of a mighty earthquake. Rev. vi, 12. This event occurred on the first of November, 1755, and is known as the great earthquake of Lisbon. It is a significant fact that all the great events given as signs and precursors of the end of all things, have been instinctively associated, in the minds of the people at the time of their occurrence, with the great day of which they were the forerunners. It was so with the falling of the stars in 1833; it was so with the dark day and night of 1780; it was also so with the great earthquake of 1755. The following particulars concerning an event which holds so prominent a place in both prophecy and history will be of interest to all.

U. S.

"On the 1st of November, 1755, a few minutes before 10 A. M., the inhabitants of Lisbon were alarmed by several violent vibrations of the ground, which then rose and fell several times with such force that hundreds of houses came toppling into the streets, crushing thousands of people. At the same time the air grew pitchy dark from the clouds of dust that rose from the crumbling edifices. Many persons ran down to the river-side, in the hope of escaping to the shipping; but the water suddenly rose some yards perpendicularly, and swept away everything before it. The quay, with nearly two hundred beings standing on it, all at once disappeared. Large ships, which were lying high and dry, floated off, and were dashed against each other, or carried down the river. In every direction the surface of the water was overspread with boats, timber, casks, household furniture, and corpses. The scene on land was yet more horrifying. Churches, government buildings, and private houses, were all involved in the same ruin. Many thousands of trembling fugitives had collected in the great square, when it was discovered that flames were spreading in every quarter. Taking advantage of the universal panic and confusion, a band of miscreants had fired the city. Nothing could be done to stay the progress of the flames, and for eight days they raged unchecked. Whatever the earthquake had spared fell a prey to this new calamity. 'It is not to be expressed by human tongue,' writes an eye-witness, 'how dreadful and how awful it was to enter the city after the fire was abated; and looking upward one was struck with horror at beholding dead bodies, by six or seven in a heap, crushed to death, half buried and half burnt; and if one went through the broad places or squares, nothing to be met with but people bewailing their misfortunes, wringing their hands, and crying, "The world is at an end." If you go out of the city, you behold nothing but barracks, or tents made with canvass, or ship's sails, where the poor inhabitants lie.'

"Another eye-witness is still more graphic. 'The terror of the people was beyond description: nobody wept—it was beyond tears—they ran hither and thither, delirious with horror and astonishment, beating their faces and breasts, crying miser cordia, the world's at an end; mothers forgot their children, and ran about loaded with crucified images. Unfortunately, many ran to the churches for protection; but in vain was the sacrament exposed; in vain did the poor creatures embrace the altars; images, priests, and people, were buried in one common ruin. . . . The prospect of the city was deplorable. As you passed along the streets, you saw shops of goods with the shopkeepers buried with them, some alive crying out from under the ruins, others half buried, others with broken limbs, in vain begging for help; they were passed by crowds without the least notice or sense of humanity. The people lay that night in the field, which equalled, if possible, the horrors of the day; the city all in flames; and if you happened to forget yourself with sleep, you were awakened by the tremblings of the earth and the howlings of the people. Yet the moon shone, and the stars, with unusual brightness. Long-wished-for day at last appeared, and the sun rose with great splendor on the desolated city in the morning. Some of the boldest, whose houses were not burnt, ventured home for clothes, the want of which they had severely felt in the night, and a blanket was now become of more value than a suit of silk.' Wonders of the World, pp. 200, 201.

The following testimony shows the extent of this terrible visitation to have been wider than that of any similar one on record:

"The earthquake happened on November 1, 1755, and its sphere of action embraced many cities and States. St. Ubes was totally destroyed. At Cadiz the sea broke down the outer wall, flooded the town, and drowned some hundreds of persons. The Cathedral of Seville was seriously damaged, several houses overthrown, and many persons injured. The shock was felt, indeed, throughout the whole of Spain, except in Catalonia, and also in Germany. In many parts of Great Britain the water in lakes and ponds was violently upheaved, and ebbcd and flowed over the banks. A solemn fast was consequently commanded to be observed on the 6th of February next ensuing, in the hope to avert, by prayer and penitence, a similar calamity from this country. A ship at sea, 100 leagues to the westward of Lisbon, had her cabin windows shattered to fragments, and many vessels in deep water quivered as if they had struck against a rock. In Morocco the effects of the shock were most disastrous. In Mequinez two-thirds of the houses were destroyed, and above three hundred in Fez. A caravan of two hundred persons going along the coast from Sallee to Morocco were overwhelmed by the sea, and a still more numerous caravan was swept away by the sudden rise of the inland rivers. In France and Holland earthquakes were repeatedly felt during the entire month of November, and occasionally even in December." Wonders of the World, p. 299.

Stand Still.

It is not in the providence of God to do anything for his people that they can do themselves; but when they have done all that they can do, they should then cry unto the Lord in their extremity, and patiently wait his time, stand still, cease to trouble themselves about that which they cannot help, or about that which they cannot remove by their own actions or exertions. Their extremity becomes God's opportunity; and if for their good, he will work for them.

Christian travelers in their journey through this world frequently find themselves in strait places, and at times their way appears to be entirely hedged up. When this occurs, instead of turning about or seeking some by-way to lead them around the difficulty, they should heed the injunction to stand still and wait for the Lord to open the way for them.

The children of Israel, in their flight from Egypt during their wanderings in the vicinity of the Red Sea, passed through a deep defile in the mountains till they suddenly came in full view of the Red Sea. Here their way seemed to be entirely hedged up. Before them was the Red Sea, whose white-capped waves were rolling before them, and lashing in their fury the rock-bound coast. On either side they beheld ragged and inaccessible rocks, which reared their heads almost to the clouds. There appeared no outlet, no way by which they could proceed, and the order was given to pitch their tents and await the direction of the Almighty. As they were thus silently encamped in this gloomy place, those in the rear heard behind them the rumbling of chariot-wheels and the tramp of an armed host, and soon beheld in the distance the waving of banners and the glitter of arms. They now for the first time became aware that they were pursued.

What consternation and alarm spread through that vast encampment as the news became general that Pharaoh and his host were upon them. Now mark their conduct: instead of crying to God for deliverance, they commenced upbraiding Moses for bringing them out, as they supposed, to perish in the wilderness. They said in irony, "Because there were no graves in Egypt hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?" And as is generally the case with those who are disposed to murmur and complain, they taunted him with what they had said, and what their better judgment would have dictated: "Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, saying, Let us alone that we may serve the Egyptians? For it had been better for us to serve the Egyptians than that we should die in the wilderness."

No doubt there was great commotion in that vast camp as the Egyptian host drew near. Some probably were essaying to climb the sides of the mountains, some running here and some there, while others were for going back and throwing themselves before Pharaoh and entreating his pardon. All was confusion and excitement, and that vast assembly swayed to and fro like the angry waves of the sea before them. But while all this confusion was prevailing among the people, there was one in that vast assembly whose head was clear, and whose presence of mind had not forsaken him. His trust was not in the arm of flesh, but in the living God. It was Moses, the servant of God. When in the midst of the commotion, his voice is heard above the din of confusion, "Stand still!" There is a momentary lull in that great concourse of people. Again is heard distinctly above the roar of the waves and the noise of the excited host, "Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord!" All is quiet now, and attention. Immediately follows the command of the Almighty to his servant Moses, "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward." Moses, by the command of the Lord, stretches out his rod over the sea, it is divided, and the fugitive host passed through on dry ground. Thus the extremity of the children of Israel became God's opportunity; and, as we are informed that "whatsoever was written aforetime was written for our learning," may we not reap a lesson of instruction from this portion of their experience?

We are no doubt approaching close places in our pilgrimage; and at this time, no doubt to many the way appears hedged up. Look in which direction they may, there appears no way of escape; on either hand appear impassable barriers. Before them is the difficulty; behind them is the Devil and his host. "What shall we do?" "What can we do?" are the exclamations we hear on every hand; and as they begin to be hemmed in closer and closer, like Israel of old, they commence to murmur, and complain, and to find fault with God's chosen leaders who have led them through defiles between the mountains of error on either hand, and in which in turning a point they have come suddenly upon what to them appears to be an impassable sea of difficulties. Hold! brethren. Will you not profit by the experience of the children of Israel, and cease your murmurs and your complaints? Heed the injunction, "Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord." Do not go back, nor attempt to move forward until the way opens before you, and all will be well.

This cause is in the hands of the Lord, and he will take care of it. He has not brought us out thus far to perish, neither has he withdrawn his Spirit from us, but in his own good time he will make all things plain. In all the Christian graces, "go forward;" but in matters you do not understand, and where the way is hedged up, until you get light and the way is open, "stand still."

Tattling.

A WEAK but persevering brother has heard that Bro. ——— (a bold and rather confident one) has said a pretty hard thing about him, and it troubles him terribly. He thinks and thinks about it, and dreams of it, and has felt bad about it for weeks; and finally it has magnified itself so in his weak, sickly mind, that it gives a gloomy cast to his countenance and conversation, even his form seems bent a little more than usual.

The expression of the brother who made the wound was at least useless and severe; but he meant no harm in particular, and was probably sorry he made it in a moment from the time it escaped his lips, and if Bro. Tattle who stood close by had said something to disapprove the expression at the time it was made,

THE REVIEW AND HERALD.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., THIRD-DAY, APRIL 28, 1863.

Quarterly Meeting at Oakland, Wis.

BRO. WHITE: I wish to say for the encouragement of all the brethren, that we have had one of the best quarterly meetings at Oakland, Wis., that I ever attended. The Lord gave me great liberty in presenting his truth. Disaffected ones confessed their wrongs and came back to the Father's house, while many of the children are coming to the Lord. First-day morning we met to partake of the ordinances of the Lord's house, and truly the Lord verified his words unto us, "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." John xiii, 17. Things that had threatened to disturb their peace were laid aside in obedience to 1 Pet. ii, 1, and sweet peace and harmony prevailed.

ISAAC SANBORN.

Question for Bro. Cornell.

ARE there three months in a year in which there never was, nor ever can be, a total eclipse of the sun? If so, which months are they?

I ask the above question, because in speaking of the dark day in 1780, while in N. H., you are reported to have made the statement that there are three months in the year in which there cannot be a total eclipse of the sun. And it is thought that you said, May, June, and July are the months.

An opposer laid this up, went home, found an old almanac which spoke of a total eclipse of the sun in June. This of course made business for her and her sympathizers.

She wrote you quite a smart letter, addressing you at Boston, which you probably never received.

There has been so much said about this matter, that I have thought it might be well for you to speak of the fact through the Review, if you are correct in the statement that the sun cannot be totally eclipsed for three months. We suppose you would not make the statement without good evidence of being correct. And Bro. Bourdeau thinks you made the same statement in Vt. also.

Yours truly, A. S. HUTCHINS.

Call for Help.

BRO. WHITE: A general interest has been awakened by Bro. Loughborough's few lectures in this region, and especially among those who meet with the church at Milford. Three young persons rose in meeting yesterday requesting the prayers of the church. We consequently want some of the lecturing brethren to come long enough before the general conference, to give a course of lectures, and be carried back by some one going to the conference. If any one comes by rail-road, be sure and give us timely notice to meet them at Ann Arbor station.

In behalf of the church. JOHN P. RATHBUN.

delegates attending may cast the full number of votes to which said church is entitled.

Art. VIII. Sec. 1. This Constitution may be amended at any regular meeting of the Conference by a two-third's vote of the members present, provided such amendment shall not conflict with the constitution of the General Conference.

The Mich. State Conference having appointed a committee to frame a series of rules and regulations to suggest to those building and holding meeting-houses, and to report to the General Conference, the report of said committee was called for and submitted. The report was accepted. It was then Voted, That J. N. Andrews, James White, and U. Smith, be a committee to take this matter into consideration, and at some future time to report through the Review. To this committee Brn. Byington and Waggoner were afterward added.

Voted, That this Conference issue a pamphlet containing the minutes of this Conference, together with the address on organization, issued by the Battle Creek Conference of Oct. 5 and 6, 1861; also that the minutes of this Conference be published in the Review.

Voted, That we recommend State Conferences to publish in pamphlet form the minutes of their proceedings, and distribute to their churches.

Doings of the Mich. State Conference. May 22, 1863.

THIS Conference assembled May 22, pursuant to the call of the committee in Review. Prayer by Bro. Bates. The number of delegates present duly authorized by letter were forty-nine, representing thirty-seven churches. The churches which desired to become connected with the Conference, and at this meeting were received, were the following: Newton, Charlotte, Windsor, Parkville, Bowne, Lowell, Caledonia, West Plains, Fair Plains, North Plains, Oakland, Shelby, Tyrone, Locke, Woodhull, Oneida, Orleans, Milford, Allegan, Mich., and North Liberty Ind. The aggregate membership of these churches is three hundred and fifty-seven. The yearly proceeds of systematic benevolence in the Conference amount to $4325.00

Some time was then consumed in the reading of the letters brought by the delegates to the conference, followed by the singing of the hymn "From whence doth this union arise." The ministers present belonging to the Conference were, James White, Joseph Bates, J. H. Waggoner, Jno. Byington, J. N. Loughborough, Moses Hull, M. E. Cornell and R. J. Lawrence.

Reports from the ministers were then called for, as regulated by the action of the last conference, and rendered; whereupon it was Voted, That the Conference appoint a committee of five to consider the duty of the Michigan Conference, in reference to sustaining its preachers, and report at the next session of this meeting. D. R. Palmer, Jas. Harvey, C. S. Glover, Jno. Carman and O. B. Jones, were then chosen as that committee. Adjourned to 2 o'clock P. M.

Afternoon session. Prayer by Bro. White. The committee on ministers presented the following report, namely,

That we allow Bro. White his expenses incurred in consequence of traveling, which are $140.28.

That the officers of the Monterey church shall be empowered to draw from the State fund a sufficient amount for the support of Bro. Bates and wife; and that the remaining messengers receive the sum of eight dollars per week for the time they have labored in this State, besides their traveling expenses: Provided, this sum will meet their expenses; if not, that they shall receive such an amount as will meet their expenses.

This report was then accepted and adopted.

On motion of Bro. White, it was Voted, That we appoint a committee of three to draw up rules and regulations, to suggest to our brethren who are building or holding meeting-houses, and report to the General Conference at its next session. Brn. Waggoner, Hull, and Harvey, were appointed as that committee.

Adjourned to Sunday at half-past 7 o'clock.

Met according to adjournment. Prayer by Bro. Loughborough. The following preamble and resolution was adopted:

Whereas, Sister White has for years past devoted her labors to the third angel's message, both in traveling and writing, and

Whereas, In so doing she has been obliged to entrust her domestic duties to hired help, while her expenses in this and other respects have never been provided for by the church, therefore,

Resolved, That as a slight token of our appreciation of her labors, we instruct the Executive Committee to make suitable provision for sister White's expenses incurred in consequence of her connection with this work.

The subject of State Conferences being now taken up, it was Voted, That the constitution recommended by the General Conference be read. It was read, and then Voted, That it be adopted by the Michigan State Conference.

Voted, That we change the time of our annual Conference from fall to spring, and that this take the place of our previously-appointed annual Conference to be holden in the fall.

The next business being the election of officers, the action of the Conference resulted as follows: For President, U. Smith; Secretary, E. S. Walker; Treasurer, Geo. W. Amadon; Executive Committee, Eld. John Byington and Cyrenius Smith. On motion it was then Voted, That all ministers who have not reported be requested to place a written report of each week's labor, and the entire amount of their receipts and expenditures, in the hands of the committee.

Moved, by Bro. White, that the matter of settling for ministerial labor since the last Conference be left to the financial committee that has acted since that Conference. Carried.

Moved, That the doings of this Conference be published in the Advent Review. Carried.

Moved by Bro. White that Bro. Loughborough be instructed to issue a pamphlet to be circulated in the State of Michigan, setting forth the necessary legal steps to be taken in securing meeting-house property; and that in the same pamphlet be given an abstract of the laws of Michigan in reference to wills to religious Societies, and that a copy be sent to the principal officers of each church in Michigan and Indiana.

Adjourned sine die.

WM. S. HIGLEY JR. Chairman.
U. SMITH, Secretary.

Another Call.

It will be seen by the doings of the General Conference published this week, that the committee appointed to receive testimony concerning Elder James White, are invited to extend the time to receive such testimonies for two months from date. We therefore issue this special notice, that the attention of all concerned may be again called to it, and that his defamers may bring forward their testimony or be left without excuse. Be it understood, then, by all concerned, that two months from the date of this paper are granted for further responses to the resolutions passed by the Battle Creek church, and published in Review No. 18, which resolutions we here insert again, that all interested may have distinctly before their minds the points upon which responses are solicited:

"Resolved, That we hereby earnestly request all those, far and near, who think they have any grounds of complaint against Eld. White, all who have handed to him means that he has not appropriated as directed, all who think that he has wronged the aged, the widow, and the fatherless, or that he has not in all his dealings in temporal matters manifested the strictest integrity, probity, and uprightness, to immediately report their grievances, and the grounds upon which they base them, to Uriah Smith, chairman of the committee.

"Resolved, That we also hereby invite all those who have had dealings, more or less extensive, with Eld. White since the commencement of his public labors, to testify in what light they regard his dealings, so far as their knowledge or observation goes, and send in their testimony as above directed."

The case at present stands thus: Accusations and charges received, none. Fervent and unqualified testimonials in Bro. White's favor, seventy-four. The matter might justly be closed up here, and the case decided according to these facts, as ample time and notice had been given: but that none may have even an imaginary shadow of ground to claim that haste or unfairness is used in this matter, the time is extended as above noticed. At the end of the time specified the matter will be closed up, and the committee report as instructed. In behalf of the committee.

U. SMITH, Chairman.

Cornell and Lawrence with the Michigan tent. Brn. Waggoner and Brinkerhoof with the Ohio tent. Brn. Andrews, Fuller, and Taylor with the New York tent. Brn. Loughborough and Hull to labor with the Southern Iowa tent in New England.

We recommend Elder Loughborough, who will be present at the Vermont Conference, as a suitable person with whom the Committee of that State can confer in reference to the labor of the ministers belonging to that Conference.

We would also request the friends of present truth in Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, to address Elder Loughborough immediately at Wolcott, Vt., in regard to the wants of the cause in their respective localities, that he may be better able to decide in what sections to labor.

Bro. Loughborough is a man of judgment and experience in tent labor, and financiering, for which reasons we commend him to the friends in New England as the minister in charge of this enterprise.

The Dark Day, May 19th 1780.

THE following appeared this spring in the Providence (R. I.) Journal. It is interesting as the testimony of one of the few now living witnesses of the memorable dark day.

J. N. ANDREWS.

"Our venerable friend, Capt. Martin Page, sends us the following communication, written in a clear, fine, round hand, that would do credit to a man of half his years:

I was twelve miles from Providence in the north-east part of Cumberland in the 8th year of my age driving a yoke of oxen, R. Sheldon holding the plough, splitting hills in a four-acre corn field. The lot was to be ploughed, harrowed furrowed and dressed before being planted with corn, which would make it late in May. Although late planted we had good corn.

At sunrise it came on foggy, and grew more so. At 10 A. M. it was so thick and foggy, dark red, brass colored that we could not see far. We had to leave off ploughing and go home; found the cows in the yard, geese in their pens and turkeys and fowls on their roosts. It was very thick and dark before 12 o'clock, and after that it looked frightful. I am sorry to say that I don't remember how it ended.

Perhaps some of the readers of your valuable paper would like to hear what the old man says about planting corn eighty-three years ago who is now in his ninety-first year. Make what use of this you please and accept of my sincere wish for your good health and happiness.

Daily Nearer.

Nearer home, nearer home!
However dark and lonely
The path through which we roam;
This is a journey only;
And though we oft, affrighted,
Shrink back with sigh and moan,
Our camp-fires still are lighted
"A day's march nearer home."

Nearer home, nearer home!
O, joy beyond expressing,
That over thorn and stone
Our feet are homeward pressing!
For though we leave behind us
Some buds of hope unblown,
The sunset still doth find us
"A day's march nearer home."

Nearer home, nearer home!
O, many-mansioned dwelling,
Beneath thy shining dome
No tides of grief are swelling;
And toward thy fadeless glory
With eager haste we come,
Repeating earth's brief story,
"A day's march nearer home."

Nearer home, nearer home!
Soon through its open portals
The ransomed hosts will come,
To welcome us immortals;
Then be the path before us
With wrecks or roses strown,
Each night we'll sing in chorus,
"A day's march nearer home."

Signs of the Advent.

THE substance of the following article was published some years ago. We re-publish it as very appropriate to the present time,—especially to those who have lately turned their attention to the investigation of prophecy.

One of the marks of hypocrisy in the Jews of our Lord's day, was, that in the midst of his numerous and astonishing miracles, performed in their midst and before their eyes, they came to him and asked of him a sign:—"Master, we would see a sign from thee." "O ye hypocrites," said the Saviour, "ye can discern the face of the sky; how is it that ye cannot discern the signs of this time?" How much like the present generation! In the midst of a flood of light, and some of the most astonishing wonders of the world, how perfectly blind are men to the fact, that just these signs were foretold to precede the great and terrible day of the Lord! But thanks be to God, there are some left who have faith enough in God's word to believe that when he promised signs of the second advent of the Saviour, he will be as faithful to fulfill them, as he was in the case of his first advent. There are many, however, and some of them profess themselves believers in God's word, too, yea and teachers of that word, who are ready to scoff at us when we point at the very things in real life, or as matters of authentic history, and profess to believe them a fulfillment of God's word. But we are not to be scoffed out of our faith; a more powerful instrument than ridicule will be requisite to drive us from it.

Some of the predicted signs I design to notice, and inquire if they have been fulfilled.

1. "There shall be scoffers in the last times." 2. Pet. iii, 2. This is one of the first signs laid down by Peter. "Knowing this first, that there shall come," &c. To guard the church against them, he wrote both his epistles. "This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you, in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance, that ye may be mindful of the words spoken before by the holy prophets; and the commandments of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour." He foresaw what an effort would be made to cast the prophecies into the shade, and persuade the people and the church, that the prophets gave no light on the second advent; that Daniel only predicted the overthrow of Antiochus, and, in the ninth chapter, came down to the destruction of Jerusalem; the greater prophets foretold the Babylonish captivity and return, the birth and death of Christ, together with the glory of the gospel dispensation, and occasionally alluded to some local circumstances of their own day. And so also of the minor prophets. Do we hear and witness any such effort to throw the doctrine of Christ's coming into the shade, in our own day—"Saying where is the promise of his coming?" 1 Thess. v, 3; "When they shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them." They are now saying it most emphatically. Universalists do it openly and unequivocally. Many evangelical (professedly so) ministers and Christians, like the Jews of old, are ready to say, "his blood be upon us," or, we take the responsibility to say he will not come  for a thousand years at least. This doctrine of a thousand years' peace and universal holiness before the coming of the Lord, is itself a most effectual anodyne to a sleeping church and perishing world.

2. "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness to all nations, and then shall the end come." Matt. xxiv, 14.

This sign is fulfilled. There is no known nation which has never, to a greater or less extent, had the gospel preached to them. The late Rev. J. O. Choules, author of a voluminous work, a History of Missions, from the apostolic age down to the present day, being asked some twenty years ago if he knew of any nation which never had received the gospel, replied that he did not; but he thought the promise implied something more than its being barely preached in each nation.

But when it is preached in all the world, for a witness to all nations, "THEN SHALL THE END COME." There is no such thing as a millennium after it is preached in all the world. Why cannot the church see this? That end, then, must be just upon us.

3. The signs foretold in Luke, twenty-first chapter. This chapter is parallel to the twenty-fourth of Matthew; and as the events appear more consecutive and distinct, I shall follow this account, and examine it, rather than that of Matthew.

Luke xxi, 6, 7; "As for these things which ye behold, the days will come, in the which there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. And they asked him, saying, Master, but when shall these things be? and what sign will there be when these things shall come to pass?"

In answer to these questions, Christ proceeded to tell them (from verses eight to twenty-four) what signs there would be which should precede the destruction of Jerusalem. The language is so plain that it cannot well be misunderstood. "Let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains." "For there shall be distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." All these predicted events have most certainly come on the Jews and Jerusalem. That devoted city is yet trodden down of the Gentiles; therefore, the prophecy has not yet expired. This, then, is my answer to those who would contend that the prophecy ended with the destruction of Jerusalem; it is not so, for it is yet in the course of fulfillment. In order to show that the prophecy ended then, it must be proved that Jerusalem ceased then to be trodden down of the Gentiles.

"Times of the Gentiles" is the period of their triumph over the church, holding it in bondage. It is shadowed forth by the metallic image of Daniel, second chapter, beginning with the Chaldeans, and ending with the Romans, in the entire destruction of the Gentile governments of the earth, and the setting up of the kingdom of God to fill the whole earth. Then, in verse twenty-five, and onward, follows a prediction of the signs that should indicate the kingdom of God at hand, with the same certainty that the budding of the fig-tree indicates approaching summer.

Verse 25. "There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon." What these signs are, we learn from other parts of the Bible. Matthew, in referring to the same signs, says, "the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light," Joel ii, 31; that "the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall be turned to blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come."

Has the sun been darkened in these days, as predicted by Joel and the Saviour? It has; and that within the memory of some now living. I refer to the dark day of A. D. 1780, May 19th. That was a day of supernatural darkness. It was not an eclipse of the sun, for the moon was at the full. It was not owing to a thickness in the atmosphere, for the stars were seen. The darkness began about nine o'clock A. M., and continued through the day, and also into if not through the night. Such was the darkness, that work was suspended in the field and shop, beasts and fowls retired to their rest, and houses were illuminated at dinner-time. Such a day of darkness has never been known, so far as I can learn from history, since the crucifixion of our Saviour. There have been several such events since, in different countries. If any can produce evidence of such an appearance before 1780, I will thank them most heartily for the information.

"And in the moon." At the time of the dark day, May 19th, 1780, there was a full moon, or nearly so [the moon full the 18th], yet the night was as dark as "Egyptian darkness." "The moon [did] not give her light."

The following extract from Gage's History of the Town of Rowley, Mass., on "the dark day" of May, 1780, will set this point in a clear light.

DARK DAY OF MAY NINETEENTH, 1780.

Mr. Gage says, "The sun rose clear, and shone for several hours; at length the sky became overcast with clouds, and by ten o'clock, A. M., the darkness was such as to occasion the farmers to leave their work in the field, and to retire to their dwellings; fowls went to their roosts; and before noon lights became necessary to the transaction of business within doors. The darkness continued through the day; and the night, till near morning, was as unusually dark as the day."

Rev. Mr. Tenney, of Exeter, N. H., quoted by Mr. Gage, in some speculations on the cause of the darkness, forwarded to "The Historical Society," in which he says that "no satisfactory solution of it has yet appeared,"—in remarking upon the following evening, says, "the darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty fiat gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."

"The moon to blood." The following extract of a letter from Mr. Beadle, at Aleppo, and published in the Missionary Herald, June, 1842, p. 284, will illustrate this point. It is an account of an earthquake at that place in 1822. He says, "On the night of the earthquake there was something peculiar in the atmosphere, the moon appearing as red as blood. This greatly alarmed the inhabitants, who were continually crying out, 'Now we shall hear the trumpet sound, and the dead will rise! the day of judgment has arrived!'"

The following description of the forementioned earthquake is from the same writer:

"About ten o'clock the earth began to move, as if it had been placed upon the waves of the sea. This rapidly undulating motion continued for some seconds but produced no serious injury. Some walls cracked, but resumed their places when the earth rested. A moment after the undulating motion ceased, came the dreadful shock. It was strictly vertical, seeming to strike directly beneath the city. The confusion and ruin which succeeded that awful moment are beyond all description. The crash of falling houses, the shrieks of the dying and wounded, husbands calling for wives, and wives searching for husbands, children entreating help from parents, and parents vainly seeking lost children, mingled with prayers and groans in many languages, presented a scene of suffering and woe, from which the mind turns instinctively away.

"The first impulse of the surviving inhabitants seemed to be, to rush to the gates of the city. Many were crushed in thier flight, and those who were permitted to reach a place of comparative safety outside the walls were compelled to pass over mangled and dead bodies, and fly amid —'ten thousand deaths on every side.'"

"And in the stars." The sign in the stars is, that "the stars shall fall from heaven as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when shaken of a mighty wind." Rev. vi, 13, and Matt. xxiv, 29. Has such a phenomenon taken place? The remembrance of the shower of meteors, on the night of Nov. 13, 1833, is fresh in the minds of the present generation. The scene could not be more truly described than it is by the Revelator. Such a scene I find described as having occurred in 1779, on the 12th of November, and as having been visible from South America to Germany and Greenland. From where they were witnessed in South America, on the coast of Brazil, to Weimar, in Germany is 10,800 miles, and from the same place to Herrnhut, in Greenland, 7,000 miles. This was the earliest shower of meteors, of any considerable magnitude, I can find on record. This was about six months before the dark day. There are several instances of the kind on record since that. Indeed, the 12th and 13th of November seem to be their anniversary. But, it is objected, meteors are not "stars." I would ask the objector, then, what was it which went before the wise men and guided them to the place of the Saviour's birth? Was it a fixed star? Can one of these fiery orbs fall on the earth and not destroy it? Certainly not. Then they must be meteors.

But admitting it to refer to the fixed stars, will not the conflagration of some of those bodies within a few years, as recorded by astronomers, answer the prediction? The signs have most certainly appeared in the stars.

Recapitulation. 1. The sun has been supernaturally darkened from morning to night: in some places it being cloudy, and the sun entirely invisible, and in others it being visible, but having the same appearance as when totally eclipsed; and the stars being visible. I have both these accounts from many living witnesses, in different parts of the country; it being cloudy in the north and clear in the south of New England.

2. That the moon, although it full'd the 18th, the day before the dark day, and must have arisen soon after sunset, gave no light at all. Also the bloody hue of the moon has appeared.

3. That signs in the stars have appeared, whether it be understood of the showers of meteors, or of the burning of the fixed stars.

Observe:—Each of these events has made a deep impression on the world that it presaged the great and terrible day of the Lord; some in each time believing it had come, others that it would soon come. It was thus on the dark day, when the moon was turned to blood, and during the shower of meteors. To the people generally, at the time they were witnessed, they were a sign. If they do not fulfill the prophecy, it cannot be fulfilled; for if it is ever done, it must be by just these appearances. If this does not accomplish the prediction, the repetition of the same thing again would not do it, but rather produce infidelity by the commonness of the phenomena. I must, therefore, believe the signs to have already appeared.—Voice of the Prophets.

How Shall We Ask?

"Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Luke xi, 9.

We have here the word of him who is emphatically "The Truth." Those to whom these words apply may know they have the things for which they ask, for they will willingly comply with the conditions. To whom, then, are they addressed? By reading the first verse we find he is talking with his disciples, who asked him to teach them to pray. They were addressed to those who believed in, and followed, Jesus. It may now apply to all those who believe in, and fully follow, him. In Jesus' last prayer with his disciples he anticipates the wants of all those who should believe through their word, and asks for them, and the disciples present, like blessings. See John xvii, 11, 20, 21. We who believe them, through their written word, may claim the promise if we fulfill the conditions. What are the conditions?

1. We must not, like the hypocrite, pray to be seen of men. "When thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father who is in secret." Matt. vi, 5, 6. All who have realized the blessedness of communion with God, know that the secret place, where no eye but his can see, no ear but his hear, is the dearest, sweetest spot on earth.

2. "And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have anything against any one. But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father who is in heaven forgive your trespasses." Mark xi, 25, 26. New version.

3. "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." Matt. v, 23, 24. Our altar is the altar of prayer. The gift or offering we are to bring as a sacrifice, is a broken and contrite heart. See Ps. li, 17. If we come then to the altar of prayer, and remember that we have in any way, either by word or deed, injured a brother (or neighbor) we are to seek reconciliation first, by asking forgiveness of them. If we have spoken unkindly or falsely to them alone, to them alone is confession due. If we have spoken these words to, or in the presence of, others, to them we must also acknowledge our fault, and counteract as far as may be, the wrong influence and impressions our words have caused. If we have been guilty of oppression, or fraud in the least degree, this also must be confessed, and as far as possible reparation be made to the injured. Zaccheus was ready to restore four-fold all that he had obtained unjustly; and when the Lord takes full possession of our hearts, we shall be anxious to make full restoration.

Thus much in regard to the duties required toward our fellow-creatures before we present our petitions. What does the Lord require in regard to himself?

1. Have faith in God. "For truly I say to you that whosoever shall say to this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that what he saith shall come to pass; he shall have whatever he saith. Therefore I say to you, Whatever things ye ask when ye pray, believe that ye will receive, and ye shall have them." Mark xi, 22-24. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering; for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind, and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord." James i, 5-7.

2. In order to have a ground for the exercise of faith, we must do those things that please God. "For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things. Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, we have confidence toward God. And whatsoever we ask we receive from him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight." 1 John iii, 20-22.

3. We must ask according to his will; that is, ask only for those things which he in his word declares himself willing to give. Whatever would make us holier, more like our Pattern, or whatever would tend to God's glory, we may ask, either for ourselves or others. See 1 John v, 16. But whatever tends to foster pride, or increase our covetousness, or selfishness, would not be in accordance with his will, hence improper to pray for. "And this is the confidence that we have toward him, that if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us. And if we know that he heareth us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we have asked from him." 1 John v, 14, 15. New version. "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts (margin, pleasures)." James iv, 3.

4. We must ask in Jesus' name. "Whatever things ye ask the Father in my name he will give you." John xv, 23. If we rely on our own merits, or promises of future obedience, they will all fail us. "There is no other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved. To illustrate. A. and B. are partners in the mercantile business, each owning a share in the firm, consequently considered by each other as responsible persons. A stranger comes to A., seeking and obtaining employment. At the end of the week he asks his wages, wishing to purchase necessities for his family. A. writes a line to B., requesting him to give this man goods to the amount of $6, and signs his name to the line. Handing it to the stranger, he says, "Go to the store of A. and B., and take up $6 worth, and I will be responsible." He goes, gets the goods, tells B. that he has been working for A., who sent him there to get that amount. But B. says, "I cannot let you take the goods unless A. sends an order to that effect. You are a stranger; I cannot take your word." The stranger then thinks of the line, and presents it to B., who upon seeing the writing and name of A., hesitates no longer, but delivers up the goods. Although we are not unknown to God, yet we are no more responsible than was this stranger, hence we need the name of one who is worthy, to present. And it must be genuine. If the stranger had forged the writing and presented it to B., he would have been detected at once by B.

We may profess to believe alone in the merits of Jesus, and when we offer our formal prayers, may say, "All we ask is in Jesus' name." But God cannot be deceived; he will not regard it. If we abide in Christ and bring forth fruit like him, the parent vine, we ken of. I notice only a few thoughts. You think I have things "badly mixed," having "Christ, by his Spirit, working mightily in men's hearts, to strengthen Christ in men's hearts." The difficulty will vanish, when we consider, that "Christ within" is defined to be "the hope of glory." This hope may be strengthened by the Spirit and "renewed day by day," though the outward man is in a state of decay.

I do not see how it makes Jesus "trifle with an earnest inquirer," to represent that he told Nicodemus that he was mistaken in thinking "that the kingdom of God should immediately appear; (Luke, xix, 11,) that the present state of "flesh and blood" cannot inherit it; and that therefore he must not expect it till the birth from the dead, and the change to immortality, prefigured by baptism, should take place. He, as a "master in Israel," should have known this, having the 37th of Ezekiel and other like prophecies to read.

I now proceed to speak briefly to the question in debate—the question of man's nature as revealed in the Scriptures. Your first proposition speaks of man's composition, affirming that he is composed of matter and spirit. By the side of this I will lay my first proposition, viz: Man was formed of the dust of the ground. In proof of this I quote Gen, ii, 7, "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." Man was not a living soul until he received the breath of life; but he is called man before that was given; nothing having entered into his composition but the dust of which he was made. In accordance with this, Bible phraseology always represents the man to be where his body is, whether alive or dead. When the breath of life was given, man became a living soul. The man that was formed of the dust became a living soul. The man, then, was the soul, and the soul was the man. Hence one of the primary meanings of soul is the whole person or body. This is the inspired account of man's creation, and there is not one word or intimation in it of the immaterial, immortal soul of popular theology. How strange that the "clay tenement" should be so particularly described, and its immortal occupant not be considered worth naming!

Your second proposition is, "That the body is mortal, but the spirit is incapable of physical corruption." The second part of this proposition is foreign to all Scripture teaching, and, whether it is true or not it cannot be proved by the Bible. The first part of it—"that the body is mortal"—I have admitted as positively proved. By the side of this I place my second proposition, viz: Man is mortal. I admit that you proved the body to be mortal, because you found the texts of Scripture which expressly call it so. All I ask is, that you admit my proposition proved, when I produce the like testimony. Will you do so? I proceed then to the proof.

Job, iv, 17—"Shall mortal man be more just than God?" Here man as a whole, is called mortal. This could not be true if a part of him were immortal. All those texts that assert, in the broadest sense, that "man dieth," prove that he is mortal; for that which is immortal is exempt from death.

Rom, i, 23,—"And changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man." Man, in the broadest sense, is here called corruptible or perishable. (Grove's Greek Lexicon.) Then no part of him is incorruptible or imperishable. Man is corruptible; God is incorruptible. One of the definitions of the word here rendered incorruptible is immortal; and it is so translated in 1, Tim, i, 17, where also it is applied to God. This text, then, asserts the mortality of man.

My third proposition is, that man in death has no knowledge. "For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything."—Ecc, ix, 5. If that part of man which knows, while in life, retained its knowledge after death, this text would not be true. The two conditions of man—living and dead—are here contrasted. The living know, the dead know not, is the declaration. That which had knowledge in life, has none in death.

Psa, vi, 5,—"For in death there is no remembrance of thee; in the grave, who shall give thee thanks?" There is a state of death, or there is not. If not, we may throw away our Bible, and say with Spiritualists,

"There is no death." What is death? Is it a state of separation of soul and body? Well, in that state "THERE IS NO REMEMBRANCE" of God. This text being true, the good man does not so much as know that there is a God when he is dead.

As ever, yours,

BY ELD. M. E. CORNELL.

"THE SUN SHALL BE DARKENED."

John Kennedy, in a sermon published in Danvers, Mass., A. D. 1780, says:

"The late wonderful and unusual darkness, on the 19th day of May last, struck the inhabitants of this State with horror and amazement, and at the same time filled them with alarming apprehensions. Yea, the very brutes seemed greatly agitated. If so, could a thinking being sit unmoved while he beheld the sun veiled in darkness at noon-day; * * * the husbandmen returning from their fields in great surprize; the beasts gazing in wild consternation; every countenance seemed to gather blackness; yea, a dismal gloom, which filled the beholder with fear and astonishment, waiting with much anxiety for some event. In fine, the darkness was as we nor our fathers never saw."

The Boston Gazette says: "They were obliged to dine by the light of the candle. Such a phenomenon was never before seen here by the oldest person living."

A correspondent from Newport, May 20, 1780, remarked that "It is not recollected from history, that a darkness of equal intenseness and duration has ever happened in any part of the world, except the miraculous eclipse at the crucifixion of our blessed Saviour."

In a manuscript sermon by Rev. Elam Potter, M. A., on the dark day of May 19, 1780, delivered on the 28th of the same month, he says:

"But especially I mention that wonderful darkness, on the 19th of May, inst. Then, as in our text, the sun was darkened; such a darkness as probably was never known before, since the crucifixion of our Lord. People left their work in the house and in the field. Travelers stopped; schools broke up at eleven o'clock; people lit up candles at noon-day; and the fire shone as at night. Some people, I have been told, were in dismay, and thought whether the day of judgment was not drawing on. A great part of the following night, also, was singularly dark. The moon, though in the full, gave no light, as in our text."

THE FALLING STARS OF 1833.

The Christian Advocate and Journal, Dec. 13, 1833, says:

"It seemed as if the whole starry heavens had congregated at one point, near the zenith, and were simultaneously shooting forth with the velocity of lightning, to every part of the horizon; and yet they were not exhausted—thousands swiftly followed in the tracks of thousands, as if created for the occasion."

A converted Papist writes: "It was, indeed, owing to this very doctrine (praying for souls in purgatory), that I saw the beautiful meteoric shower which occurred Nov. 13, 1833. I had been taught to make the sign of the cross once for every shooting star I saw, in behalf of departed souls; and being awake when the meteoric shower lighted up the heavens, the work of crossing myself began; but very soon the use of both hands could not suffice, for the stars apparently moved so rapidly that it became impossible to keep up. The consequence was, that the whole family was called up to see a wonder which excited no little fear in us all."—The Conversion of a Papist, pp. 39, 40.

A writer in the New York Ledger says: "They fell each one from its own starting point, in lines conformed to the arching sky, as if they followed the outline of one vast umbrella, overshadowing the beholder. Yet the meteoric stars fell unlike the ripe fruit, which drops from the tree directly to the ground. They flew, they were cast, they were hurled from their place like unripe fruit, which refuses to let go its hold, until the tree is powerfully shaken, when at length it breaks loose, bursts away, and darts madly toward the ground."

The Hard Problem.

"THERE never was since the world began a problem for our faith to solve so hard as that which tries American believers at this time." So says one who clings with blinded zeal to the so-called millennium theory. The ideas which had been advanced were no new sentiments. I had been familiar with the stereotyped phrases from my childhood. Though they had always jarred somewhat discordantly, it was only by the help of present truth that I had been enabled to see how utterly futile and unscriptural they were. But now it struck me with new force; and as I drank in the import of the words above quoted, I fell to musing: At last one was ready to admit that it was a "hard problem." And no wonder! for he was forced to see and confess, "That Edomitic envy, aristocracy and greed characterize our people; that hostile camps of brothers of one land frown defiance at each other with such bitter hate that scarce a sentinel can live between them; or mingling in the closer conflict, our land is deluged with brothers' blood. No wonder it tries the faith of "American believers," at least that portion of them who are trusting in the American churches, dignified as the vicegerent of the gospel of Christ, to renovate this fallen, sinful world. No wonder it is a problem, hard for such a faith to solve; for well it may be, in the face of all the scriptures that disprove it, aside from the stubborn facts and proofs of man's degeneracy. Then why not open your eyes and see that the faith itself is the harder problem?"

It must needs be, "that the Scriptures be fulfilled," is the only way one can account for this persistent clinging to an unfounded dogma, by persons possessing clear, practical good sense in understanding other things. Why need a veil rest over the understanding in reading the word of God, except it be that so few read it with sufficient discrimination to break the spell of a hackneyed early training. Alas! that mankind will so impregnably intrench themselves behind the ramparts of prejudice, that, resisting alike argument and the sterner logic of passing events, they will reiterate and endorse the sentiment, as not long since I heard one, in an outburst of pulpit eloquence, "I will never! no, never! till the latest hour of my breath, give up the idea that this sinful earth is to be renovated, and lifted to millennial purity by the gospel of Christ!" I sighed mentally then, and repeat it now: If you never will, you never will! But may not Jesus now be saying of such, as he said while upon earth of the scribes and Pharisees, "Let them alone; they be blind leaders of the blind;" even though they would doubtless ask as arrogantly as did those Pharisees: "Are we blind also?" Let Jesus' answer come with solemn weight to all, till in earnestness we pray, "Open thou the blind eyes."

THE MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.—The solid rock which turns the edge of the chisel, bears forever the impress of the leaf and the acorn, received long, long since, ere it had become hardened by time and the elements. If we track back to its fountain the mighty torrent which fertilizes the land with its copious streams, or sweeps over it with a devastating flood, we shall find it dripped in crystal drops from some mossy crevice among the distant hills. So, too, the gentle feelings and affections that enrich and adorn the heart, and the mighty passions that sweep away all the barriers of the soul and desolate society, they have sprung up in the infant bosom in the sheltered retirement of home. "I should have been an atheist," said John Randolph "if it had not been for one recollection, and that was the memory of the time when my departed mother used to take my hands in hers, and cause me on my knees to say, "Our Father which art in Heaven."

WAY OF LIFE.—Many people labor to make the narrow way wider. They may dig a path into the broad way, but the way of life will remain a narrow way to the end.—Cecil.

SUBLIMITY.—One of the sublimest things in the world is plain truth.—Bulwer.

Signs in the Sea.

Just before the coming of the Son of man, he informs us that among other signs upon earth, the waters of the great deep will be unusually agitated. He expresses the fact by saying, "There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring." Sea travelers tell us this is now true. Fourteen hundred shipwrecks are said to have taken place in the Mediterranean sea during the first week of December, 1863.

We are fully satisfied that all the signs which the Saviour and apostles gave as tokens of his second coming, will be literally fulfilled, as was the darkening of the sun and moon in 1780, and the falling of the stars in 1833. The distress of nations is being felt, and their death-pains are rapidly increasing. Yet they understand it not because led by blind leaders who promise them days of peace. But when they shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them. . . . But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. If we do not wish to be in darkness, we must take heed to the sure words of prophecy, from which cometh our light. One chief reason why so many are groping in darkness, is because they neglect the prophecies. He is not wise who does. Others see light, but will not walk in it, lest they receive reproach from the enemies of truth; they put their light under a bushel, and thus show they are ashamed of the words of Jesus. Such can have no ground to hope for acceptance at the coming of Christ. It will not do to make the least compromise with error or the workers of iniquity. Now is the time to be firm and bold, consecrating all to the Lord. We are rapidly nearing the heavenly harbor, where stormy seas and angry waves foam no more,—where all will be peace, love, and joy, for ever and ever. Shall we meet on that happy shore?—Sel.

None but Jesus.

A LITTLE more than thirty years ago, one of England's greatest men—eminent alike as a scholar, an elegant writer, and a statesman—lay on his death-bed. He breathed with great difficulty; and when one by his bed-side spoke to him of the love of Christ, he answered, slowly, pausing after each word—"Jesus Christ—love—the same thing," while a smile of exquisite sweetness played on his features. After a long silence he said, "I believe—" "In God?" asked one suggestively. "In Jesus," was his calm reply. He never spoke again except to say—in answer to the inquiry how he felt—"Happy." such was the last scene in the life of Sir James Mackintosh, the essayist, jurist, statesman, philanthropist, associate of Wilberforce, and classmate and friend of Robert Hall. One of the greatest minds of his own, or any age, was peaceful and "happy" in the faith of Jesus—to him the incarnation of Divine love. He had studied the literature of all ages. He was familiar with the great writers of Greece, and Rome, and England, and even the learning of India. His own history of philosophy, shows us the vast range of his reading. But as the needle turns to the pole, so his mind turned at last toward the pole star of our common Christian faith. He found in all the clustered constellations of intellectual greatness that crowded the firmament of time, only one "Star of Bethlehem."—N. Y. Observer.

WEAR A SMILE.—Which will you do, smile and make others happy, or be crabbed, and make everybody around you miserable? You can live among beautiful flowers, and singing birds, or in the mire surrounded by fogs, and frogs. The amount of happiness which you can produce is incalculable, if you will show a smiling face, a kind heart, and speak pleasant words. On the other hand, by sour looks, cross words, and a fretful disposition, you can make hundreds unhappy almost beyond endurance. Which will you do? Wear a pleasant countenance, let joy beam in your eye, and love glow upon your forehead. There is no joy so great as that which springs from a kind act, or a pleasant deed, and you may feel it at night when you rest, and at morning when you rise, and through the day when about your daily business.

Letters.

"Then they that feared the Lord, spake often one to another."

This department of the paper is designed for the brethren and sisters to freely and fully communicate with each other respecting their hopes and determinations, conflicts and victories, attainments and desires, in the heavenly journey. Seek first a living experience and then record it, carefully and prayerfully, for the comfort and encouragement of the other members of the household of faith.

From Bro. Demmon.

BRO. WHITE: Pursuant to appointment we met with the Lynxville church the 12th and 13th, and held our first Quarterly Meeting since its organization by Bro. Sanborn. Bro. L. G. Bostwick preached four times, I trust with profit to many that heard. There appeared to be a determination manifested on the part of the brethren and sisters to move forward, and help this message to rise. The ordinances of the Lord's house were celebrated on first-day, at 4 o'clock p. m., at the school-house, publicly, thus giving heed to the injunction of the Scripture, "Let your light so shine before men," &c. While engaged in washing feet Bro. Bostwick showed up the necessity of the ordinance, accompanied with an exhortation to live out the solemn truths of the third angel's message, and get ready for the soon appearing of Jesus. There were other stirring testimonies given, which I trust served to link heart to heart, so that we may stand shoulder to shoulder, in these trying times, when the wicked rage, and persecute God's children.

Some in Iowa we understand are meeting with persecution for the truth's sake. One sister has been turned out of doors for keeping the Sabbath. Others are threatened. It seems that we are getting into the time of trouble, and I believe that all our Christian graces must and will be tried, so that we shall have to stand by faith.

To the brethren and sisters scattered abroad, I would say, Stand firm. Remember that "in your patience possess ye your souls." Strive to cultivate a spirit of meekness, for such shall inherit the earth. Press together. "Let each esteem others better than themselves." By so doing, you will avoid much trouble among yourselves. Set your faces as flints Zion-ward. Let your motto be, "Eternal life." Let your lamps be trimmed and burning. I believe that this message will soon go with its loud cry, and the work will soon be finished in the heavenly sanctuary, when Jesus will lay by his priestly robes, and come to gather his faithful ones home. That you and I may be among that number is my prayer. Amen.

From Sister Guisinger.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS: It always rejoices my heart, to hear and know that God will answer prayer, when we go to him in faith, and according to his will.

God will manifest his power, and deliver his children from the hand of the enemy. I can testify to you of the power of God in my behalf. About five weeks ago I was suffering under the hand of affliction, and feeling but little hope of recovery from medical aid, I sent for the brethren and sisters, who followed the directions of the apostle James; and, blessed be the name of the Lord! he heard, and rebuked the fever; and I was able to attend the quarterly meeting that was held at Portage the day following. This was truly encouraging to me, and to all the rest of the brethren and sisters. It also strengthened my faith in the promises of God. Oh! may I be strengthened to live out the truth, and stand in my place, clad in all the armor of God.

Yours in hope of eternal life.

From Sister Scott.

BRO. WHITE: I am thankful that I have the privilege of speaking through the Review and acknowledging to the brethren and sisters my own unworthiness and the goodness of God to me. For more than a year I have been striving to get nearer to God. I have passed through many dark hours, temptations, and struggles with the enemy; but I feel as if I had passed through a refining fire, and to-day finds me, not with a greater abundance of joy than I have often experienced in my Christian warfare, but with a greater degree of knowledge of godliness for which I most heartily thank my Father in Heaven. Oh how I long to meet with the true children of God, and with them enjoy the gracious outpouring of his Spirit, but I am alone with none of like faith to commune with. But thank God, I have his blessed presence to strengthen me, still I long to be nearer the throne. The Review is a weekly visitor which I prize very highly. Bro. Bourdeau's remarks on holiness came to me as meat in due season.

I am striving for holiness without which none shall see God; yet I feel my weakness. Brethren and sisters, let us gird on the armor, and be ready to meet the Bridegroom at his coming. I think there might be much good done, could a messenger come here late this fall, or in the winter; for there have been no meetings here of any kind for over a year; hence the people would be glad to come out and hear the Lord's truth. We shall have a large brick schoolhouse completed by winter, and the country is thickly settled. We live five miles from Bridgeport the nearest point on the Milwaukee and Prairie du Chien R. R.

Patch Grove, Wis.

From Bro. Macomber.

BRO. WHITE: I would say for the encouragement of all who set apart the last Sabbath day for fasting and prayer, that with me the time was a very precious season. The Lord was with us by his holy Spirit and approved the movement, and gave us the satisfactory evidence that our supplications were noticed, and that answers according to our requests would in due time be granted.

To his name be everlasting praises given,
Now in this world and at the last in Heaven.

Aug. 28, first-day, I listened to a discourse from Eld. F. Berrick on the subject of immortality and our duty to God and our fellow-men. If he had been a Seventh-day Adventist, he would not have been permitted to preach in the house that he occupied for the day; but no S. D. A. messenger could have delivered a more thorough commandment-message than he did.

1. He set forth the cause of man's rejection from the tree of life, namely, through disobedience, by which he lost the blessing of immortality.

2. He showed us from the scriptures how we are to gain access to the tree of life, and quoted Rev. xxii, 14, "Blessed are they that do his commandments that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." Of course the commandments referred to, are the commandments of God the Father, because it is Jesus his beloved Son speaking to John on this occasion. So I think as the local Baptist minister remarked to me after the sermon, that Bro. Berrick could not dispose of the seventh-day Sabbath while holding to such views as these, and also remarked that the arguments produced by him in his discourse had entangled him in such a manner that he could not extricate himself without keeping God's commandments, the seventh-day Sabbath not excepted.

I would that Bro. B. might go on, continue in the good work, get baptized into the third angel's message, and sound the good news to the saints of God, as his gift well qualifies him for the work, with the keeping of the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Let us be found thus doing, and then when the Lord comes, we shall have right to the tree of life, and gain immortality that was lost or forfeited by disobedience.

And then, blessed be the name of the Lord! we shall shout, Victory, victory through Christ our everlasting King. Then the crowns of gold will be ours. Then the harps, that are all in tune, shall be ours, and a knowledge of the use of them also. Oh the harmony! How enrapturing the thought! Heaven's music will far excel anything of earth. Oh that all would obey, and have right to the tree of life.

Extracts from Letters.

BRO. D. D. HAINES writes from Haverhill, Mass.: I would say that I am not weary in this good cause. The truth shines brighter, and my love for it increases. I am trying to live out the truth and Christ is more precious to me now. I am striving to keep all God's commandments, and delight in the Law of God. I love the precious truth of the third angel's message, although I find it very humbling. It was just what I needed to see my duty, and to be purified through obeying the truth, and doing the will of God.

BRO. E. E. JONES writes from Linden, Mich.: The day appointed for fasting and prayer by the people of God, was a day long to be remembered by the little branch of his church at Tyrone. The children seemed greatly interested. Four of them resolved to go with their parents to the kingdom. We felt that the Spirit of the Lord was in our midst, for which we did greatly rejoice.

Pray for us that we may be faithful and exert a holy influence around. We would like to see Bro. Bates again. We felt that his visit was timely. Some were strengthened by his example of living faith. All were encouraged to press forward to obtain the prize that lies at the end of the Christian race.

Evidences Summed Up.

"PROPHETS have spoken—their words are fulfilled."

The four universal kingdoms of earth, viz., Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome, have had their rise and fall. The ten kingdoms out of the Roman division as symbolized by the feet and toes of the image, have also been fulfilled. The blasphemous horn, papacy, has also had its day of twelve hundred and sixty years, beginning with A. D. 538, and ending in 1798.

The great earthquake took place at the opening of the sixth seal, Nov. 1, 1755, called the earthquake of Lisbon, which shook nearly one-half of the globe. The sun and moon were darkened immediately after the days of papal tribulation on the church, May 19, 1780. The stars have fallen from heaven, as when a fig-tree is shaken of a mighty wind and shakes off its unripe fruit. Nov. 13, 1833.

The Ottoman empire has fallen according to the time predicted, Aug. 11, 1840. The 2300 years have ended with the loud cry of the first angel's message: the hour of his judgment is come, and that prophetic time is no longer, autumn, 1844. The powers of earth have been shaken since 1848.

Babylon is fallen. Iniquity abounds. The spirits of devils are working. The nations are getting angry. The great battle is preparing. The time of trouble is coming. The third angel's message is warning. Nahum's chariots are running. The seventh trumpet is sounding. The temple in heaven is open, where the ark of God's testimony is now seen, where Jesus stands interceding for the remnant. God's people are being gathered, while the wicked are scoffing. Pride and the love of the world are increasing. The day of the Lord hasteth greatly. And Jesus is soon coming. Are we ready?

We are called upon at this time to be sober and watch unto prayer. To seek meekness and purity of heart, that we may be without fault. Our heavenly Father has made rich provision for his people. If they hunger, he will feed them with the hidden manna. If they thirst, he will give them to drink of the water of life. If naked, he will clothe them with the garments of righteousness. If weary, he will give rest in believing and obeying the truth. If sick, he is the great Physician to heal. If blind, he will anoint the eyes with eye-salve. If sorrowful, he will make glad. When discouraged, he will send the consolation of his Spirit. When cast down, he will raise them up. When tempted, he will give grace sufficient to endure. Jesus has enough for each, enough for all, and enough for evermore. Call upon him with fervent prayer and faith, and the blessings are always ready.

If we could only deeply consider the joys of heaven, the exceeding and eternal weight of glory in reserve for them that love God, how our hearts would burn with zeal for his matchless goodness revealed unto the children of men, in sending his Son to die for us.

When we see the tender care that our heavenly Father has over his children, how it should melt our hearts in love and tenderness before him. God has done great things for us whereof we are glad, and should rejoice in the rich provision made for us in the gospel, in the exceeding great and precious promises.

Why should we sleep for one moment? Let us awake to righteousness and sin not, and have the true knowledge of God. Do we realize that if faithful a little longer, it may be our privilege to stand on mount Zion with the 144,000? to sing the new song of Moses and the Lamb? and to be where all tears shall be wiped away? where there will be no more sorrow, pain or death? Yes, we shall reach the city of God, the kingdom of heaven, and dwell on the earth renewed. Amen.

Yours in hope of soon seeing Jesus.

J. B. FRISBIE.

When Jesus Comes.

WHEN Jesus comes! said a dying saint,
I'll leave the grave, and all earthly taint,
I'll speed me away to the land of light,
And join the song of the angels bright.

When Jesus comes! said a trembling soul,
I shall dread no longer sin's control,
I'll be happy then, with my sins forgiven,
And bask in the smile of the God of Heaven.

When Jesus comes! said a parted friend,
We shall meet again where all sorrows end.
We shall part no more. Oh, 'twill joyful be
To dwell forever from partings free.

When Jesus comes! said a lonely one,
I shall leave this path which I've trod alone,
And hold converse sweet with God's chosen ones;
May patience be mine till my work is done.

When Jesus comes! I oft breathe in prayer,
May I stand before him pure and fair,
May my robes be washed in the crimson tide
Which flowed from the Saviour's bleeding side.

When Jesus comes! all ye waiting souls,
With a trumpet voice that will shake the poles,
May your shout go up, We have waited long,
Our God will save; for his arm is strong.

"There's Light Beyond."

"WHEN in Madeira," writes a traveler, "I set off one morning to reach the summit of a mountain, to gaze upon the distant scene and enjoy the balmy air. I had a guide with me, and we had, with difficulty, ascended some two thousand feet, when a thick mist was seen descending upon us, quite obscuring the whole face of the heavens. I thought I had no hope left but at once to retrace our steps, or be lost; but as the cloud came nearer, and darkness overshadowed me, my guide ran on before me, penetrating the mist, and calling to me ever and anon, saying, 'Press on, master—press on—there's light beyond!' I did press on. In a few minutes the mist was passed, and I gazed upon a scene of transcendent beauty. All was bright and cloudless above, and beneath was the almost level mist, concealing the world below me, and glistening in the rays of the sun like a field of untrodden snow. There was nothing at that moment between me and the heavens." Oh ye over whom the clouds are gathering or who have sat beneath the shadow, be not dismayed if they rise before you. Press on—THERE IS LIGHT BEYOND.

"None Other Name."

A FEW persons were collected round a blind man, who had taken his station on a bridge over a London canal, and was reading from an embossed Bible. Receiving from the passers-by of their carnal things, he was ministering to them spiritual things. A gentleman on his way home from the city, was led by curiosity to the outskirts of the crowd. Just then the poor man, who was reading in the 4th chapter of Acts, lost his place, and, while trying to find it with his fingers, kept repeating the last clause he had read—"none other name—none other name—none other name." Some of the people smiled at the blind man's embarrassment, but the gentleman went away deeply musing. He had lately become convinced that he was a sinner, and had been trying in many ways to obtain peace of mind. But religious exercises, good resolutions, altered habits, all were ineffectual to relieve his conscience of its load, and enable him to rejoice in God. The words he had heard from the blind man, however, rang their solemn music in his soul—"none other name!"

When he reached his home, and retired to rest, these words, like evening chimes from village towers nestling among the trees, were still heard—"NONE OTHER NAME—NONE OTHER NAME—NONE OTHER NAME." And when he awoke, in more joyful measure, like matin bells saluting the morn, the strain continued—"NONE OTHER NAME—NONE OTHER NAME." The music entered his soul, and he awoke to a new life. I see it all! I see it all! I have been trying to be saved by my own works, my repentance, my prayers, my reformation. I see my mistake. It is Jesus who alone can save me. To him I will look. 'Neither is there salvation in any other. For there is none other name—none other name—none other name given among men whereby they must be saved.'

"Then they that feared the Lord, spake often one to another."

From Sister McClure.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS: I am still trying to walk in the straight and narrow way. I want to learn of Jesus, for he is meek and lowly in heart, and by so doing I shall find that rest he has promised to the faithful. I feel that the Lord has greatly blessed me and mine, and I thank his holy name that he has seen fit to give me my children to go with me to that heavenly country, where all will be peace and joy. The little church here in Greenbush are striving to keep all the commandments of God. It is cheering to meet every Sabbath with the brethren and sisters, to hear their lively testimonies, and to join in prayer and praise to the great God of Heaven. How encouraging to the parents to hear the testimonies of the little ones—and then their little petitions so confidently offered up to their Father in Heaven. But they have much yet to overcome before they are fit for the Master's use, and so have we all. May the Lord help them and us.

Bro. L. Martin writes from Bennington, N. H.: I would say that the blessed hope continues to cheer me on in my lonely pilgrimage. I am very glad that I have been permitted to hear the first, second, and third angels' messages. I still read the Review and Herald with delight. I thank the Lord that he is still mindful of us here in the East. I rejoice that some of the Lord's servants have come to the East, and I hope and trust that a good and glorious work will be accomplished. I had the pleasure of hearing four discourses from Elds. Loughborough and Hull at Manchester. We are living in a solemn time, truly. I desire to realize it more than I do. What is done for the salvation of our fellow-men must be done quickly. May the Lord bless you and your labors abundantly, and preserve you blameless unto his coming, is my prayer.

Sister M. M. Osgood writes from Bronte, C. W.: We are still striving to walk in the narrow way, and a part of the time I feel an assurance that the Lord guides and strengthens. His presence is dear, his word is precious, and his approval the one great desire of my heart. We are numbered as yet among the lonely ones, but trust it will not ever be so.

My Bible Tells Me So.

WHEN, faint and weary with the strife,
Temptations to o'ercome,
I long to leave this toilsome life,
And lay me down at home;
Then sweetly comes this thought to me,
Whate'er betide, I know
That as my day my strength shall be;
The Bible tells me so.

When sin brings clouds of doubt and fears
To spread before my eyes,
And faith grows weak, and scarce can pierce
Those clouds to reach the skies,
My heart cries out in trembling tones,
Oh! whither shall I go?
"Come unto me, ye weary ones!"
My Saviour tells me so.

Yes, I will come, I'll trust thee, Lord,
The needed strength to give;
Oh! let me never doubt thy Word;
I'll trust thee while I live,
And should I lay me down to die,
I need not fear to go;
I have a home beyond the sky,
My Bible tells me so.

The Seven Seals.

"AND I saw in the right hand of him that sat on the throne, a book written within and on the back side, sealed with seven seals." Rev. v, 1.

A sealed book is one whose contents are hidden. It was said to Daniel, "Shut up the words, and seal the book, till the time of the end." Dan. xii, 4. See Isa. xxix, 11.

The book with seven seals symbolizes God's purposes, to be unfolded during the Christian age on loosing its several seals.

The entire fifth chapter of Revelation seems to be a grand introduction to the subject of the seven seals which is given in the sixth chapter as follows:—

Verses 1, 2. "And I saw when the Lamb opened one of the seals, and I heard as it were the noise of thunder, one of the four beasts, saying, Come and see. And I saw, and behold a white horse: and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him: and he went forth conquering, and to conquer."

This armed warrior, riding forth conquering and to conquer symbolizes the victories of the gospel as preached in its purity and power by Christ's first ministers. The white horse denotes the purity of faith and life of the primitive church.

Verses 3, 4. "And when he had opened the second seal, I heard the second beast say, Come and see. And there went out another horse that was red; and power was given to him that sat thereon to take peace from the earth, and that they should kill one another: and there was given unto him a great sword."

The red horse denotes blood and carnage, and has reference to those times of persecution of the followers of Jesus Christ, covering much of the period called the ten persecutions.

Verses 5, 6. "And when he had opened the third seal, I heard the third beast say, Come and see. And I beheld, and lo a black horse; and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand. And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say, A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny; and see thou hurt not the oil and the wine."

The black horse denotes darkness and error, the opposite of the gospel in its purity, symbolized by the white horse. The events under this seal cover the period of the apostasy, from Constantine A. D. 313, to the unlimited rule of the Papacy A. D. 538. On this seal Wm. Miller, Lectures p. 181, remarks as follows:

"When the church became connected with worldly power and wisdom, she lost her purity of doctrine and practice, and adopted in her creed, maxims and principles congenial with the natural heart, and forms and ceremonies for show and parade, rather than the humbling and cross-bearing life of the followers of Jesus. The balances denoted that religion and civil power would be united in the person who would administer the executive power in the government, and that he would claim the judicial authority both in church and state. This was true among the Roman emperors, from the days of Constantine until the reign of Justinian, when he gave the same judicial power to the bishop of Rome. The measures of wheat and barley for a penny, denote that the members of the church would be eagerly engaged after worldly goods, and the love of money would be the prevailing spirit of the times."

Verses 7, 8. "And when he had opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth beast say, Come and see. And I looked, and behold a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him. And power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth."

The rider upon the pale horse is named Death. Hell, the grave, followed with him. The symbols under this seal denote great persecution, and martyrdom of the church. The period of this seal cannot be mistaken. It must have been during the unlimited, unrestrained, persecuting reign of the Papacy, from about A. D. 538, to the commencement of the sixteenth century when the reformers began their work of exposing the corruptions of the Papal system.

Verses 9, 11. "And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held: and they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled."

It seems proper that a period of time should be given to the events under the fifth seal the same as to those under the other seals, which time, it may appear from the following remarks, was from the rise of the reformation to the time when civil power was taken from the Papacy.

1. The souls under the altar were not in Heaven when John had this vision, from the fact that they had not been born. Neither can we suppose that this scene takes place in Heaven. A. Barnes says:

"We are not to suppose that this literally occurred, and that John actually saw the souls of the martyrs beneath the altars—for the whole representation is symbolical; nor are we to suppose that the injured and the wronged in Heaven actually pray for vengeance on those who wronged them, or that the redeemed in Heaven will continue to pray with reference to things on the earth; but it may be fairly inferred from this that there will be as real a remembrance of the wrongs of the persecuted, the injured and the oppressed, as if such prayer were offered there."

2. The scenes which John was viewing were upon the earth, hence, in the absence of proof that any other altar is meant, it seems a necessary conclusion that John saw the place of slaughter of the church of God by Papal Rome, where the earth has drunk up the blood of martyrs, under the figure of an altar of sacrifice.

3. These slain are represented as crying to God to have their blood avenged on them that dwell on the earth, the same as the voice of Abel's blood from the ground, Gen. iv, 9, 10; or the cry of the stone from the wall, and the answer of the beam out of the timber Hab. ii, 11; or the cry of the hire of the laborer, James v, 4. If it be said that these souls must be in conscious being in Heaven in order to cry, then we reply, that Abel's blood, the stone and the beam, and money, are also conscious, as they are all represented as crying. But really, if these souls are in Heaven in participation of fullness of joy and pleasures forevermore, why are they represented as crying for vengeance on those who cut short their mortal life with all its woes, and hastened them to the enjoyment of the perfect bliss of Heaven?

4. The Scriptures sometimes attribute life, action, intelligence, and personality, to inanimate objects to show how God regards those connected with those objects, hence the unconscious slain are represented as crying from beneath the altar of Papal sacrifice. Justice, long trampled in the dust, now cries for judgment and vengeance on the Papacy which had spilled the blood of the church of Jesus Christ. Luther and his associates were imbued with the spirit of this cry which went up from the earth that had drunk the blood of millions of the martyrs of Jesus, and they exposed the corruptions of the Papacy which trembled before the reformers, and in A. D. 1798 was stripped of its civil authority. Thus the blood of the martyrs was avenged on those that dwell on the earth. This has no reference to the final judgment and punishment of the wicked; but refers to the change in the condition of the Papacy. "He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity; he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword." Chap. xiii, 10.

5. White robes were given to every one of them. They had been denounced by the Papacy as vile heretics, and executed as such, and thus their characters had been robed in darkness. But the Reformation exposed the crimes of the Papacy, turned the scale, vindicated the cause of the holy martyrs of Jesus, and clothed them with white robes. Hence, the sermons, the prayers and the songs of praise of the Christian church since the great Reformation have held these millions of the slain for Jesus' name, forth to the world in spotless purity.

6. They were to rest yet a little season, until their fellow-servants and brethren should be killed as they had been. Let it be particularly noticed that it is the same that cried, that rests. If it be justice that cried, as has been shown, then it is justice that rests, or is stayed for a little season. We stated that the opening of this seal commenced when the reformers began to expose the Papacy, and vindicate the cause of the martyrs. But the cry of justice was not answered at once. Time must be given to bring about these grand events. Their cause must rest yet for a little season. For notwithstanding the influence of the Reformation, the Papacy clothed with authority to punish heretics, did put to death more of the followers of Jesus. This done, the little season, or the period of the fifth seal, closed.

Verses 12-17. "And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?"

The events of the first five seals have been described in a style highly figurative; but with the sixth seal there seems to be a complete change to the narration of literal facts. The events, under this seal are,

1. A great earthquake, which, probably, was the great earthquake at Lisbon, in 1755, in which 30,000 persons were killed. The Encyclopedia Americana states: "It extended from Greenland to Africa and America."

2. The sun became black as sackcloth of hair, which was the same as the darkening of the sun, Matt. xxiv, and was fulfilled in the wonderful dark day of May 19, 1780. See Exposition of Matt. xxiv, to be had at the Review Office, Battle Creek, Mich.

3. The moon became as blood. The night following the dark day, the moon, when visible at all, looked like blood.

4. The stars of heaven fell unto the earth, which is the same as the falling stars of Matt. xxiv, and had a wonderful fulfillment Nov. 13, 1833, as described by John, of which thousands now living were eye-witnesses.

5. The heavens will depart as a scroll when it is rolled together. This is in the future, to be fulfilled when the voice of God shakes the earth, also the atmospheric heavens. Heb. xii, 22-27; Joel iii, 16; Jer. xxv, 30, 31; Rev. xvi, 17.

6. Mountains and islands will be moved out of their places. The voice of God that shakes the heavens will also shake the earth. Mountains will be thrown down, and islands sunk. The earth's surface will be so broken up as to prepare the way for

7. All classes of the lost, to hide in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains from the burning glory then being manifested of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. They have witnessed the shaking of the earth, the casting out of the rocks of the mountains; all hope of mercy is gone, and they desire and pray that some rock or mountain may cover them from the awful glory of God and the Lamb. They are still looking forward with dreadful fear to the coming of the Son of man, and inquire, "Who shall be able to stand?"

We have followed the events under six of the seals from the first advent of Christ down past the three great signs of his second advent, namely, in the sun, moon, and stars. Here the sixth chapter of the Revelation closes, and the prophetic chain is broken off by the introduction of the sealing of the 144,000, the subject of chapter vii, which fact locates the sealing in our time. Hence we find the declaration in reference to the seventh seal, the last link of this prophetic chain, in Chap. viii, 1. And when he had opened the seventh seal there was silence in Heaven about the space of half an hour.

This, doubtless applies to the second advent of Christ, and marks the period from the time that he leaves Heaven with all the holy angels with him, Matt. xxv, 31, till he returns with all the saints resurrected and changed. All the heavenly harpers being absent, there is said to be silence in Heaven. J. W.

War and the Sealing.

THE ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-FOUR THOUSAND.

The entire seventh chapter of the book of Revelation, which speaks of the sealing of the 144,000, is brought in parenthetically between the sixth and seventh seals—the sixth chapter closing with the specifications of the sixth seal, and the eighth opening with the seventh—hence the chronology of the sealing is fixed in our day.

Chap. vii, 1-3. "And after these things I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree. And I saw another angel ascending from the east, having the seal of the living God, and he cried with a loud voice to the four angels, to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea, saying, Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads."

On these verses we briefly comment as follows:

1. The four angels we understand to be four of those heavenly messengers which excel in strength, into whose hands God has given the control of the four winds.

2. The four corners of the earth may refer to the four points of the compass, embracing the whole.

3. The four winds represent the elements of political strife and war. See Dan. vii, 2; Jer. xxv, 32, 33.

4. To the four angels it is given to hurt, as well as to hold.

5. The hurting by the blowing of the four winds relates only to the results of war. The seven last plagues constitute no part of it, as the plagues are given into the hands of seven angels, chap. xv, 1, 6, 7; xvi, 1; xxi, 9, but this work is in the hands of four angels.

6. The ascending angel represents a special message; and as his work comes in after the signs of the second advent of Christ, mentioned under the sixth seal, we conclude that the sealing is identical with the work of the third message of chap. xiv, 9-12.

7. The seal of the living God, as shown in our publications, is the Sabbath of the fourth commandment.

8. The angel bearing the seal ascends from the rising of the sun. Whiting's translation. We do not suppose that locality is here meant; but that the message, represented by the ascending angel, would come up like the rising sun. The morning sun seems powerless. As it rises, its rays increase in strength, until it reaches the heat and dazzling power of the noon-day sun. The third message, bearing on its front the Sabbath of the Lord, arose in obscurity, its first teachers being penniless, uneducated men, and the positions taken by them were exceedingly unpopular and crossing. But the work has gradually moved on, gaining strength by every effort put forth by its true friends, and its future power, light, and glory, are symbolized in chap. xviii, 1-5.

9. Let it be observed that the sealing is in the same territory as, and in close connection with, the hurting by the blowing of the four winds. This is seen in the fact that the four angels are invoked not to hurt till the servants of God are sealed. This scene at present applies to our own country. To apply the hurting to the French Revolution of 1848, and the Crimean war of 1854, and then locate the sealing work in North America, is absurd. Here, in our own land, the hands of the four angels are loosening, and the winds of war and strife are blowing. Should this war continue and increase, the proclamation of the third message would be seriously hindered. Already [summer of 1862] our brethren in several States have been forced to suspend tent labor in consequence of the military excitement.

10. The blowing of the four winds hurts the earth, the sea, and the trees. The present war threatens to seriously affect the agricultural interests of our country, Joel iii, 9, 10, also the commercial.

Again we see the hurting of the earth, the sea, and the trees, in the destruction of property by the land forces, and by the navy. While this work goes on, thousands are called into the army who would otherwise listen, at least, to the voice of truth; and those who remain at home are to such a degree excited as to the welfare of their sons, husbands, and brothers, in the service, and their country, that they are unprepared to listen to, and investigate, the great facts of the message.

11. There must be a time of comparative peace in which the sealing work will be accomplished. How soon that will be—how far the Southern rebellion will be pushed in fury, and the North rise in its strength and greatness—to what extent military movements are to hinder the proclamation of the message in this and other countries—is known only to Him who has the destiny of nations in his hands. It may be the purpose of God to bring the nation, stained with the crime of slavery, low in the dust, and greatly humble his people, that in the time of peace many may readily receive the message, and in unity and love obey it. The hurting angels hold the four winds that the servants of God may be sealed. When a time of comparative peace shall come, then will the sealing work move on in earnest. The message will forget its feebleness and will swell into the loud cry.

Verses 4-8. And I heard the number of them which were sealed, and there were sealed an hundred and forty and four thousand, of all the tribes of the children of Israel. Of the tribe of Juda were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Reuben were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Gad were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Aser were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Nephthaliim were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Manasses were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Simeon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Levi were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Issachar were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Zabulon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Joseph were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Benjamin were sealed twelve thousand.

Some do not see how those of the twelve tribes can be sealed in our time. But is it not as difficult for them to see why the apostle should address his epistle to the twelve tribes? "James, a servant of God and the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, greeting. My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations." James i, 1, 2. This Christian minister is addressing his Christian brethren, and not the Jewish tribes. How is this?

Again, the names of the twelve tribes are on the twelve gates of the new-earth city. "And he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of Heaven from God, having the glory of God: and her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal. And had a wall great and high, and had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels, and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel. On the east three gates; on the north three gates; on the south three gates; and on the west three gates. And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb." Rev. xxi, 10-14. This is not a Jewish city, but Christian, for in its foundations are the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb; yet on each one of its twelve gates is written the name of some one of the twelve tribes. How can this be?

Paul's figure of grafting may assist to a correct understanding of this matter. Rom. xi. The tame olive tree represents believing Israel. The twelve branches were broken off because of unbelief. Through faith in Christ the wild olive cions are grafted into the tame olive stocks, and thus the twelve tribes are perpetuated in the Christian age.

There is nothing on the earth to show the distinct tribes of the Israel of God. We cannot point to twelve denominations as constituting the twelve tribes; neither to any geographical divisions where they are located. Let us look to the heavenly sanctuary,

Sixteen Short Answers to Sixteen Common Objections

AGAINST THE

SECOND ADVENT FAITH.

(Concluded.)

OBJECTION THIRTEENTH. This kingdom represents Christ's spiritual reign. The advocates of the doctrine of a temporal millenium claim that in the conversion of the world, Christ is to exercise a spiritual reign over all the earth, and that all governments and kingdoms are to become subject to him. Most of them believe, also, that this event is just at hand, and some have the presumption to attempt to prove it by the signs of Christ's second coming and literal reign. As we have already refuted this doctrine in answer to objection seven, we will simply present a few ideas in connection with the manner in which the fifth kingdom is established. It is represented as a smiting process, "breaking in pieces" the other kingdoms, and making them like chaff which the wind carried away. This description harmonizes with that of Rev. xix, where Christ at his coming is represented as smiting the nations with a sharp sword, ruling them with a rod of iron, and treading the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. It is doing violence to language to claim that such utterances as these can possibly represent the mild and peaceful effects of the spread of the gospel and the prevalence of Christianity, and we must conclude that they are descriptive of the events connected with that great day, when the wicked will call for the rocks and mountains to fall on them, that they may be hid from the coming wrath. Well may the prophet exclaim, "Who shall be able to stand?"

In the foregoing prophecy, we have been presented with a simple outline of the history of the four kingdoms. As we proceed with the investigation, we learn that prophecy is progressive, revealing "line upon line." Thus it was with the prophecies relating to Christ's first coming. The first shadowy promise, "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head," might seem almost insignificant to base faith upon, but as we pass along down through the Scriptures, we find the promises growing brighter and brighter, until we hear the sweet singer of Israel joyfully exclaiming, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

The subject contained in the second chapter of Daniel is resumed in the seventh chapter, and many additional facts are elicited which render the investigation more and more interesting. The four kingdoms are again presented to us, symbolized by four great beasts. In this connection we may remark that some people are disposed to scoff at these prophecies, making light of the "beasts, heads and horns;" but it certainly becomes us, where the Holy Spirit has seen fit to use these symbols, to be careful how we deride and scoff, remembering that "all Scripture is profitable."

Babylon, the first of the kingdoms, and the greatest in power and wealth, is fitly symbolized by a lion, (the king of beasts), having eagles' wings (representing its rapid conquests). The Medo-Persian kingdom is represented under the symbol of a bear. As this animal is ferocious and blood-thirsty, so were the monarchs of this kingdom. Cruel and relentless in its conquests, it might with propriety be said to "devour much flesh." The "three ribs in the mouth of it" represent the three great powers, Babylon, Lydia, and Egypt, which it conquered and brought into subjection to itself. The third kingdom is symbolized by a leopard. That this is an appropriate representation of Grecia, is evident from several considerations: This animal as its name implies, (leo-pard) is in its nature partly lion and partly panther. Those who are familiar with the history and character of Alexander the Great, the first monarch of Grecia, can not fail to see the peculiar fitness of this symbol. Lion-like in boldness, courage and prowess, panther-like in cunning craftiness, his deeds, as recorded in history, leave us no room to doubt that the career of this kingdom fulfills this portion of prophecy. This beast is also represented as having four wings and four heads, denoting its rapid onward progress in conquest, and its division after the death of Alexander, into four minor kingdoms. The identity of the first three of these kingdoms is thus clearly established, and so far, the prophecy taken in all its connections explains itself.

We are now called to notice more particularly the fourth kingdom as the only one about which there can be any doubt. It is presented to us under the symbol of a dreadful and terrible beast, having great iron teeth, &c. It would seem from Daniel's language in verse 19, that he understood the meaning of the three previous symbols; but in regard to this, he says, "I would know the truth of the fourth beast," &c. Now if we also would know the truth in regard to the matter, let us hear the explanation. Verse 23, "The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down and break it in pieces." This language corresponds with the description of the fourth kingdom in the previous vision, represented by the legs of iron. "And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron, forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things, and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise." Chapter ii, 40. That the great and powerful kingdom of Rome is again presented, we cannot doubt, and this opinion is confirmed when we consider the fact that it is again shown in its divided state represented by the ten horns of the beast, corresponding with the feet and toes of the image.

In considering the vision of the horns in verse 8, we notice that in the midst of them there comes up another horn, having eyes like a man's, and a mouth speaking great things, and before whom three of the first horns were plucked up by the roots. In the latter clause of verse 24, this is explained as another king that shall arise after the ten and subdue three kings. Now, if we examine the history of the Roman kingdom, we shall find this literally fulfilled by the Roman Catholic power. By reference to "Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," we learn the following facts: In the year of our Lord 498, the Heruli (one of the powers symbolized by the ten horns) were conquered by the Ostrogoths, (another of those powers). In 534, the Vandals (still another of the ten horns) were conquered by the Greeks, for the purpose of establishing the supremacy of the Catholics. Justinian, a Greek emperor, had issued a decree constituting the Bishop of Rome head of all the churches; but the Ostrogoths, who held possession of Rome, were opposed to the papal supremacy, so, in order for the decree to be executed, they also must be "plucked up," which was effected by their conquest in March, 538, by Justinian's army. Thus we see that the three horns were plucked up for the express purpose of establishing the Papacy, fulfilling the prophecy in a remarkable and striking manner.

The last three of these four great kingdoms are again presented to our notice in the eighth chapter of Daniel; but our limits forbid that we should further extend our examination of this interesting portion of the subject. For a full exposition of this prophecy, the reader is referred to a work entitled, "The Prophecy of Daniel," published at the Review Office.

We have thus briefly examined the prophetic word in regard to the career of these four powers, and learn that the next event in this chain of prophecy is the setting up of God's everlasting kingdom, which shall never be destroyed. That we are in close proximity to this event in point of time, will be developed as we proceed with the investigation.

Another evidence which may be considered under this head, is adduced by a comparison of the present state of earthly governments with the prophecies describing the state of things near the coming of Christ. The prophets are unanimously agreed in declaring that just before the second advent, the nations are to be in a troubled condition, and that the spirit of war and tumult will prevail in the land. By reference to Rev. xi, 18, we learn that in immediate connection with the judgment and resurrection, the nations are to be angry, and in chap. xvi, 14, 15, we see that just previous to Christ's coming "as a thief," there comes "the battle of that great day of God Almighty." Now that we are rapidly approaching the time of the anger of nations, must be apparent to the candid observer, as he contemplates the vast preparation for war now being made by every nation on the globe. As described in Joel iii, 9, the cry all over the world seems to be, "Prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near." Verse 14 shows us that this prophecy applies when "the day of the Lord is near." Some are deluded into the belief that a time of lasting peace is just before us, when the nations will learn war no more, and man will be at peace with his fellow-man; yet, in view of all the facts before us, we must conclude that this hope is without foundation.

There is not a nation on the earth which is not doubling its military strength, and greatly increasing its war expenditures. Especially is this true of the leading powers of Europe, who are absolutely afraid of each other, hardly knowing friend from foe; a condition of things aptly described by our Saviour as "distress of nations with perplexity," and "men's hearts failing them for fear." The spirit of war is rife in the land, our own country not excepted, and men of the world, looking from their own stand-point only, are gravely shaking their heads and prophesying troublous times among the nations, while the careful student of the prophetic word looks upon these things as among the many "signs of the times," expecting that the period of apparent peace upon which we are now entering will be like the treacherous calm which precedes the terrible hurricane, giving the scoffing, unbelieving world an opportunity to cry, "Peace and safety," just before "sudden destruction cometh upon them." May the Lord help us to rightly understand the word which is to be a "lamp to our feet," that we may be able to "discern the signs of the times."

But lest any one should cling to an imaginary scripture basis for the hope of peace and safety, we will answer

OBJECTION FOURTEENTH. There is a promise that nations shall learn war no more. This is readily admitted; but by whom is this promise held out? Let us examine the chapter in which it is found. Isa. ii. In verse 3 we read that "many people shall go and say" these things, and this prophecy is strikingly fulfilled by "many people" in these last days; for we hear it echoed from almost every pulpit in the land, that "they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." If we will only bear in mind that the Lord has never promised this, but that it is the cry of "many people," we shall be prepared to understand what follows: Verse 6. "Therefore [for this reason—because many people are saying this,] thou hast forsaken thy people, the house of Jacob, because they be replenished from the east, and are soothsayers like the Philistines, and they please themselves in the children of strangers." Then follows a description of the state of things which shall exist just before the Lord arises to "shake terribly the earth." Pride, idolatry, covetousness, and lust for silver and gold, all these shall abound, and on this account, the people "shall go into the holes of the rocks and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth." Verse 19. No stretch of the imagination could possibly make this language describe a temporal millenium.

But now that we have examined the sayings of "many people," let us "hear the word of the Lord," as found in Joel iii, 10: "Beat your plowshares into swords and your pruning-hooks into spears; let the weak say, I am strong." The majority in these days are too ready to accept the sayings of the people in preference to the word of the Lord, which may account for the caution found at the close of the chapter containing the sayings of many people: "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of?"

We next pass to notice the evidence properly coming under our second division, comprising the signs in the religious or ecclesiastical world. A portion of these evidences having been already presented in answer to various objections, we shall notice only a few points in this connection. As we look around us and see the evidences of the fall of man, and the terrible curse of sin, with the misery and wretchedness it entails upon the race, we are led to inquire, will this state of things always continue? All there is good within us recoils at the thought, and hence, being constituted with hope in our nature we look forward to a better state of things when these evils shall have been removed. The false theology of the present day has taught us to believe that this will be accomplished in the conversion of the world; and the masses have adopted this theory, rejecting the Bible doctrine of the literal coming of Christ, to renew the earth by destroying sin and sinners out of it.

The true teachings of the Scriptures are, that there will be a great declension in morals and religion just before the second advent, and that the world will at that time be in a fearfully wicked condition. Our Saviour, in giving the signs of his coming, says that "because iniquity shall abound the love of many shall wax cold." Matt. xxiv, 12. Showing not only that wickedness would increase and abound in the world, but that some who had once possessed a love for religion, would lose their interest therein and their love would wax cold.

In harmony with this testimony is that of the apostle in 2 Tim. iii, 1-5: "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come: For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away." Also in verse 13: "But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." See also 1 Tim. iv, 1; 1 Thess. v, 2, 3; 2 Thess. ii, 3-12; 2 Pet. iii, 5.

That the times in which we now live are accurately described in the foregoing prophecies we cannot doubt, and it would seem that little or no effort would be required to prove it to the satisfaction of any intelligent observer.

Is it a fact that "iniquity abounds?" Read the following from the New York Herald:—

"Crimes of all descriptions are on the increase especially those of the blackest dye. The increase being much greater than the proportionate increase of population, to what circumstances must these things be ascribed?"

The New York Chronicle says:—

"Never was crime more rampant than now. Garroting, burglary, stabbing, fraud, lewdness, forgery, embezzlement, and every imaginable form of wrong, cruelty, and murder, meet us at every turn."

The Christian Sun says:—

"Alas! what are we hastening to. Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed for their wickedness. Let us tremble when we think on the wickedness of our own land, and pray that God, in his infinite mercy, may pity us."

We need not multiply evidence upon this point, as no one with eyes and ears can fail to perceive that wickedness of every description is fearfully prevalent, not only in cities and towns, but in every little village, aye, in almost every household!

Is it true that because iniquity abounds the love of many is waxing cold?

Says the Christian Herald:—

"It is a fact that about in the same ratio that the cause of experimental religion declines, immorality and vice increase."

Another paper in giving the statistics of the various religious denominations in New York adds: "Such are some of the statistics of spiritual declension, while, as a contrast to this picture, we have six thousand grog shops and twenty-five hundred brothels!" Look also at the character of the great mass of professors of religion. Can they be distinguished from men and women of the world, by their daily life, their conversation, their humility, or their zeal in the cause of God? Truly the love of many doth wax cold.

Is it a fact that men are covetous in these days?

Says Dr. Gifford:—

"The world! the world! This is the object which engrosses every care; this is the supreme deity that is adored. Buy and sell, and get gain—out with the thoughts of death—away with the judgment and Heaven—my farms, my merchandise; I will have them, though the earth trembles under my feet, and Heaven weeps blood upon my head!"

Look at the conduct of many of those who are engaged in government service, and positions of responsibility. The papers teem with accounts of embezzlements, frauds and forgeries, crimes which are all caused by covetousness. Look too at the short measures, light weights, adulterated articles of food, and poison liquors, which characterize the commercial transactions of the day, resulting from that inordinate "love of money" which is a "root of all evil," and behold in all this the evidence that covetousness prevails in our day to an alarming extent.

Can it be true that the long list of crimes which the apostle tells us should characterize the last days are now prevalent in our midst? Are children disobedient to parents, unholy and unthankful? Are there traitors, truce-breakers and false accusers in these days? Are people heady, high-minded, proud, despisers of those that are good? Are they lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God? Alas! the evidence thickens and rolls heavily upon us, compelling us to recognize these facts as foreboding and significant "signs of the times."

But leaving the contemplation of this painful topic, we pass to notice the evidences under the third and last division of our subject, embracing those testimonies which are derived from facts and phenomena in nature. The apostle Peter tells us that the last-day scoffers will be saying that "all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." Now as they are scoffing at those who are giving "the promise of his coming," it must be evident that this promise is based, at least in part, on the fact that all things have not continued as they were from the beginning. Let us look for a moment at the condition of things as they were when fresh from the hand of the Creator, and see if they have thus continued ever since. When God had completed the work of creation he "saw everything that he had made and behold it was very good." The glorious beauties of paradise, the perfect work of a perfect Creator, lay stretched before him, as designed for the happy abode of sinless beings. But what a change takes place as man rebels and by his disobedience becomes unfitted for such a habitation. A curse is placed upon the earth which had been created perfect, and the ground thenceforth is to bear thorns and thistles, and man is to sweat and toil until he returns to earth again. Then commences the decay of nature. The curse rests heavily upon everything which before was lovely and harmonious, and all things seem to conspire to remind man of his fallen condition. Even the denizens of the forest assume a hostile attitude, and he who was intended to be "lord of creation" finds the whole creation rebelling against his authority. As time passes on, the effects of the curse are felt on every hand. The days of man are shortened, and instead of living nearly a thousand years as did the first inhabitants of earth, we find the term of life growing shorter and shorter, and man himself growing weaker and weaker. The earth itself, cursed on man's account, begins to grow less and less productive, fulfilling the words of the prophet Isaiah, who declares that "the earth shall wax old like a garment."

As we approach the consummation of all things, these effects will multiply and increase with ten-fold rapidity, and will be apparent to those who are looking for the accomplishment of those things written in the prophetic word. In Isa. xxiv, 4-6 we find a prophecy describing the condition of things when the terrible effects of disobedience shall have been fully realized. "The earth mourneth and fadeth away, the world languisheth and fadeth away, the haughty people of the earth do languish. The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof; because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant. Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein are desolate: therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men left."

We might in this connection present an array of statistics showing the increasing unproductiveness of the earth, but a few simple facts will be sufficient. By consulting Herodotus and other reliable historians, we ascertain that a few centuries before the Christian era, the customary product of the harvest was three hundred fold; that is, for one bushel sown, three hundred were reaped. Passing down to the time of our Saviour, we learn from his use of the parable of the good seed, that the yield at that time was "some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold." Now, confining ourselves to facts within the memory of the present generation, there are many now living who can remember when grain produced thirty and forty fold. During the past half century, the proportion has rapidly decreased, and at the present time, even in the West, the "granary of the world," the crops are only about one-third as heavy as in former years, while in New England the decrease is proportionately greater.

The effects of the curse are also apparent in the fruit tree, the vine, and everything, in fact, that can furnish food for man.

In view of these facts it is surprising that people should be saying, "All things continue as they were from the beginning;" yet there are many who assert that "the world is yet in its infancy." If this were true, it would have a pitiable old age indeed.

Under this division of our subject we propose to introduce the testimony of our Saviour in the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, or more especially that portion of it which may be considered as relating to phenomena in nature. In order that this chapter may lose none of its force in the minds of the candid it may be necessary to answer

OBJECTION FIFTEENTH. It applies to the destruction of Jerusalem. There is a class of opponents of the Second Advent faith, who endeavor to make it appear that the second coming of Christ was at the destruction of Jerusalem. We trust it has already been made apparent that such a mythical interpretation is not admissible, yet there are some, who while they acknowledge the second advent as still future, profess to believe that the testimony of this chapter does not apply to it, but that it relates entirely to the destruction of that city. That such an interpretation is not allowable will be made evident as we examine the chapter itself. The disciples asked their Lord for something more than the signs of the destruction of Jerusalem. "Tell us when shall these things be? AND what shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end of the world?" If the "end of the world" took place at the destruction of Jerusalem, then those events which were to precede it, all transpired previous to A. D. 70. Let us see if this can possibly be true. "Nation shall rise against nation." Verse 7. As Rome was universal until the fourth century, no other power having a nationality, of course this could not be fulfilled previous to that time, or until nations should become developed, to rise against each other. "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Verse 14. Comment on this verse is unnecessary. "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Verse 30. All the tribes of the earth did not mourn at the destruction of the city, nor did they see Christ coming in the clouds of heaven. The whole tenor of this chapter is against the idea of its being applied to the destruction of Jerusalem, except those portions of it which directly relate to that event. But notwithstanding this, some will contract all this evidence into a narrow compass, and intrench themselves behind

OBJECTION SIXTEENTH. "This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." Now in order for this objection to have any weight, it must signify the generation on the stage of action in the time of our Saviour. But did that generation see all the signs, suffer the great tribulation, witness all the earthquakes in divers places, and endure all the famines and pestilences? Did they hear the last trumpet, and see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven? Surely such conclusions would be inadmissible, and more especially as our Saviour himself declared that no sign should be given to that generation but the sign of the prophet Jonas. Hence we are compelled to inquire further in regard to "this generation."

In order to understand the language in its true light, we should remember that this chapter is prophetic in its teachings, describing a series of events that were to transpire in the future. In examining the prophecies of our Saviour's first advent, as well as those of his second, we find that many of them were written in the present tense, and sometimes even in the past. As the holy prophets were presented with a view of future scenes, they recorded them as occurring in the present, and so we find expressions like this: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given," relating to the birth of Christ, but written seven hundred years previous.

The apostle Paul, also, in speaking of the glories of the resurrection, says: "We shall not all sleep," &c., and designates the generation which witnesses the glories of Christ's second advent, as "we which are alive and remain."

This method of interpretation applies to the text under consideration. Our Saviour gives the signs of his coming, carrying the mind down through all the varying scenes of the gospel age, to the generation which sees the last of these signs fulfilled, and then says, "This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." All what things? Why all those things which the signs were to precede; namely, the coming of the Son of man, the sounding of the last trump, and the gathering of God's elect. Reader, do you believe it? If it can be shown that we are now living in the generation which has witnessed the last of these signs, are we not in a time of solemn and thrilling interest? A time when we ought to be awake to a sense of our fearful proximity to the great day of God?

With a consciousness of the great importance of this subject, let us candidly look at the facts as they exist. He who spake as never man spake, in giving the tokens of his coming as near, declares that "immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the SUN BE DARKENED and the MOON SHALL NOT GIVE HER LIGHT, and the STARS SHALL FALL FROM HEAVEN." As if to show the importance of these events as the great landmarks by which the church is to know its whereabouts, inspiration has thrice repeated them in different portions of the prophetic word, as the precursors of that awful day of final reckoning.

Now if these important phenomena can be distinctly located, so that there can be no doubt as to their actual fulfillment, we can well understand why our Saviour should tell us that when we have seen these things come to pass, we may know he is near, even at the doors. As there is to be a people who are to know something about these things, just as certainly as they know by the budding fig-tree that summer is nigh, why may not you and I be of that number?

Let us first look at the chronology of these events. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days." In a previous portion of the chapter, Christ refers us to "Daniel the prophet," and adds, "whose readeth, let him understand," implying that in order to completely understand his testimony we ought to know something of the prophecy of Daniel. As the occurrence of these events is to commence "immediately after the tribulation of those days," we want to know what those days are, and when they commence and end. By reference to the prophecy of Daniel we learn that the saints of God were to be given into the hands of the papacy to suffer tribulation and persecution, and that the dominion of this power was to be twelve hundred and sixty years. As attempts have recently been made to unsettle the long established methods of computing chronology and interpreting periods, we may be pardoned for dwelling somewhat minutely upon this point. We learn in Dan. vii, 25, that "the saints of the Most High" are given into the hands of this persecuting power, "until a time and times and the dividing of time."

In Rev. xii, 14, this period is again brought to view. The "woman" (signifying the church) is driven into the wilderness, "where she is nourished for a time, and times and half a time, from the face of the serpent." These periods are thus shown to be identical, and upon the established rule that a "time" signifies a year, we have three and a half prophetic years as the period of time covering the duration of the papacy as a dominant power over the church of God. Reducing it to months, we have forty-two months ($3\frac{1}{2} \times 12 = 42$), and this assures us that we are right thus far; for by reference to Rev. xiii, 5, we find a prophecy of the papal beast, and learn that "power was given unto him to continue forty and two months." Carrying our reduction still further, reckoning thirty days to the month, we have a period of twelve hundred and sixty days ($42 \times 30 = 1260$). Now to prove that this is also correct, we refer to Rev. xii, 6, where we learn that "the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore [1260] days." As a prophetic day signifies a literal year, we have, then, 1260 years as the period during which the saints of the Most High are given into the hands of this persecuting power. We have already shown that the establishment of the papacy was accomplished by the plucking up of the last of the three horns (the Ostrogoths) in the year 538. Now if our conclusions are correct, this civil power will endure 1260 years, or until 1798. Did anything take place at that time to mark the termination of that period? Yes; on the 10th of February, 1798, Berthier under Napoleon, entered Rome, took the pope and cardinal prisoners, and the same year Rome was declared a Republic. Thus the Roman Catholic church lost its civil power, and the saints were no longer in its hands.

Now we are prepared to understand the words of our Saviour. He says: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days," &c. The parallel account in Mark says, "In those days after that tribulation," showing that the tribulation ceased before the days expired. This is confirmed by his words in Matt. xxiv, 21, 22. In speaking of this tribulation he says that "except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake, those days shall be shortened; and we learn from history that the tribulation was materially checked by edicts of toleration, and thus shortened in 1778. Now as the fulfillment of these signs was to commence "immediately after the tribulation of those days," and yet "in those days," we are restricted to a time between 1778 and 1798, in which to find the darkening of the sun. Did it take place within that time? Most assuredly it did, and was fulfilled in the memorable "dark day" of May 19, 1780. The following extracts will show how the phenomenon was regarded at that time. Says a correspondent from Newport, May 20th, 1780, when speaking of the dark day:

"About ten o'clock, A. M., a darkness came on, which by eleven was perceived to be very unusual and extraordinary, and in half an hour after, was considered as what was never before seen in the northern climates of America. The darkness became and continued so intense, from a little before noon to near two o'clock, as that persons could not read, and it became necessary to light up candles. . . . It is not recollected from history that a darkness of equal intenseness and duration has ever happened in any parts of the world, except the miraculous eclipse at the crucifixion of our blessed Saviour. . . . It is to be desired that curious and philosophical gentlemen would favor the public with a solution of this phenomenon."

"Hon. Wheeler Martin has favored the editor of the Providence Subaltern with the following recollections of the dark day in 1780, on the 19th of May: 'Where I resided at that time, the darkness at eleven o'clock was so great that a candle was lighted and placed upon the table; the fowls went to roost; the sheep all huddled around in a circle, with their heads inward; the grass, to look at it through the window, seemed of a yellow green, the same as to look through smoked glass upon green grass. I well remember that the gentleman of the house read the following scripture by candle-light, to his numerous family. 'The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come.'"

"And the moon shall not give her light." This was fulfilled on the night following the dark day, when the moon, although in the full, utterly refused to shine. Some conception of the intensity of this darkness may be formed by reading the follow extract from the History of the American Revolution, by Wm. Gordon, D. D., Vol. iii, p. 57.

"This day (May 19th 1780) has been rendered very remarkable by an extraordinary phenomenon, which demands a particular relation." Speaking of the darkness of the night, he remarks: "The horses could not see to direct themselves, and by the manner in which they took up and put down their feet on the plain ground, appeared to be involved in total darkness, and to be afraid lest the next step should plunge them into an abyss. The gentleman soon stopped at another tavern, and waited for the benefit of the moon; but after awhile, finding that the air received no accession of light from it, when they were certain it had risen, they had recourse to candles to assist them in getting home. In some instances horses felt the forcible operation of the darkness so strongly that they could not be compelled by their masters to quit the stable at night when wanted for particular service—such profound darkness."

Rev. Mr. Tenney of Exeter, N. H., says, "I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete."

"And the stars shall fall from heaven." Of course we do not expect that the literal stars and planets will fall from their places in the heavens, as such a thing would be impossible. The term aster, translated star, was understood by the ancients as denoting a meteor, such as the star which went before the wise men to Bethlehem, which no one will claim was a literal planet or heavenly body.

This prophecy was fulfilled in the meteoric shower of Nov. 13, 1833. We here give an extract from an article written by Henry Dana Ward, in regard to the falling stars of Nov. 13th 1833, published in the Journal of Commerce, Nov. 15th, 1833.

"At the cry, 'Look out of the window,' I sprang from a deep sleep, and with wonder saw the east lighted up with the dawn and meteors. The zenith, the north, and the west also, showed the falling stars, in the very image of one thing, and only one, I ever heard of. I called my wife to behold; and while robing, she exclaimed, 'see how the stars fall!' I replied, 'that is the wonder!' and we felt in our hearts, that it was a sign of the last days. For truly 'the stars of heaven fell unto the earth even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. vi, 13. This language of the prophet has already been received as metaphorical: yesterday, it was literally fulfilled.

"The ancients understood by aster in Greek, and stella in Latin, the smaller lights of heaven. The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore, the idea of the prophet, as it is expressed in the original Greek was literally fulfilled in the phenomenon of yesterday.

"And how did they fall? Neither myself, nor one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy before quoted.

"The stars fell, 'even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet. The falling stars did not come as if from several trees shaken, but from one: those which appeared in the east fell toward the east; those which appeared in the north fell toward the north; those which appeared in the west fell toward the west; and those which appeared in the south (for I went out of my residence into the Park) fell toward the south. And they fell not as the ripe fruit falls. Far from it; but they flew, they were cast like the unripe fruit, which at first refuses to leave the branch; and when, under a violent pressure, it does break its hold, flies swiftly, straight off, descending; and in the multitude falling, some cross the tracks of others, as they are thrown with more or less force, but each one falls on its own side of the tree. Such was the appearance of the above phenomenon to the inmates of my house."

The following from Prof. Olmstead, of Yale College, a distinguished meteorologist, shows how the phenomenon was regarded by the scientific world:

"The extent of the shower of 1833 was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the east, to the Pacific on the west; and from the northern coast of South America, to undefined regions among the British Possessions on the north, the exhibition was visible, and everywhere presented nearly the same appearance.

"The meteors did not fly at random over all parts of the sky, but appeared to emanate from a point in the constellation Leo, near a star called Gamma Leonis, in the bend of the sickle.

"This is no longer to be regarded as a terrestrial, but as a celestial phenomenon; and shooting stars are now to be no more viewed as casual productions of the upper regions of the atmosphere, but as visitants from other worlds, or from planetary voids."

Thus, dear reader, have the signs been hung out in the sky for the contemplation of all who are disposed to give heed to their warning testimony. Our Saviour admonishes us that when we have seen all these things we are to know that he is near, even at the doors. Will you shut out from your senses the solemn admonition, and reject the merciful warning? or will you give heed to it, and take your position among those who watch and wait for their Lord from Heaven?

We have as yet presented but a small portion of the testimony on these points, but must draw to a close, as we have already expanded this article beyond its original limits. If we have succeeded in removing objections from your mind, so that the doctrine of the soon coming of Jesus assumes a new interest to you, and to such an extent as to create a desire for truth, and a disposition to search for it, our object is accomplished. And may the Lord help us to make the needed preparation for the event, that we may meet in his everlasting kingdom, for his dear Son's sake. Amen.

URIAH SMITH, EDITOR.

The Ministry. No. 3.

THE proper support of the ministry is a subject which demands careful attention. That the minister has wants, and that he must depend on the church to supply them while he gives his time to the work of his high calling, no sane man will deny. On this point discussion is unnecessary. "The laborer is worthy of his hire." Luke x, 7. These words were spoken by Christ in reference to the labors and support of his ministers. But the institution of a system by which gospel laborers may receive according to their works, and this is certainly just, is a matter which calls for close investigation. It is as true to-day, as it was eighteen centuries since, that the laborer is worthy of his hire. And we affirm that it is equally true that the hire is worthy of its labor.

In the summing up of the accounts of men in the final judgment, all are to receive according to their works. None will deny the justness of this course then. And why is it not the will of God that it should be carried out now with those merciful exceptions which circumstances may seem to demand, in the support of the ministry?

The plan of systematic benevolence adopted by Seventh-day Adventists for the support of the ministry is complete in all its parts. It is in harmony with both mercy and justice. Its claims upon the poor are so very light, and upon the wealthy so just, that both embrace it, and cheerfully act upon it. By this system all that was disagreeable in raising means formerly for the support of the ministry is done away, and the willing task under the present system becomes a bond of union to the church.

In this matter our people act nobly. And they have a right to demand that their free-will offerings be properly appropriated to those who labor for the advancement of the cause of truth. Our system of raising means is complete. But, up to the present time, for want of system in labor, and a proper and careful regard for justice and mercy in the disbursement of the means so liberally and cheerfully cast into the treasury, great mistakes are made. To illustrate: Eld. Loughborough, during last Conference year, labored in New England, absent from his family at one time about nine months, laboring incessantly, with his worn and feeble strength, accomplishing two strong men's work, received nearly the amount to meet actual expenses. Under these circumstances, and much reduced in strength and flesh, he cheerfully seizes the work in the West, to build up what some of our liberally-supported ministers there have torn down. In the same Conference to which Eld. Loughborough belongs is a young preacher, not yet suitably proved to receive ordination, who did not accomplish last Conference year one-tenth what Eld. L. did, and yet he did receive from the hands of the disbursing committee nearly the amount paid to our active, experienced, and efficient Bro. Loughborough, so that this young man after being well cared for at the homes of the brethren, and well clothed, had a surplus at the close of the Conference year of more than two hundred dollars.

Now we do not hesitate to say that unless such injustice can be prevented, and the means in the treasury be disbursed as nearly as possible to every man according to his work, we cannot longer in any way sustain our present system of raising means. But existing wrongs must be corrected, and our system of benevolence saved from ruin.

We propose, as the best thing that can be done at present,

1. That one or more of the Gen. Conf. Com. attend all the State Conferences; and as they are best acquainted with the labors of ministers throughout the wide field, and the condition of the different State treasuries, and the Gen. Conf. treasury, they act as counsel in the just recompense for ministerial labor in the different States.

2. That as soon as possible there be established equality, in all the States from Maine to Minnesota, in the compensation for ministerial labors.

3. That each minister keep a record of every day of the week during the year, where he has been, and what he has accomplished, and that this record be submitted to the inspection of the financial committee of the Conference to which he belongs, to receive from the Treasury according to his work, and the fruits of his labor. Conference in session need not be detained by these tedious reports.

We think it not enough to count the minister's sermons during the year. Has he labored among the churches? Let his report show what he has done for the churches. Has he labored in new fields? Let his report show how many he has brought to the truth, and whether they are persons of good moral standing in community, who will do honor to the cause of truth, or persons of no standing and influence in community. We cheerfully bid all, high or low, rich or poor, bond or free, a hearty welcome to all the blessings of the truth, to purify, sanctify, elevate, and save them. But we confess ourselves thoroughly disgusted with the flaming reports of numbers of those who call themselves to the work, and come down in style and manners to suit the taste of a class who have no reputation to sacrifice, hence, no cross in embracing the truth. This class of ministers can convert more of their kind to the Sabbath than Elders Andrews, Loughborough, Cornell, Ingraham, and others, can convert of their kind. Yes, they will go out with our publications and scrape them up into the Sabbath, then give a flaming report of numbers; but many of these, after disgracing the Sabbath cause for a while, slide out of it as easily as they slid in. Hence we say, in considering a minister's labors, the moral rectitude of the persons brought to the truth by him should be considered.

All competent committees, will, however, know how to take into the account all the circumstances that surround ministers in their labors, and do all in their power for their encouragement. But we may justly appeal to all who cheerfully cast into the treasury of their hard-earned liberalities, that when they hire a man to labor, they not only take into the account the amount of labor performed, but, also, the manner in which it is done. As things now stand, in some States, men are paid alike for building up, and for tearing down; for serving God, or for serving Satan; for active labor every day, or for waiting at home for the storm to subside, the mud to dry, the snow-drifts to be broken, or the weather to become cooler.

We see no reason why ministers cannot labor, sixty hours at least out of every week, as well as men of other callings. We affirm that they can. Having labored more than seventy-two hours in each week for the last fifteen years, we are prepared to judge in this matter. Our manner of life has been to study and preach on the Sabbath, and then during the other six days of the week be actively engaged in the editorial and business departments of the Review Office. We say, Let every minister who desires health, activity of mind, and buoyancy of spirits, work at least ten hours each day. He can study with his might five hours, visit from house to house with his might four hours each day, and each day preach one hour, instructing and arousing the people with living thought from his vigorous and well-disciplined mind. He has then left him fourteen hours for sleep, recreation, prayer and meditation.

The farmer toils all day with the monotony of his work, the blacksmith swings the sledge and hammer, and blows the smutty bellows all day long, the printer stands picking type, as a hen picks up corn, all day

Letters.

"Then they that feared the Lord, spake often one to another."

This department of the paper is designed for the brethren and sisters to freely and fully communicate with each other respecting their hopes and determinations, conflicts and victories, attainments and desires, in the heavenly journey. Seek first a living experience and then record it, carefully and prayerfully, for the comfort and encouragement of the other members of the household of faith.

From Sr. Haskell.

BRO. WHITE: We received our Review, No. 23, just in time to take it with us as we met on Friday to unite our petitions with God's people in behalf of his afflicted servants. At the close of the meeting the article from H. C. Miller, under the title, "Our days of Fasting," was read, and met with a ready response, by reducing to practice the suggestion therein made. We as a church freely donated $8.00, for paper. There were others providentially with us that donated to the amount of $4.00. Our numbers are few, and our means limited, but we feel it a privilege to cast in our mite. We shared largely of the blessing of the Lord, especially Sabbath afternoon. We felt as though the Lord heard prayer for his afflicted servants, and was blessing them with strength, and also granting us some of the droppings from the sanctuary, of his holy Spirit, for which we felt to praise his name and take courage.

From Bro. Hull.

BRO. WHITE: The last four days form an important era in the history of the Advent church here. Our meetings were well attended during the fast, and from the first day a spirit of deep solemnity seemed to rest upon the Lord's people here. The interest increased toward the close. Yesterday the mighty power of God was felt by all the house. Some who have been friendly to us were with us yesterday, and were almost persuaded to go with us. May the Lord help them soon to decide. They joined with God's people in their tears. The opinion is general here that the Lord is about to manifest himself to his people in mighty power.

Your brother in hope,

Extracts from Letters.

Sr. Bliven writes from Laurel Glen, Conn.: I feel rejoiced to hear from you through the Review. I hail its weekly visits. It gives me renewed strength. I am trying to keep all the commandments of God, and hope to meet you all when Christ shall come to receive all that obey him. I would not give up that hope that is an anchor to the soul, for worlds like this. Pray on, brethren and sisters, we shall all meet to sing the song of redeeming grace. The time draws near.

Bro. C. Cramer writes from New Baltimore, Mich.: I would just say that I have been trying to keep the commandments of God since the first of last March. My sister was living with us, and she takes the Review. I began to read it, and also the Bible, and the History of the Sabbath, and found that if we would enter into the kingdom of God we must keep all his commandments. Myself and wife and sister are all the Sabbath-keepers there are in this place, and Memphis is the nearest place we have to go to meeting, which is 16 or 18 miles from here. If some of the messengers could call this way our door is open for them. We live two miles west of New Baltimore village, on the telegraph road in Macomb Co., Mich. I believe we are living in the very last days, and it stands us in hand to live up to the rules laid down in the Bible. I beg an interest in the prayers of God's people that he may count us worthy of a seat at his right hand.

Sister Kellogg writes from Kickapoo, Wis.: It is cheering to me to hear from others of like faith; to hear of their determinations to press forward to the kingdom. The Lord is good to me, unworthy as I have been. I feel to praise his holy name for what he has done for me, in showing me present truth, and giving me a disposition to embrace the same. It makes me feel solemn when I hear of those that have been leaders in the cause of God, now trying to lead the little band of Sabbath-keepers astray, and break down the cause they have been building up. I feel to cry, O Lord, keep me from falling. I am determined to be more faithful, and be one of the watching, waiting ones, that when he, our Saviour comes, he will welcome me to joys immortal.

Bro. Littlefield writes from New Shoreham, Block Island, R. I.: The Lord has blessed us wonderfully in this place, while Satan is still trying to overcome and destroy the people of God. But I bless God that his power is above the wicked One, and that we yet have the privilege of meeting together to praise God, and to tell of his goodness, and to encourage one another to hold on and endure to the end.

Obituary Notices.

DIED, in the village of Oronoco, Minn., April 8, 1866, Nancy E. Bostwick, aged 11 months and 12 days, only daughter of Sr. Jane Bostwick. Thus within less than six years has Sr. Bostwick been called to part with a companion and three children. She is now left with only one child to journey through this world of sorrow, but not as those who have no hope. The light of revelation comes to cheer the mourner's heart, and points to that blessed morning when God's people shall be gathered home and the children shall come again from the land of the enemy.

H. F. LASHIER.

DIED, at his residence in Vevay, Ind. Co., Mich., May 9, of congestive chills, my father, R. H. Titus, in the 71st year of his age.

J. E. TITUS.

DIED, in Springbrook, Dunn Co., Wis., Apr. 18, 1866, Edgar B., son of Warren and Laura E. Sutliff, aged two years eight months and thirteen days. We bow in humble submission to the chastening rod, and ask God to raise our loved one to immortality and everlasting life.

W. SUTLIFF.

DIED, in Durand, Wis., May 13, of consumption, Esabelle Rosenburg, aged 19 years. Sister Rosenburg heard the message some time last winter, but did not come out into the truth until three or four weeks before her death, when she expressed a determination to keep the commandments. Her last days were peaceful and showed unmistakable signs of conversion. She died in hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave.

W. SUTLIFF.

DIED, in Otsego, May 1st, 1866, Lewis H. Travers, aged 6 years, and 6 days. The disease which caused his death, was congestive chills. Lewis was an interesting member of the Sabbath School, striving for the prize. He said a short time before he died, "If I do die, God will raise me up again in a little while." God grant it may be so, and that all the rest of the scholars, and all the little Sabbath-keepers may so live, that "God will raise them up in a little while," is our prayer.

I. LELAND.

DIED, in Mannsville, N. Y., April 20, 1866, Wm. Henry Brigham, in the 47th year of his age. The circumstances of Bro. B.'s death were very afflictive. He was with us at our last Monthly Meeting at Adams' Center, full of life and hope, leaving a good testimony for the truth. Returned home with a firm determination to set his house in order, and serve his God with undivided affection. He went to his work feeling very solemn in view of the time in which we are living. At family prayer, Monday evening, he was affected to tears, pleading for his children. Tuesday, about 9 A. M., while working with a circular saw, a pile of lumber fell on him, throwing or crushing him on the saw, cutting a gash about eight inches long and three inches deep, beginning about two inches above the left ear, passing between the eye and cheek bone, touching the nose and ending just above the right corner of the mouth. He thought at first he should die at once. He exhorted his two sons to be good and meet him in Heaven. He soon lost so much blood he was helpless. I saw him that evening, he then thought he would recover. I thought the Lord would raise him up. But a fatal blow had fallen. He lingered till Friday, 8 A. M., when he went to sleep, and did not awake. He died at 4 P. M.

On first-day a large congregation met at the Methodist meeting-house, which was kindly offered, to pay the last tribute of respect, and to take him to his last resting place. He was beloved by all. He leaves a wife and four children who deeply mourn. The church feel his loss much.

C. O. TAYLOR.

DIED, in Brookfield, Vt., April 21, 1866, Hannah Whitney, aged 96 years, 6 months and 15 days. Sister Whitney embraced the Sabbath of the Lord when between 80 and 90 years old, which she observed with delight.

She recollected well the dark day of 1780; had long been in the service of her divine Master; and when called to lay aside the weapons of her Christian warfare, she was comforted with the bright hope of eternal life, when the Lifegiver comes.

Funeral discourse preached from Titus i, 2.

Blessed are those that mourn, for they shall be comforted.

NOTHING TO DO.

"Nothing to do!" in this world of ours,
Where weeds spring up with the fairest flowers,
Where smiles have only a fitful play,
Where hearts are breaking every day!

"Nothing to do!" thou Christian soul!
Wrapping thee round in thy selfish stole!
Off with the garments of sloth and sin!
Christ thy Lord hath a kingdom to win.

"Nothing to do!" there are prayers to lay
On the altar of incense, day by day;
There are foes to meet, within and without;
There is error to conquer, strong and stout.

"Nothing to do!" there are souls to teach,
The simplest forms of Christian speech;
There are hearts to lure with loving wile,
From the grimmest haunts of sin's defile.

"Nothing to do!" there are lambs to feed
The precious hope of the Church's need;
Strength to be borne to the weak and faint;
Vigils to keep with the doubting saint.

"Nothing to do!" there are heights to attain,
Where Christ is transfigured yet again,
Where earth will fade in the vision sweet,
And the soul press on with winged feet.

"Nothing to do!" and thy Saviour said,
"Follow thou me, in the path I tread."
Lord, lend thy help, the journey through,
Lest, faint, we cry, "So much to do!"

The Sermon.

I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom,
PREACH THE WORD. 2 Tim iv, 2.

THE SECOND ADVENT.

BY ELD. JOSEPH BATES.

"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into Heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into Heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into Heaven." Acts i, 11.

HERE is infallible proof that our blessed Lord and Saviour will come the second time, and that coming will be as personal and visible to those then living on the earth, as it was to those who saw him going from their midst up into Heaven, after closing his mission here at his first advent.

For further proof, we will go back from this thrilling scene some six weeks, to where Jesus and the same disciples passed through a sorrowful scene at midnight in the garden of Gethsemane, where he said unto them, "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." John xiv, 1-3.

In verses 28, 29, he says: "I go away, and come again unto you. . . . I go unto the Father; for my Father is greater than I. And now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass, ye might believe." When these faithful followers of their Lord and Master came to compare these promises with the testimony of the angels in our text, how could they otherwise believe than that Jesus was gone to his Father and would come again and take all his faithful followers to his Father's house in Heaven?

Again, the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew and onward to the fourteenth verse of the twenty-fifth chapter, contains a prophetic discourse from our Lord Jesus Christ, in which he speaks of the great events connected with the people of God, from his first advent down to his second coming. In this discourse, our Lord has pointed out the most important events with which his professed followers were to be connected from the time of his first to his second advent; such as the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70. From thence, the tribulation of the Christian church by the dreadful persecuting powers of Pagan, and the 1260 years of Papal Rome, for more than sixteen hundred years. From thence follow the special signs of his second advent, viz., the darkening of the sun and moon in A. D. 1780, and the falling stars in A. D. 1833, and the parable of the budding fig-tree, to prove that then, viz., in 1833, He (Christ) was near, even at the doors. But let us examine some of this important testimony of our Lord and Saviour, and see if it is in agreement with what we have here stated.

Matt. xxiv, 3. "And as he sat upon the Mount of Olives, the disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Here are two questions asked, and both are answered distinctly and separately. The first question relates to the destruction of the temple, and also the city of Jerusalem. The second, to his second coming and the end of the world. From the fifth to the fifteenth verses, our Lord gives a brief statement of events that would take place before the end of the world. From thence, in verse 15, he begins to answer the first question of his disciples,

WHEN SHALL THESE THINGS BE?

Answer. "When ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place (whoso readeth, let him understand)." Verse 15. Turning to the prophecy of Daniel, we read as follows: "And the people of the Prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the Sanctuary, and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined." Chap. ix, 26. Luke's record of Jerusalem's destruction, says: "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh." Chap. xxi, 20. Josephus, who writes the history of the destruction of the city and sanctuary of Jerusalem, A. D. 70, shows that this "Prince" was Titus Vespasian with the Roman army, whose father was at that time emperor of Rome. Here is a clear prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman armies, which answers most definitely the first question, which is not so much as named again in this discourse.

Continuing on from the answer to this first question, our Lord follows on in one connected and continued chain of prophecy covering the space of some 1800 years, in answer to the second question.

"AND WHAT SHALL BE THE SIGN OF THY COMING AND OF THE END OF THE WORLD?"

"Then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains. Let him which is on the house-top not come down to take anything out of his house; neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. And woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days? But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day; for then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." Verses 16-22.

As we have already shown, the answer to the first question carried us in the history of the world to the destruction of Jerusalem, in the year A. D. 70, which was thirty-nine years after the gospel dispensation had commenced. In A. D. 64, six years before the destruction of Jerusalem, the apostle Paul declared that the gospel had been preached "to every creature under heaven." Col. i, 23. It is therefore evident that the warning and tribulation here spoken of by our Lord was to his professed followers wherever they had been gathered into the Christian church; and not to the Jews as some have supposed; for when Jerusalem was destroyed they ceased forever to be the "elect" people of God; for in A. D. 44, some twenty-six years before their dispersion, "the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch." Acts xi, 26.

Verses 20 and 21 show plainly that the tribulation was to commence with those Christians who were to flee out of the city. "But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day; for then shall be great tribulation," &c.

We follow them in their flight to the mountains, and then pass along down through the noted persecutions of the Christian church under Pagan Rome; and we see their tribulation. Read Rev. ii, 9, 10, and see how our Lord and Saviour viewed it. And when we come to the period of Papal persecution we see them suffering the most cruel torture that wicked men and demons could inflict. That church represented by a harlot was "drunken with the blood of the saints and with the martyrs of Jesus." Rev. xvii, 6.

Says Daniel, "I beheld and the same horn (papacy) made war with the saints and prevailed against them, until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High. . . . And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints," &c. "And the woman (Christian church) fled into the wilderness, where she had a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and three score days." Rev. xii, 6.

All of this, and much more, taken in connection with Fox's Book of Martyrs and the History of the Church, is so generally admitted, we will add but few words more on this point. The thousand two hundred and threescore days are also admitted to be the 1260 year's reign of the Papacy, commencing A. D. 538 and ending A. D. 1798, at which period the Pope was deposed and lost his supremacy.

Verse 22. "And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved, but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." If the days of the tribulation of the elect had not been shortened, "the martyrdom of the church would have continued down to 1798, in which event, in all human probability, no flesh of the elect would have been saved. But the reformation under Martin Luther and those associated with him, modified this tribulation and continued to restrain the rage of the Papacy until 1700, since which time, according to church history, there has been no general persecution against the church." As we have now passed down through the tribulation of the Christian church, we come to the

SIGN OF HIS COMING.

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Verses 29-31.

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," &c. This, we understand, was the notable dark day of May 19, 1780, of which so much is said in history. Although eighty-six years have passed since that time, no one has been able to account for it, only as a fulfillment of this prophecy. Mark makes it still plainer. "But take heed: behold, I have foretold you all things. But in those days after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened," &c. That is, in, or during those 1260 prophetic days of Papal supremacy. As the sun was darkened in the year 1780, after the tribulation of the church, it was still eighteen years before the ending of the prophetic days in 1798.

"The stars shall fall from heaven." We understand that this was the wonderful phenomenon which occurred in A. D. 1833, of which there are tens of thousands of witnesses still living. It is but a few weeks since the daily journals of both hemispheres were excited about it again, but obtained no further light than was known the next day after its occurrence thirty-three years ago. The reason is obvious; it was what was predicted by our Lord to follow the darkening of the sun, and it came as he foretold. Historical facts respecting these three signs in the heavens are numerous and wide-spread. For further information on this subject, we would refer our friends to the "Signs of the Times" and Brief Exposition of Matthew Twenty-four, by James White, Battle Creek, Mich.

"The powers of the heavens shall be shaken." We understand the powers of heaven are the sun, moon, and stars, "to rule over the day and over the night." Gen. i, 16-18. They are to be shaken by the voice of God yet future. Joel iii, 15, 16. "The sun and moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake," &c. See also Heb. xii, 26, 27; Rev. xvi, 17. Our Lord has foretold this as the next event to follow the falling stars from 1833.

"Sign of the Son of man in heaven." Here comes the fulfillment of the angel's testimony as shown in the text. "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Eighteen hundred years ago he passed out of their sight into the distant heavens; so he will now appear in like manner. This manifestation, though far distant in the vault of heaven, will signify to those who are looking for him that that is the sign of his personal appearing; and they will not be held long in suspense in this matter; for he has already told them in verse 27, "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be."

"Then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven." Then will cease forever all fruitless reasoning about his coming, and then men will cry for rocks and mountains to fall on them, and hide them from his presence; for then they will see him on the white cloud. From thence he will send his angels to gather his elect to take them to the mount Zion of God.

Verses 32, 33. "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it [he, margin,] is near, even at the doors."

What a beautiful illustration our Lord has here given, to inspire his followers with faith in his coming. Where is there an intelligent person that does not know when the trees of the field put forth their leaves, and the tender grass is springing up, that summer is approaching? So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things (or know that they have come), may know with the same certainty that the coming of Christ is near, even at the doors. The phrase, all these things in verse 33, could not, we think, refer to any other than these three signs, viz., in the sun, moon, and stars; for in this prophetic discourse, passing along over the events of the Christian church, our Lord was answering the second question asked him by his disciples, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and the end of the world?"

Again, our Lord says, "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." Luke xxi, 28. The signs began to come to pass with the darkening of the sun and moon in 1780. Then it could be said that the redemption of the church draweth nigh; and when the stars fell in 1833, then all the things, or signs, had come which were to be taken, according to the parable of the fig-tree, to show the coming of our Lord to be near, even at the doors.

Verse 34. "Verily I say unto you, this generation SHALL NOT PASS till all these things be fulfilled."

It has been said that our Lord spake of the generation then living who listened to his teaching. This could not be; for he said of that generation, "There shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas." Chap. xii, 39. It is evident that he was speaking here of the generation which commenced with the falling of the stars in 1833, which "shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." All of what things? Ans. All of the things spoken of to be fulfilled after the stars fall from heaven. The first in order, which is yet future, is the shaking of the powers of heaven; second, the sign of the Son of man; third, all the tribes of the earth mourning, and fourth, the coming of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory.

The Bible nowhere gives the number of years for a generation. Some have supposed that seventy years are one generation. That cannot be; for there are families that now number four generations. Matthew in his first chapter counts forty-two generations from Abraham to Christ. Luke, chapter iii, counts seventy-five generations from Christ to Adam. Every one of them are from father to son.

Joel's prophecy is for the last generation. See chapter i. In verses 1 and 2 he shows three generations inquiring about the dreadful state of things that is now closing in upon us. Let us flee to the strong hold for refuge.

As our Lord came to this point in his discourse, saying, "This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled," mark with what emphasis he gave utterance to this statement: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words SHALL NOT PASS AWAY."

Verse 35. Here we have the answer to the second question in his discourse brought down to the last generation so definite and clear that no reasonable, reflecting person may raise a single doubt. "But of that day and hour knoweth no man." But all men may know that the coming of the Son of man will be in this generation; which generation we understand commenced with the falling stars, where the parable of the fig-tree is given to show the coming of Christ to be near, even at the doors.

Says one, Doubtless this is all clear to you, but I claim that all these things were fulfilled eighteen hundred years ago at the destruction of Jerusalem, and then Christ came the second time. Let us test this matter. "Of all these things," there are six in which all the evangelists are agreed. 1. The darkening of the sun. 2. The moon shall not give her light. 3. The stars shall fall from heaven. 4. Shaking of the powers of heaven (yet in the future). 5. Mourning and wailing of the wicked. 6. The coming of the Son of man. See Mark xiii, 24-27; Luke xxi, 25-27. John was shown in vision as follows:

"And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood. And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every free-man, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" Rev. vi, 12-17.

We ask, Were all of these things fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem? Certainly not; for Jerusalem was destroyed A. D. 70, and John's revelation is dated A. D. 96, some twenty-six years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Further, John saw that these things would not begin to have their fulfillment until the sixth seal was opened at the time of the great earthquake, which historians show was in the year 1755. Then would follow the signs in the sun and moon and stars, &c.

The proclamation of the coming and kingdom of our Lord is for the last generation, and consequently will follow the falling stars. "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Verse 14. Whiting translates it, "good news of the kingdom," &c. Campbell says, "And this good tidings of the reign shall be published through all the world," &c. By comparing the 14th with the 3d verse, we understand that it is the proclamation of his coming and kingdom, and is in agreement with the first angel's message in the fourteenth chapter of Revelation, verses 6, 7: "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his Judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters."

Has the proclamation gone forth in this generation? A few historical facts will shed light here. One or two in every quarter of the globe have proclaimed the second coming of Christ. Wolfe, of Asia; Irving, late of England; Mason, of Scotland; Davis, of South Carolina; Wm. Miller, in the United States and the Canadas, from the falling stars in 1833. The first angel's message, quoted above, symbolizes a body of people preaching the message to their fellow-men. Seven years later, the movement had so far advanced, that a paper was sustained, setting forth its claims. In October 1840, the first Second Advent Conference was convened in Boston, Mass. From thence, the first angel's message symbolized a body of Advent believers preaching to their fellow-men, spreading books and papers far and wide. Conferences and camp-meetings were multiplying in various directions in the United States and the Canadas. Periodicals, pamphlets, and books, like falling leaves, were loading down the mails, rushing, by carriages, steamboats, and sailing ships, in all directions over land and sea, so that by 1843 the good news of our coming Saviour was "preached in all the world for a witness." Yes, it went "to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his Judgment is come." Such a universal, wide-spread, and rushing movement has never been witnessed since the deluge. Call it what you please, such an unmistakable momentous movement cannot be made again. Why? Because it was the proclamation of the second coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, given in the right place, and at the right time, to this last generation. God never does his work twice. How could he have the coming and kingdom of his dear Son proclaimed to the generation before the last, or to any other generation but the last; for they are the people who are to witness his glorious appearing. All the nations of the earth know they have heard it. They also know the time when it was sounding at their doors. Hence the prophetic declarations of our coming Lord are verified.

No marvel that the mind of the great apostle to the Gentiles was stirred within him when he heard and read about the second coming of his divine Master. With what confidence he could say in his letter to the Corinthians, "Behold, I show you a mystery: We shall not all sleep; but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Chap. xv, 51, 52.

And again to the Thessalonians: "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. iv, 15-18.

How comforting these words have been to the saints of all ages. And how much more so to them who are now looking for him, who have this assurance that he is coming in person and in like manner as he went up into Heaven eighteen hundred years ago.

"But of the times and seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you; for, yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night." Chap. v, 1, 2.

It appears that it was not necessary for those beloved disciples who saw their Lord going away from them into Heaven, to know the "times and seasons." Acts i, 7. But the watching, waiting ones of the last generation, who long for his appearing and kingdom, will not be in darkness respecting that day, but will see the clear light continually in their pathway.

As this delightful theme was so clearly open before this great and good man's vision, how fervent the prayer he offers up for them. "I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Verse 23.

Dear friends, let us all resolve that we will unite our earnest prayers with his, that we may improve the very short space of time allotted us here, that we may be found blameless in that day: that when we shall see the very same Jesus which was taken up into Heaven coming in like manner as he was seen going into Heaven, we can then say, "Lo, thus our God: we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." Isa. xxv, 9.

The faith which can truly say, My Shepherd! My Lord! My God! My Rock! turns prophecies into history, promises into deliverances, sorrows into joys, prisons into palaces, perils into victories, death into life. Nothing else can do as much.

THE LIKENESS QUESTION AGAIN.

THOUGH I have, from the power of example, transcended the bounds of propriety in a measure, in this matter, which I intend to do no more; yet I do not feel inclined to take an extreme view of the subject by denouncing picture-taking in a broad and unqualified manner, and go so far as to destroy the likenesses I have, or order others to do so, in imitation of the example of some East a few years since, against the teachings of the gift of prophecy (as I understand it), which afterward condemned such a rash and unwise course.

I do not even understand that the last testimony to the church, a fragment of which I see in Sr. White's acknowledgment in Review, No. 16, condemns picture-taking in every instance. If it does, why does Sr. W. say, "I was shown that picture-taking had been carried to too great lengths by Sabbath-keeping Adventists; and that much means had been spent in multiplying copies which was worse than lost?" If this was the mind of the Spirit in the matter, would not the production and testimony read something like this: "I was shown that picture-taking was wrong in every instance; that we should not go into it at all?" No, it is in carrying this matter "to too great lengths," and in expending "much means" in "multiplying copies," which "should have been invested in the cause of God," that we have done wrong.

Neither do I believe that taking likenesses within proper limits, is against the second commandment. If the first part of this commandment is to be taken in its broadest sense, without being limited by the latter part, then Jehovah himself is a violator of the moral law, of which we justly say that it is a duplicate of God's holy character, because he keeps every precept of it in its strictest sense. For Jehovah has in many instances commanded likenesses to be made of things in heaven and things in the earth. Then God gave laws to his ancient people clashing against each other, and they could not obey him. Then you must say that Jehovah set a bad example in causing two cherubims of glory to be made over the mercy-seat, looking with interest and sacred approval and respect to the law in the ark containing the second commandment, etc. Then we all err in having charts, in harmony with an injunction to make the truth plain. Then we should not even make a pattern of any thing, and no one keeps or can keep the second precept of the decalogue.

How plain it is that the first part of this precept is explained by the latter clause, "Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor serve them," and that it is making these things to worship them that is condemned by the law of God. Thus the second command explains itself. We have a similar instance in the fourth commandment, a portion of which reads, "In it (the seventh day) thou shalt not do any work." Who among us will take this part of the Sabbath law, disconnected from, and unexplained by, the rest of it, which shows that it is "thy work" which should not be done on the seventh day?

But any blessing can be abused and be made a curse and a source of sin, by the use we make of it, and I do not wish to encourage by my remarks the spirit that has prevailed among us on the likeness question. I admit there is far greater danger in indulging in this direction, than there is in abstaining. Yet I do not feel to censure those who, for instance, would receive the likeness of an absent wife, or husband, or child, or who would accept a cheap and plain picture of aged and respected parents, whom they may never see, or of a dying Christian sister who has been especially drawn out to get her picture taken for her absent brothers, etc. I cannot condemn those who in such circumstances would think that there can be no more harm in looking at the shadow or likeness of an absent friend, than there is to look at the reality; and that to look at the simple picture helps the mind to call up and keep in remembrance the qualities and virtues of the individual, especially if there is a lack of memory of form and faces.

But neither will I feel tried with any who should, through a desire to do right, deprive themselves of these privileges. I will respect such, as I should like to be respected by them. And I shall not get up a battle with those who are willing to deny themselves in that which is lawful to not have others do that which is unlawful; but will admire their love for the cause.

It may be urged that this is the position Sunday-keepers take with us. But this is not a parallel case. It is assuming a point without evidence. It is, in our humble opinion, begging a question against the example of Jehovah, and that of his ancient people, and against the conduct of all now living, in lawful and necessary things.

We repeat, we know there is danger of going to extravagance, as pointed out in prophecy, Isa. ii, and idolizing self, while we should be examining our characters in the light of God's law. There is danger of squandering means which we are responsible for, and which should be spent in the cause.

And in conclusion we would say, let all move in the fear of God in this matter; and let those who do not see as we do, simply carry out their convictions. In doing otherwise, they would sin against their own consciences. But let us enjoy our liberty before God, and we will love you, and will hope to so carry out the principles of God's law, that we may enjoy each other's society where there will be no separation and no mental deficiencies, and consequently no room for those subluxary things, which have called forth these remarks.

D. T. BOURDEAU.

I'M GOING HOME.

I'm going home—here have I no abiding;
I've looked around me in this world of care,
Though earth were all her wealth to me confiding,
I never could have built my home nest there.

I'm going home, for gently, surely closes,
Before the dawn, the evening-primrose pale;
The nightingale is hushed by summer's roses,
The brook flows faster through the last rough vale.

I'm going home, they have not comprehended
The silent longings of my wistful heart.
At last my weary prison time is ended,
The spell is broken, gladly I depart.

I'm going home, my bitter grief is over;
There's naught but joy and peace in store for me;
No marring touch shall you clear light discover,
Wounds roughly made, there healed for aye shall be.

I'm going home, by storms autumnal chastened,
Whilst others linger in an early spring;
The summer sun the ripening fruit has hastened,
The summer bird must soon be on the wing.

I'm going home, my pilgrim garb exchanging
For festal robes that mark the bridal day;
For heavenly crowns, at God's behest, I'm changing
My lily wreath, that soon would fade away.

I'm going home, the way's unknown, untrodden,
But one has passed those portals, e'en for me.
Have I his grace, his faithfulness forgotten?
No! through the clouds the Morning Star I see.

I'm going home, to thee my heart is given,
Lord Jesus, thou who erst didst give me peace;
'Tis through thy blood my sins are all forgiven,
Thy life is mine, I'm longing for release.

I've reached the goal, oh, I am weary, weary;
There come sweet whispers from the land of rest;
Earth is receding with her wastes so dreary,
I sleep, to wake upon my Saviour's breast?
—Meta Heusser Schweizer.

The Eclipse of the Soul.

THE moon, in an eclipse, complained to the sun:
"Why, O my dearest friend, dost thou not shine upon me as usual?"

"Do I not?" said the sun; "I am sure I am shining as I always do; why do you not enjoy my light as usual?"

"O! see," said the moon, "the earth has got between us."

"Why, O Saviour," says the backsliding Christian, "do I not, as in former days, walk in the light of thy countenance?"

"I am sure, troubled soul, I have not changed. The rays of my love are as warm and bright as ever; what can prevent them from reaching thee?"

Canst thou not see, O troubled Christian, that the earth has got between thee and Christ?

The Commentary.

Tell me the meaning of Scriptures. One gem from that ocean is worth all the pebbles of earthly streams.—M. Cheyne.

Glorifying God.

"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Matt. v. 16.

These are the words of our Saviour in his Sermon on the Mount. A good comment on the expression "glorifying God," as confined to the idea that those around us, even sinners, may be led to do this by seeing our good works, is found in Luke xxiii, 47:

"Now when the centurion saw what was done, he glorified God saying, Certainly this was a righteous man."

Here, the centurion, considering the character the Saviour had sustained, and the circumstances attending his death, was led to acknowledge that this was a righteous man; and in so doing he "glorified God." So we are to let our good works be manifested in such a way as to compel all with whom we come in contact, to acknowledge that the religion of Christ is not a dead letter, but a vital principle, moulding the life of its possessor, leading to purity of heart, and the manifestation of every virtue in all the relations of life. And when we so live as to lead others to acknowledge this, even though they may have no saving interest in the religion which we thus honor, they glorify God, and we fulfill the instruction of the Saviour.—Ed.

Revelation xxi, 4.

"And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes: and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away."

The Greek word ponos, here translated pain, comprehends toil, fatigue and excessive labor of body, as well as vexation and anguish of spirit.

Appropriate Comment.

"And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares." Luke xxi, 34.

The Family Bible, with notes, published by the American Tract Society, has the following appropriate reflection on the above passage:

"Excessive eating and drinking tend not only to produce various bodily diseases, but to blind the mind, stupefy the conscience, and corrupt the heart. Christians should not indulge in these sins, which unfit them for the discharge of their duty, and prevent their being prepared for the coming of Christ." G. W. A.

Notes on Genesis.

CHAPTER VI, verse 4. There were giants in the earth in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bear children to them, the same became mighty men which were of old, men of renown.

"Violent men of extraordinary stature and strength." Dutch Ann. Heidegger, Dodd, Rosenm. Calmet, Assemb. Ann. Ainsworth, Patrick, Robertson, Bush, Brown, Orton. "The Greek and Latin historians and poets, and particularly Pliny, relate that there were giants in the first ages of the world; and record that, on opening sepulchers, bodies of men have been found of larger than modern size."—Gleig.

Verse 14. Make thee an ark of gopher wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch.

Gopher-wood. "Cypress. So Calmet, Bochart, and Fuller, because of the similarity of names in the Heb. and Gr., the durability of the cypress, which was very fit for ship-building, and so used, and its abundance in Assyria where Noah built the ark. [So Heidegger.] Avenarius, Munster, Taylor, &c. think it was the pine, its relative gopher signifying sulphur, brimstone, &c., and no wood produces so much of these as the pine. After all, gopher may be a general name for resinous trees. [So Vossius.] Calmet, by Robinson.

Verse 15. And this is the fashion which thou shalt make it of: The length of the ark shall be three hundred cubits, the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits.

Ark. "After the nicest examination and computation, and taking the dimensions with the greatest geometrical exactness, the most learned and accurate calculators, and persons most conversant with the building of ships, conclude, that if the ablest mathematicians had been consulted about proportioning the several apartments in the ark, they could not have done it with greater correctness than Moses has done:" thus this narrative confirms the authority of Scripture, since this accuracy of proportion, in Noah's time, can be attributed only to inspiration." Wilkins, Saurin.

"The proportion of the ark is that of the size of a rightly framed man." Assemb. Ann. "If we reckon the cubit at 21 inches, the ark was 512 feet long, 87 wide, and 52 high; and the internal capacity, 357,600 cubical cubits. If the cubit was 18 inches, the length was 460 feet, width 75, and height 45. The height might be divided into four stories, allowing 3½ cubits to the first, 7 to the second; 8 to the third, and 5½ to the fourth; and allotting 5 cubits for the thickness of the top and bottom, and the floors. The first story, (not reckoned a story by Moses) might be the bottom, or hold, and contain fresh water; the second, a magazine; the third might contain the beasts; and the fourth the fowls." Calmet. "As to the number of beasts, it is not necessary to suppose that each species now known was represented, for naturalists are generally of opinion that their number has greatly increased, from the influence of climate, food, intermixture of races, &c. Dr. A. Clarke suggests that the genera of animals only was meant; if so, the land animals necessary to be preserved in the ark will number 43 genera of the mammals, (543 species,) 74 genera of birds, (2372 species,) 10 genera of amphibia, 316 land species. [Or, according to Cuvier, about 70 genera of land beasts, (including 5 fossil genera,) and 109 of birds.] Calmet calculates that all the four-footed beasts, including 3650 sheep (if necessary for the food of the carnivorous animals,) would scarcely occupy more room than 120 oxen, 3730 sheep and 80 wolves; and that all the beasts might easily have been lodged in 36 stables, and all the birds in as many lofts, allowing each apartment to be 52½ feet in length, 29 in width, and 13½ in height. The hold might contain 31,174 bushels of water: there was ample room for a much greater number than entered the ark—and for chambers &c. for the family of Noah. 'This,' says Boothroyd, 'Bp. Wilkins has proved, and that a first rate man of war would be capacious enough for the purpose.' 'Dispute,' says Rosemuller, 'as to the dimensions of the ark are vain, because measures vary so much with time.'—Jenks.

"No fact that ever occurred in the world is so well attested as the deluge, both by natural and civil history."—T. H. Horne.

"Heathen writers traditionally describe Noah under the various names of Xisuthrus, Saturn, [Annacus,] Prometheus, Deucalion, Ogyges, Liber or Bacchus, and Janus, &c. In the East the true name of Noah was better preserved; he was there called Noas, Naus, and sometimes contractedly Nous. Throughout the whole kindred family of languages, from India to us, the syllable Na or Nach is one of the fundamental sounds by which water and many ideas connected with it are designated, as navigate, &c. &c." Calmet, by Rob. and Bryant's Mythology.

"Of these traditions, that exhibited by Lucian is most correspondent to Moses."—Jenks.

"The most ancient writers, as Berosus the Chaldean, Abydenus the Syrian, Molo, Jerome the Egyptian, Mnaseas, and Nicholas of Damascus, as also Polyhistor, Lucian and Apollodorus have told of the ark, and the mountains on which it rested. Joseph Acosta and Antony Herrera relate, that traditions of the flood exist among the Cubans, Mechoacans, and Nicaraguans. Augustine Corata and Lopez Gómera relate the same of the Peruvians and Mexicans. Martin Martinus states that the Chinese have the same story." ["And the Bramins also." Gill.] Heidegger.

CHAPTER VII, verse 2. Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens, the male and his female: and of beasts that are not clean by two, the male and his female.

It is probable, that the clean beasts signify such as were not rapacious, and which were exclusively offered in sacrifice by the express appointment of God. The grant of animal food seems not to have been explicitly made before the flood; the distinction of meats could not therefore have been appointed.

Verse 7. And Noah went in, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him into the ark, because of the waters of the flood.

Sons' wives.—Though each of Noah's sons was at this time nearly a hundred years old, and none had children living; and the whole earth was to be desolated: yet no exception, even on this extraordinary occasion, was made to the original constitution of marriage, 'they twain shall be one flesh:' a decisive proof that polygamy is contrary to the original institution of marriage, and not at all needful for the increase of the human species, or even conducive to it. Malte-Brun observes, 'it diminishes population, and deteriorates the human race.'—Scott.

Verse 11. In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened.

"Every attempt to explain the manner, in which the earth was overflowed, too much resembled the presumption of those who inquired, 'How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?' It is no more incredible that God should drown the world, than that he should raise the dead: and, by his almighty power, he caused 'the waters from above the firmament, and the waters under the firmament,' which he had before separated, to meet together for that purpose. The patriarchal year began in September."—Scott.

Verse 19. And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth; and all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered.

"The highest eminence of the earth, every mountain of every region under heaven, where search has been made, all conspire in one uniform, universal proof, that they all had the sea spread over their summits; being found to contain shells, skeletons of fish, and sea-monsters of every kind."—Greenfield.

"It must be recollected, that the highest mountain—of near 27,000 feet—is but as 5 to 8,000, compared with the diameter of the earth; that is, on a globe of 12 feet in diameter, the highest mountain would rise above the surface but a few lines."—Jenks.

"Mr. Woodward supposes that the whole earth being dissolved in the waters, a new earth was formed, by different layers deposited according to their gravities. So that plants, and animals, particularly shellfish, not being dissolved, were enclosed in minerals and became 'fossils,' thus accounting for the shells found remote from the sea, and teeth, bones, petrified fishes, &c. found on the tops of mountains. See Robinson's Calmet. Besides geological evidences, traditions and coins have preserved the memory of the deluge over the whole earth."—Jenks.

A FEW LINES

For the Consideration of those who desire to be Christians.

We learn from the second chapter of James that "Faith without works is dead," and the sacred writer teaches in the next chapter that we cannot be true Christians having much faith and good works, unless our conversation be ordered aright. "Who is a wise man and endued with knowledge among you? let him shew out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom."

Let us see to it that we have a right feeling in our hearts toward our brethren and sisters when we attempt to add to knowledge temperance. The wisdom ye have descendeth not from above, "but is earthly, sensual, devilish," "if ye have bitter envying and strife in your hearts. Glory not and lie not against the truth." "But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." If you have aught against a brother, or if you feel that a brother have aught against you, go in a humble manner and be reconciled, then come and offer thy gift. Attempt not to pray with a feeling of bitterness in your hearts. It will do you no good. Ask for strength to do duty. Jesus has clearly pointed out the way. "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body." "But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison." We must commence with the heart; for "from the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." "But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation."

It is possible for us to become holy; but we cannot in our own strength. "But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot," that has been spilled for us on Calvary's height, and now is being offered in the most holy place before his Father for poor sinners, we may, if we look with faith to him, become pure in heart, "laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings."

We must be holy in all manner of conversation both at home and abroad. "Let the word of God dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord," and while at home about your work, "speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord."

I remember reading when I was quite small, about a father that told his children always to commence singing so soon as there was the least feeling of contention in their midst. This antidote worked like a charm. They could not sing and be angry at the same time. Let every family try it.

"Is any merry? let him sing psalms." What a pleasant way for young folks who feel happy to spend a few hours together; but let them say in their hearts, "I will sing with the Spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also." Especially should the young watch and be sober. The prevailing spirit of the day is to make light all "manner of conversation." They seem to forget that Jesus said "Let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." It is in these days as it was in the days of Lot, who was "vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked; for that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds." Paul says, "But fornication, and all uncleanness or covetousness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints; neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient, but rather giving of thanks." "Young men likewise exhort to be soberminded, in all things shewing thyself a pattern of good works; in doctrine shewing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you."

Can it be said that we use "sound speech" when every now and then some foolish by-word escapes our lips? "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." Some young persons may say, When we are with unbelievers must we keep still and say nothing? You may find an answer in Col. iv. "Walk in wisdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time. Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man." "Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another." "Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt have lost its savor wherewith shall it be salted?"

My young friends, if there is danger of the salt losing its savor, go to your secret place where none but God can hear, three times a day if need be, and plead with Jesus for a new supply. He will not turn you empty away; but your Father who seeth in secret will reward thee openly.

Some of the young are looking to older ones. They say, "Bro. — jokes." Perhaps the brother fills some responsible place in the church and should set a better example, or the blood of souls will be found on his garments in the last day. Oh! solemn thought! I would say to that young person, Let others do as they may, there is no excuse for you. Jesus is our pattern. "Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity."

"Likewise ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that, if any obey not the word, they also may without the word be won by the conversation of the wives, while they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear."

To all I would say, "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; for He is faithful that promised; and let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." "Look up and rejoice knowing that your redemption draweth nigh." Jesus is soon coming. Happy thought! Then, dear Christian, there will be no more trials and temptations; no more sighing, no more tears shed by you. When this earth is renewed, when she puts on her robes of Eden beauty, oh! how happy we shall be together roving over its extended plains without a thought of parting to shade the smiling brow! "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God." "Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace without spot, and blameless."

SABBATH EVE.

THE hallowed day of rest is here,
With all its peace and quietude;
E'en things inanimate appear,
With a sweet influence imbued.
Oh! that each spirit worn and pressed,
May feel its mild assuasive power,
And each emotion of the breast,
Be peaceful as this sunset hour.

And in these hours of calm repose,
We love to muse upon the plan,
That matchless love and wisdom chose,
To rescue erring, sinning man;
And of the promise—if we tread,
The thorny pathway Jesus trod,
We shall be heirs with him, our Head,
Adopted as the sons of God!

A few more days of conflicts here,
Of stormy wind, and beating rain;
A few more days of toil and care,
Of disappointment, tears, and pain.
And then if faithful we'll behold,
The glory that for us awaits,
The City's matchless charms untold,
And enter through the open gates.

But time is passing: soon we meet,
Within the house of God for prayer;
Our Father, may thy Spirit sweet,
Rest down on all that gather there.
And as we strive to do thy will,
Thy blessing grant as a reward;
That strength into our hearts instil,
That's promised when we serve the Lord.

And Father, may thy love attend,
Our every step along the way,
And back to thee our footsteps bend,
If to the right, or left we stray.
Prepare us, by thy grace to share,
In the refreshing from the Lord;
And fit us for those mansions where
The saints shall see their great reward.

MORAL BLINDNESS.

ONE of the greatest difficulties to be overcome in the work of human salvation, is moral blindness. If we could see things, and especially ourselves, in the true light, we could be induced to forsake our sins, correct our errors, and come to a saving knowledge of the truth. But our moral sense is perverted, especially in respect to our own depravity; and how can the remedy be applied to our heart and conscience, when we are ignorant of our disease and cannot see that we need any thing done for us? The difficulty is that we think we are rich and healthy and have need of nothing, when in fact we are poor and miserable, and wretched, and blind, and naked.

Under such circumstances, what hope can there be of our recovery? A short time since I wrote in respect to the Health Reform:

Treat the body according to reason; and reason will dawn in the mind. But this led to reflections like these: How can men treat their bodies according to reason, while the reasoning powers are perverted, and can only be restored to moral action by thus treating the body? If men had clearness of mind, they would correct the abuses of the body; but these abuses have stifled the voice of reason and conscience. What hope then of a recovery?

I come to the conclusion, that in order to save men from their state of depravity, physical, mental and moral, they must be led, by some means, to have faith in the assurances that come to them from without, and be led to act upon the word of others. The literally blind trust in the eye-sight of others. If the mentally and morally blind only knew their true condition and could be induced to follow implicitly the directions of the True Witness, and those who have, by following the same, got their eyes enlightened by the use of the genuine eye-salve, there would be hope of the recovery of their sight.

Thus we come to the doctrine of salvation by faith. Without faith it is clear that human salvation is impossible. The morally blind cannot see their true state. The insane cannot of himself discover his insanity; and he can hardly be convinced of the fact. So it is with the morally blind. And those who need help the most—those who are the blindest are the last to be convinced that they need anything. The blindest fancy that they see the clearest. Hence it is that but a few of the race can be induced to use the divine eye-salve. And hence it is that those who are induced by faith, to use it, discover more and more, as their sight improves, how terribly blind they were.

The wicked, the blind, object to the plan of salvation, because it proposes to save so few; but the enlightened and recovered only wonder that any of such a vile race could be saved. "The wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand."

Now, brethren, let us apply the subject to ourselves. Reproofs are given us to open our eyes that we may see. If instead of humbly receiving them, we find something in us that rises up against them, we may be sure that we need reproof, and that the only reason we do not see the need of it is that we are morally blind. "He that reproveth a scorner getteth to himself shame; and he that rebuketh a wicked man getteth himself a blot. Reprove not a scorner, lest he hate thee; rebuke a wise man, and he will love thee. Give instruction to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser; teach a just man, and he will increase in learning." Prov. ix, 7-9. "A reproof entereth more into a wise man than a hundred stripes into a fool." xvii, 10.

"The true Christian loves reproof. 'Let the righteous smite me; it shall be as an excellent oil, which does not cause a sore head.' He who enjoys communion with God is not too proudly self-conceited to bear blame and correction; while he keeps up honest prayer, he will let nothing sour him so but that he will welcome reproof from any source as an answer to his prayer for light; and as, in the enjoyment of true religion, he wishes to avoid all sin, he cannot be angry that any of his acts or neglects are blamed. Only 'he that doeth evil hateth the light, and will not come to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved; but he that doeth truth cometh to the light.'"

If we can receive and profit by reproofs, there is a possibility that we may be saved; if not we are lost.

Weak Brethren.

1. THERE are some brethren so physically weak, that they cannot raise their hand as high up as their pockets, and some not quite so weak but that they could do that, who are not able to lift it out again. 2. There are some brethren so weak from the labors of business, that they have not strength to walk to church on the Sabbath, and some not quite so weak, who can get there only once that day. 3. There are some so weak after the toils of the day, that they are not able to walk to prayer meeting; and then, again, others who can get there, are too weak to speak or pray. 4. There are some brethren so weak as to be unable to rise early enough to have family worship before business hours; then there are others, who do rise early, but are too weak to reach down the old family Bible. 5. There are some brethren so weak in talents that they are not able to teach a class in Sabbath School, but who are not quite so weak when a political meeting is on hand.—Sel.

SUPPER.

THE Scriptures speak of supper about ten times. And is not this proof that the Lord and his disciples took three meals a day? And, consequently, that only two meals a day are unscriptural and wrong? Some ask this question with that confidence which would lead one to suppose that they thought they had an objection which would forever settle the matter. But a few inquiries will expose its weakness.

1. Who knows that the disciples took supper at night, a short time before sleeping. Evening, or even, be it borne in mind, sometimes means the latter part of the day.

2. Who knows that they dined at 12 o'clock, or what is now called noon?

3. Who knows that they took breakfast about 6 o'clock in the morning?

4. Who knows that they ate what is now called breakfast at all?

5. Who will find the word breakfast in the Bible? Finally,

6. Who will show us that they ate more than two meals? Dinner about seven or eight in the morning, and supper at one or two o'clock?

JAMES WHITE.

REMARKS.

On the reception of the foregoing note, we decided to look at some of the points mentioned, with the aid of such helps as we had at hand. The result of our investigations may be stated in brief as follows:

We find in the original but two words to denote the meals in use among the Jews, at the time the New Testament was written. These are ariston and deipnon. The first is uniformly rendered in the New Testament, dinner; and the second is rendered in every instance by the terms supper, or feasts. Both these words are rather indefinite in meaning. The first, ariston, is defined by different lexicographers as follows:

Robinson. "Breakfast, a morning meal, at sunrise (Homer). Later, breakfast, lunch, Lat. prandium, taken about the middle of the day; the principal meal being the deipnon, dinner, taken late in the afternoon or early in the evening, after the heat and business of the day were over, as at the present day in London and Paris."

Liddell and Scott. "A morning meal, breakfast, twice in Homer, where it is taken at sunrise. Later, breakfast was called akratisma, and after it ariston was the midday meal, our luncheon."

Parkhurst. "Ariston, indefinite, because taken at no certain time; or, rather from eri, early, because this meal was taken early in the morning." Then he gives as the main definition, "Dinner, a meal eaten in the morning."

Greenfield. "A meal, or slight refreshment, which among the Jews corresponded sometimes to our breakfast, and sometimes to dinner; being taken sometimes in the morning, or a little before noon, or a little after noon, as circumstances might vary."

The other word, deipnon, usually translated supper, is defined by the same authorities as follows:—

Robinson. "In Homer, breakfast. In Attic writers and in New Testament, dinner or supper; i. e., the chief meal of the Jews, and also of the Greeks and Romans, taken toward, or at, evening, after the labors of the day were over, and often prolonged into the night. Hence a banquet, a feast in general."

Liddell and Scott. "A meal, or meal time, used by Homer quite generally, sometimes as the equivalent of ariston, sometimes the same as dorpon. In Attic, certainly the chief meal, answering to our dinner, Latin, coena, begun toward evening, and often prolonged till night."

Parkhurst. "Deipnon, so called from deisthai eis ponon, men's wanting it for labor, or to enable them to labor. See Suicer's Thesaurus on this word. 1. In Homer it generally denotes the breakfast, or morning meal, but sometimes food in general, even that which is taken toward evening. 2. In the latter Greek writers, as in the N. T., a supper, an evening meal, a feast."

Greenfield. "A morning repast; dinner, Lat. prandium; in N. T. supper, the principal meal of the Hebrews, and taken by them in the evening."

There is another word the definition of which we will here introduce as throwing some light on this subject, although it does not occur in the New Testament. That word is dorpon, and is defined by Liddell and Scott thus: "In Homer, the afternoon or evening meal, whether called dinner or supper. Lat. coena, the chief meal of the day. It is distinguished as the last of the three meals, arista, deipna, dorpa. But the name disappeared from Attic Greek, probably because at Athens it was customary to take only two regular meals, ariston, and deipnon, which latter took the place of dorpon."

From these definitions the conclusion seems to be very apparent that but two meals a day were generally eaten by the ancients. The first ariston, by universal consent, denotes a meal taken in the early part of the day. The second, deipnon, denotes, the last meal of the day; but the hour at which it was eaten, is not so clear. Liddell and Scott say, "In Attic, certainly the chief meal, answering to our dinner." This would bring it not far from the middle of the day, as the popular signification of the term dinner as given by Webster is, "The meal taken about the middle of the day; or the principal meal of the day eaten between noon and evening." Robinson says it was taken "toward or at, evening." This, considering that evening commenced with the Hebrews, at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, would not necessarily bring it very late in the day. And Parkhurst says that the word deipnon finds its root in an expression signifying "men's wanting it for labor, or to enable them to labor." This is important as showing that the word primarily signified a meal eaten at such an hour as to supply strength for the completion of the labors of the day. This doubtless denotes the first and general character of the meal; for those instances where it was extended into the night were doubtless exceptions to, or corruptions of, the custom. We cannot suppose this latter to have been the general practice; for then it could not be explained why a word should have been taken to denote it, which has a meaning so very different.

In confirmation of this we find the following testimony in the Am. Tract Society's Bible Dictionary. "The meals of the Jews were generally two, loosely distinguished as dinner and supper, Luke xiv, 12; John xxi, 12. The first meal was usually light, consisting of milk, cheese, bread or fruits, and eaten at various hours from early morning to the middle of the forenoon. In the early history of the Hebrews, the principal meal, corresponding with our dinner, was eaten about noon, Gen. xliii, 25; 1 Kings xx, 16. At a later period, at least on festive occasions, it was taken after the heat of the day was over. This was the 'supper.'"

THE APPOINTED FAST.

THE coming Sabbath has been designated as a fast, that the blessing of God may attend our General Conference, and rest upon our labors in his cause during the year. This is a well-timed act. But what is it to fast in such a manner that God will accept it? Fasting is an acknowledgment of sins, and a public profession of repentance. Those who suppose that a day spent in abstinence from food, and in public humiliation, will square the account of their past backslidings and lack of devotion to God, and that when that day is past they may with less danger than before live as they had been living, are the very persons to whom the prophet refers when he says:—

"Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him?

with thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord?" Isa. lviii, 5.

But did the prophet mean to condemn such acts as this in days of fasting and prayer? Far from it; for, one hundred and sixty years after this, we find Daniel, the man greatly beloved, fasting in precisely this way so far as outward forms are concerned, and God answered him in the most signal manner. See Dan. ix and x.

If we should insert the word "merely," in the earnest expostulation of Isaiah, we should no doubt express the precise idea of the prophet. We should then have him ask the question: Does God accept that fast in which the sinner expresses great humiliation, and distress for his sins, but for all that when his fast is ended, continues in the same course of life? In other words is it merely to "bow down the head as a bulrush and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him?"

No indeed. Fasting is not only an acknowledgment of sins, but a solemn public profession of repentance, and a pledge in the sight of God and man, that we will from this time forth, and forever desist from those acts whereby the Spirit of God has been grieved from us. Fasting, like repentance, with which it is indeed inseparably connected, does not end with the days on which we thus humble ourselves in the sight of God and man. Those are the days in which we make our solemn vows, accompanied by suitable acts of self abasement; but the performance of these vows will require the most faithful action on our part, for the whole period of our lives.

Our coming fast is that we may humble ourselves in the sight of God, for all our backsliding from him, and all our sins in his sight. But let us remember that if we do not in our hearts solemnly promise God, while we thus fast, that we will hereafter desist from these sins, our fast is only a solemn mockery. And let us further remember that if we make this solemn promise, we must devote all our lives to its sacred fulfillment. Such a fast God will accept.

THE TWO LAWS.

MANY claim that the law of God has been abolished. They can read many passages that a law has been done away. Thus they claim that there was but one law in the Old Testament, hence it has all gone by the board. If there was but one law, their argument is sound. But this is a mistake. There are two laws brought to view in the Old Testament. 1. There is the law of God, the ten commandments. This was spoken by God himself, written with his own finger, on tables of stone, and placed in the ark. See Deut. xii, 18; Ex. xxiv, 12; Deut. x, 1-5. 2. The law of Moses. Moses himself spoke this law to the people, wrote it himself in a book and placed it in the side of the ark. Deut. i, 5, 6; xxxi, 9, 24-26. This distinction is preserved throughout the Old Testament. Thus in 2 Kings xxi, 8, "Only if they will observe to do according to all that I have commanded them, and according to all the law that my servant Moses commanded them." Here is a plain distinction between the law that God commanded and the law that Moses commanded. Again Nehemiah ix, 13. "Thou camest down also upon Mount Sinai and spakest with them from Heaven, and gavest them right judgments and true laws, good statutes and commandments." Here is a law that is called right, true, and good. It is said that God declared this law from mount Sinai. Now we read of quite a different law in Ezekiel xx, 24, 25. "Because that they had not executed my judgments, but had despised my statutes, and had polluted my Sabbaths, and their eyes were after their fathers' idols, wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they shall not live." Here is a law that is not good, and by which they could not live. This must be a different law from the one which is good, right, and true. The same distinction is preserved in the New Testament. Rom. vii, 7. "What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid; nay, I had not known sin, but by the law, for I had not known just except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet." Here he quotes one of the ten commandments, showing what law he means. In verse 12, he says of this law, "the law is holy and the commandments are holy, and just and good." Verse 14, he says, "the law is spiritual." Verse 22, he calls it, "the law of God." James ii, 9-12. James quotes two of the ten commandments and calls that law the "law of liberty;" hence, there is a law in the New Testament which is holy, just and good, a spiritual law, a law of liberty, the royal law, the law of God; and Paul said that he delighted in that law. We find also quite a different law in the New Testament. It is called the law of Moses. Acts xv, 5. "But there arose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees, which believed, saying, that it was needful to circumcise them and to command them to keep the law of Moses. Speaking of this law in verse 10, he says, "Now therefore why tempt ye God to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear." Here this law of Moses is called a heavy yoke which none are able to bear. In Heb. vii, 14, we read of a law of a "carnal commandment," and verse 19, says that this "law made nothing perfect." It seems as though none could fail to see that these different characteristics do not belong to the same law. Now let us see what law is done away. In Ephesians xi, 15, we read, "Having abolished in his flesh the enmity even the law of commandments contained in ordinances for to make in himself of twain one new man so making peace." So of the law of which Peter spoke, calling it the law of Moses, and saying it was a grievous yoke to bear. In Col. ii, 14, we read, "Blotting out the hand writing of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to the cross." Here again the law which is done away, is very particularly described. 1. It is the law of hand writing. 2. It is the law of ordinances. 3. It was against us. 4. It was contrary to us. This law was nailed to the cross. Now we read of the law of God thus, "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid. Yea, we establish the law." Rom. iii, 31. Jesus himself says, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets, I am not come to destroy but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled. Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these least commandments and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of Heaven."

Thus we find one law written by God himself, which is called holy, just, and good, a spiritual law, law of liberty, royal law, and the delight of the saint. Paul says that this law is established, and Jesus says that not one jot or tittle shall pass away from it, &c. We have found another law which was written by Moses in a book. It is called a law that is not good, a carnal law, law of ordinances, a heavy yoke to bear, a law that was against us, contrary to us, the enmity, &c. It is said that this law was nailed to the cross. From the above we conclude that there were two laws, one of which was abolished at the cross, and the other is to last till heaven and earth pass away.

LABORS IN NORTHERN MICH.

I closed my labors in Saginaw and Midland counties the 28th of April, having given in all, forty-one lectures. Considering the extremely bad going and my feeble state of health, the lectures in Saginaw county resulted far better than we had expected. The people were very eager for the truth, having never heard any lectures on present truth. Upwards of sixty are now keeping the Sabbath, in the place where I preached. Before I left, they had a business meeting and resolved to build a meeting-house 36x50. The site was located and the work was commenced immediately. I assisted them about commencing Sabbath School. They organized with seven classes and thirty scholars. They will also have a large Bible Class.

The second course of lectures, ten miles further up the river, in Midland Co., was cut short for want of time, but circumstances over which I had no control, prevented further labor there at present.

Twenty-five decided to keep the commandments in this place, making in all over eighty new Sabbath-keepers in these two places. About fifty of these have been church members, but there is yet much for all of them to learn. Much labor is yet needed in these places, and until I can visit them again I hope they will continue their investigation with the aid of our books and the Advent Review.

Let all remember our last request that they should note down all their objections that may arise, and give us a chance to answer them when we return. In due time all will be clear and plain. Opposition will arise, and there will be difficulties not foreseen, but it is safe to stand firm on what has been made plain, and hold fast that which has already proved to be good.

I cannot forget this dear people that have so gladly received the word of God, and until, in God's providence I can visit them again, my feelings toward them are expressed in 1 Sam. xii, 23, 24.

REPORT FROM BRO. SANBORN.

My last report closed with my labors at Clyde, Ill., March 3. On the 7th I commenced a protracted meeting at Elkhorn Grove, which I continued about two weeks with good success. There was a large attendance all the time, and some good done. A few commenced keeping the Sabbath, and others were fully convinced of the great importance of keeping it, but had not yet decided to do so. We trust that they will decide before it is too late. The church was also blessed and encouraged to press on in the narrow way to life.

March 22, I attended the Quarterly Meeting at Johnstown Center, Wis. It being a very stormy bad time, our congregations were small, yet the Lord met us according to his promise. One was received into the church, and all were encouraged.

On Wednesday, the 26th, I commenced a protracted meeting at Monroe, Wis., in which I gave twenty-three discourses to large and interested congregations, with increasing interest to the close. Four publicly expressed their desires to keep the Sabbath, while a number of others were fully convinced that they ought to do so. The church also was much encouraged to faithfulness. Two were received by baptism. There has been a growing interest in Monroe ever since the Convocation Meeting. Indeed, I think the interest has not been so great since the message was first preached there, as now; and if the church will only live faithful, and let their light shine, they will yet see many souls added to their number in Monroe. The same may be said of other churches also. I trust the Lord will stir us all up to still greater diligence in his work.

April 27 and 28, I spent with the little flock in Chicago, where I had four interesting meetings. Several persons who had never heard our views before, became deeply interested, and I think will embrace the truth in the love of it. Here I became more thoroughly acquainted with our dear Bro. G. W. Parker, who I think is trying to do all he can to advance the truth, by taking a consistent course and letting his light shine through his good works. May God bless him and all the faithful in Chicago, is my prayer.

The 29th, I came on to the Health Institute in Battle Creek, where my wife has been taking treatment since last December. I expect to remain here and rest till after General Conference, and then return home. I find this to be a good place to rest.

BABYLON IS FALLEN.

THERE was a time when all Adventists were agreed in the belief that the term Babylon in the book of Revelation included the Protestant churches, and that the fall of Babylon announced in Rev. xiv, 8, signified a change in the moral standing of those churches consequent upon their rejection of the judgment-hour message of verses 6, 7. But as it soon became apparent that this belief must lead to the reception of the third angel's message, those whose prejudices of feelings led them to reject this message were led to deny the above point of Advent faith. I do not intend to judge harshly, but am led to believe by facts which have appeared, that prejudice against the message has led to their denial of this view. Thus, I know a professed Advent preacher who strenuously urged that the churches were Babylon, and pointed to their low condition as a fulfillment of the prophecy, who yet, in a sermon against the third angel's message said he had looked with favor on our exposition of prophecy till he came to our view of the fall of Babylon, and there he had to leave us, not being able to endorse it! Other instances equally glaring have been presented to our notice.

There are now three opinions on this subject held by Adventists: 1st. That the cry of the fall of Babylon is far in the past; 2nd. That it is in the present age, and denotes the present low state of the churches; 3d. That it is in the future, and that Rev. xiv, 8, and xxiii, 1-8 are synchronous, both referring to the future destruction of Romanism.

With the first I cannot agree, for several reasons. And 1. The order of the angels in Revelation forbids it. The events of that book are presented in lines or series. Chap. viii, 2, presents seven angels with seven trumpets; these continue to the close of chap. xi. These angels are always referred to in numerical order, and as there are only seven in this order, when other angels are introduced they are spoken of only in their relation to each other, not in their relation to these seven. Thus in chap. viii, 13, after the fourth angel had sounded, the record says, "And I beheld and heard an angel flying." But this was not "the fifth angel though succeeding the fourth, as it was not one of the seven. The sounding of the fifth and sixth is recorded in chap. ix; and in chap. x, 1, it is said; "And I saw another mighty angel come down from Heaven," &c. This word another, refers to one which had preceded it; but not to the sixth, for the next in that order is in chap. xi, 15. It of course refers back to the angel of chap. viii, 13. From this point on, no angel is mentioned till we come to chap. xiv, 8, where the same word is used to introduce the judgment-hour cry: "And I saw another angel." As the angel of chap. x, 1, is not called another in distinction from the sixth else it would be the seventh, which it is not, so that of chap. xiv, 8, is not another in distinction from the seventh, as there are not eight of the series, but it refers to the angels of chap. viii, 13, and x, 1, as its precedents. Now no Adventist will contend that the angel of chap. x, 1, had its fulfillment prior to the days of Luther, but far this side. How then, can that of Rev. xiv, be fulfilled in his days? To what does the word "another" stand related? That the line of events in chap. xii-xiv is not fulfilled subsequent to that ending in chap. xi, does not discredit this argument. These chapters contain a consecutive series of events, commencing even before the sounding of the first trumpet. But having traced them down with unmistakable certainty to the action of the Papal power in chap. xiii, we then find no angel or angels as the antecedent of the other in chap. xiv, 8, but those of viii, 13 and x, 1, as before stated. Except in this view I have never seen any harmony of these chapters and of the angels introduced.

2. I cannot agree with that opinion, because I have no evidence that such a message was given, or that it could have been timely in any past age, according to the Scriptures. And the judgment standing in such close proximity to the coming of Christ and the harvest of the world, forbids the idea of the term being used in any but its general, obvious sense.

3. Though it is claimed that the Reformers considered the Romish church the Mystery Babylon of the Revelation, that does not show that Rev. xiv, 8 was fulfilled by them, for they never gave such a message as is contained in verses 6, 7; and never till the present day has there been an exposition and proclamation of the first and third messages. Hence to claim the fulfillment of the second in the past is to disregard all order in the fulfillment of these messages.

And I cannot believe it belongs to the future: for 1, It does not synchronize with the angel of Rev. xviii, 1-8; as that not only announces the fall of Babylon but relates what takes place after her fall even down to her destruction, proving that her fall and her destruction are different events. The first only is brought to view in chap. xiv, 8—but both in chap. xviii, 1-8.

The destruction of Babylon will take place in the great battle, which will be at the coming of Christ. Comp. Rev. xiv, 14-20; xvi, 14-21; xix, 11-21; and 2 Thess. ii, 8. But the third angel's message is a conditional warning, given before the coming of Christ, and before the pouring out of the plagues. Comp. xiv, 9-12, and xvi, 1, 2, 15-21. And therefore the second angel's message cannot be given at or after the coming of Christ.

That it is fulfilled in the present day, we might bring arguments to prove, from the harmony of the messages; from their relation to the facts connected with the two-horned beast; and prove the relation of these to the plagues and the battle of the great day. But we pass by these at present, and only take up one question, namely, Does the present condition of the Protestant churches justify the application? Evidence on this point has been given sufficient to prove any position, and this by all classes, even by the churches themselves. Scarcely a number of any religious journal can be taken up without reading evidence on this point; and sometimes their remarks and reports strongly resemble a caricature of religion, and would appear like an attempt to ridicule the whole subject if found in papers of a different class. Thus, a report of a Missionary meeting held in St. Louis, given in the N. Y. Independent, says it was almost a failure for want of numbers, and this the writer would fain attribute to the rainy evening, had he not learned that hundreds had failed to get seats at the opera that night, and that a party given by one of the church members the same night was numerously attended. He goes on to suggest that hereafter when important religious meetings are appointed it be first ascertained if a popular actress or lecturer or a fashionable party is anticipated, and to govern the religious appointments so as not to interfere with these! In the same paper lately, referring to the mania for fashion in the churches were the following words: "Alas! shears and needles have become reverend evangelists and pew-fillers."

But it is not the purpose to add to the general evidences coming from every quarter. Both time and space would fail us; but to give a few extracts from one of the most prominent, if not the leading Adventist paper of those denying that the Protestant churches are represented by Babylon of the Revelation. I refer to the World's Crisis. The following appears in that paper as a quotation, but endorsed because fully sustained by original articles:

"There appears to be an active competition between the church and the world, as to which shall furnish for unsanctified human nature, the most attractive amusements. In appeal to taste, the church may justly claim the verdict. In but few communities can the other resorts of fashion vie in magnificence with the so-called houses of worship. In exclusiveness, the latter clearly have the precedence. The right of admittance depends upon the possession of the monied qualifications. Instead of being an earnest effort to offer acceptable worship to God, the services are evidently intended to gratify the worldly, the cultivated and the refined. The sermon is carefully written, and the gestures studied before the mirror; and the singing is conducted by the best musical talent that money can command. With the avowed design of keeping the young people under the influence of the church, the weekly sociable is instituted, and fun and frolic prevail. To pay the preacher, a donation party is held, and the old and young, professor and worldlyling, devote the evening to feasting and merriment. Festivals, picnics and excursions, oyster suppers and lotteries, are resorted to, for the purpose of replenishing the funds, or reviving the flagging interests—not religious—in the prosperity of the church."

The following is an extract from a letter of Hiram Munger to the Crisis over date of Jan. 1st:

"On returning home, our sister had lost the key to the house, but another one being with a person at the Methodist watch-meeting, at eleven o'clock, some of us went over to see the old year prayed out; but no praying, as usual. A few, dry, formal remarks, with a house full of people, and a fashionable band of music to make it interesting. Those that went to the love-feast in the fore part of the evening said there was a great band of music there also; wicked and thoughtless men piping and fiddling to entertain the people at a love-feast! How does it look? And then when the clock struck twelve, a sudden bright light dazzled the eyes of the people, and the greatest sound of pretended music struck up at the same time. Terrific was the scene; but few nerves could stand the shock. This ushered in the welcome of the New Year. No sinners invited forward to prayers, as formerly on such occasions in this church, but all formality and show, instead of godliness and good religion.

The Protestant churches have gone so far over the rapids, there is no possible chance for them to recover. If we wish to enjoy religion, the more secluded from the world we are, the better. I tell you, brethren back in the country, you are the best off to stay where you are. This world is ripe for destruction. I never want another glimpse of the fashionable religious societies. Pen and ink cannot describe the sin and wickedness of this generation. It is time to pray for the kingdom to come."

The following is from D. T. Taylor, Corresponding Editor of the Crisis:—

"In San Francisco, a few years since, a ball was gotten up, with all its accompanying fun and pleasure, and tickets sold at one dollar each—the object being to obtain money for the purpose of paying up the cost of the church edifice, and supplying funds for the minister—all of which was done by the church. This, though it was an astounding occurrence, was nevertheless a fact. It was but a few years since, that the grand jury of Albany county, in New York, threatened to indict all the churches within their jurisdiction for their persistent excesses in having lotteries at the church fairs. It was by the authorities viewed as no better than gambling.

An astonishing instance of a church lowering its standard of piety to suit the perverted tastes of the pleasure-seekers of the age, has lately come to our knowledge. A large and influential denomination, having an organized existence of sixty-four years, experienced an outpouring of the Spirit, followed by a revival. More than one hundred persons shared in the blessing. The whole community was powerfully stirred during an entire winter. The period drew near when ninety-four persons, who had professed conversion, were to be baptized and admitted to full membership. Of these more than a score were young people, who had followed the custom of attendance at balls and dancing. This pastime, the rules of the church for two-thirds of a century had strictly prohibited its members.

The converted dancers were bent upon joining the church, but how were they to meet the prohibition? For they were determined to dance on, whether connected with the church or not! A concerted plan was formed. They would answer the official questions affirmatively, and openly promise not to dance—but with a mental reservation. The dodge—which was decidedly jesuitical—succeeded. An official, leading member, overheard the words. The rulers of the church were instantly summoned in secret convention. The pastor was in the chair. The official member who had got wind of the plan, stated the young convert's scheme (!) to the assembled leaders. He then demanded that to save the young people about to join them from direct lying on the day of their admission to membership, the prohibition against dancing should at once be stricken from the rules of the denomination. 'He believed in dancing, and should his request fail to be complied with, he would join another religious body, whose members were not forbidden to dance.' The deed was done; the obnoxious rule expunged; the dancing converts won the day; received the ordinances and the hand of fellowship. Which, to them, has the greater fascination, the prayer-meeting or the ball-room, we have not learned. And the pulpit of that same church warned the community not to go and hear the Advent preachers! Alas, alas! No comment but this is needed."

The following appeared in an editorial article in the Crisis, Feb. 13, 1867:—

"Protestants seem to think that whatever is opposed to Papacy must be Christian; but even Protestantism has departed widely from the simplicity of the Christian religion. Its power to reform the world appears to be well nigh spent. It has become too much conformed to the spirit and manners of the world, ever to be removed into primitive Christian life again. 'Ich-abod' is written on its walls. Its vitality is fast departing. Instead of being more opposed to 'the mother of harlots,' it is imitating her customs and manners more and more, and going further from the true standard of 'pure and undefiled religion.' If we would be ready for the coming of Christ, we must come out from the world and be separate."

The following from D. T. Taylor, of the same paper, is calculated to impress all as deeply as the writer seemed to be. It is from an article on "the Holy Spirit."

"We are very much impressed with this subject. And the more as we feel compelled to believe that the great mass of the people in our land have grieved and resisted the unutterable and silent admonitions of this celestial visitant, and steeled their hearts under its repeated calls, until, wearied with rejection and insult, it has mournfully turned away and there is but little of its restraining, converting influence left in community. Hence the lack of revivals, the prevalence of worldliness, the carnival of pleasure and crime everywhere."

How could this be, if the salt had not lost its savor, and the light of the churches become greatly obscured? The Protestant churches control the religious influences, and regulate the religious standard of the land; and they alone are answerable for the prevailing recklessness in morals and religion.

Now we believe, in common with our opponents, that true Christianity fled from the darkness and persecutions of the old world to this continent and set up its banner in the American Protestant churches; that here and in them for the past generation it has erected its highest altars and sent forth its purest light. But can that be said of the churches in their present condition? Look at the picture as drawn and given in the above extracts. Of a truth "the glory is departed."

And our opponents, with us, believe that the changes and vicissitudes of the cause of Christianity through this dispensation to the end are marked out in Revelation, which is given as its name imports, to make known to God's watching, faithful people, the appearing or coming of the Lord. Admitting all that is or has been claimed for these churches, we look at their present fallen condition, and ask, Has this change, the greatest that has taken place in the moral world since the fall of "the first house of Israel," received no notice in the prophecy of the "Revelation of Jesus Christ?" Will our opponents make it appear reasonable to the world that the coming of the Lord is near, and this great revolution in the religious world, more important and significant than any revolution in the political world, has no place among the "waymarks?" The age is full of wonders; but if that be true, no greater wonder of the age can be shown.

The churches of them that believed of the Gentiles, had full warning by the great apostle sent to them. He warned them to take heed lest God spare them not as he did not the "natural branches" for their unfaithfulness; to not be high-minded, but fear. They rejected the warning. They have grown arrogant, proud, and worldly: they reject truth and follow their own ways; indeed, they as completely ignore Bible religion and Bible authority as if they had a "plenary indulgence" to that effect. And the only place where this is marked out in this great prophecy is Rev. xiv, 8. We would greatly rejoice if a different state of things existed in the churches of the day, but the facts are before us; and any effort at concealment will not alter them. Better by far take heed to the lesson which the facts inculcate, and prepare to escape the plagues threatened and soon to come on those who "draw back to perdition."

News and Miscellany.

Can ye not discern the Signs of the Times? Matt. xvi, 3.

—New Haven, Conn., manufactures the fish-hooks. There are turned out every year, by the American Fish-hook and Needle Company, not less than 180,000, 000 fish-hooks.

—The Catholics held an immense Fair in New York city the 1st of May. Considerable feeling has been excited by the fact that the city government granted permission to erect buildings for the purpose at Union Square, a favor which would not have been granted to any Protestant denomination.

Jefferson Davis.—Mrs. Davis went from Fortress Monroe to Washington, Thursday evening for the purpose of applying to President Johnson for the release of her husband.

On Wednesday last, Mr. Geo. Shea, of counsel for Jefferson Davis, presented a petition to the U. S. Circuit Court of Virginia, and moved upon it before Judge Underwood for a writ of habeas corpus directed to General Burton, commanding at Fort Monroe, to have Jefferson Davis before the court at Richmond on the second Monday in May. The judge after hearing the argument from Mr. Shea, and some deliberations, granted the writ, which was placed in the hands of a U. S. Deputy Marshal for immediate service.

If Mr. Davis is not released on bail by Judge Underwood next week, the President, it is said, will order his liberation.

Chief Justice Chase sees nothing, it is said, in the condition of Virginia under the Military act to warrant him in departing from his former course of declining to preside at the trial of Davis. He will hold no court in the South until civil authority is so far established as to cease being dependent on military power.

The Union Pacific Railroad.—The cars of this road are now running three hundred and five miles west of Omaha, and the work of grading and laying rails has recommenced. The Rocky Mountains will be reached this summer. The company then propose to put a second force to work at Salt Lake City, building the road eastward.

The distance from Sacramento to Salt Lake, along the proposed route, is about 625 miles; from Omaha to Salt Lake, 1,035. The distance from New York by the railroad route is 3,129 miles, of which 1,887 miles have been completed and are now in successful operation, leaving but 1,252 miles yet to be built.

Studying these figures, the Salt Lake Vedette is confident that the road will be completed within two years.

—The receipts of customs at New York for the month of March foot up sixteen millions of dollars—five millions more than any month for a year past.

—The last dispatch from the English Government to our Government in reference to the pirate Alabama claims is very unsatisfactory.

OUTBREAK IN CALIFORNIA.

The Indians on the Hoopo reservation, California, have declared war against the whites, killed Sub-agent Robert L. Stockton and two employes, and burned all the Government property. The whites on Klamath River are fortifying and preparing for defense.

—During the next month so many United States Senators have taken berths for Europe, that should there be necessity for a special session in July, it is probable that there would be no quorum of that body in the country.

—The New York Tribune's Washington special says: "The Department of State to-day received voluminous dispatches from our Ministers in England and France. While they do not contain as late advices as are daily brought by the cable, they represent pretty fully the condition of affairs, and show conclusively that a general European war can scarcely be averted. The Emperor Napoleon has been engaged for several months making gigantic naval and military preparations, and it is alleged that the feeling is now so universal among the French people for a collision that it has passed beyond the Emperor's control.

Earthquakes.—A severe shock of an earthquake was felt at St. Joseph, Mo., at three p. m. Buildings shook and swayed with a rapid motion, causing much alarm, but no damage, so far as known. Two distinct shocks were felt at St. Louis about five minutes before 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon. The vibration was from north to south, lasting about five seconds. Articles of furniture, crockery, etc., were shaken quite vigorously, but no harm done.

A severe shock was felt at Junction City, Kansas, at half past 2 o'clock.

A heavy shock of earthquake, lasting half a minute, was felt at Kansas City, Mo., at 2:40 yesterday afternoon, causing people to rush out of their houses in alarm. A portion of the plastering was shaken off in one or two houses, but no serious damage was done.

The shock of an earthquake was felt April 24, throughout Iowa, Kansas and Wisconsin, extending even to Chicago.

—Late advices from Mexico state that Maximilian and his garrison at Queretaro had attempted to cut their way through the Liberal lines, but were repulsed. Vera Cruz is strongly invested by the Liberals, and all its communications cut off. Provisions in the city are very scarce. Beef was selling at a dollar a pound.

What is the matter with the Animal Creation? The careful observer must be struck with the frequent instances reported in almost all the papers of the day, of fatal maladies now prevailing among different classes of animals. Within six months past we have had the cattle plague in Holland, the cattle plague in England, disease and death among cattle in various parts of this country, the hog cholera, disease among horses, chicken cholera, the oyster plague, &c. We now have a new sheep disease, and trouble among the chickens in Iowa. We commend a careful consideration of the question how long it is proper to make use of that which is so rapidly falling into disease, as an article of food.

New Sheep Diseases.—Some of the best sheep raisers of Mayfield are losing large numbers of valuable sheep by a new disease hitherto unknown to this section of the country. Its symptoms are not unlike those of the hog cholera. Mr. Colton lost thirty; Mr. Jesse Allen, Mr. Hubbard, Henry Joiner, and others, have lost considerable numbers.—Sycamore (Ill.) Republican.

The Cedar Rapids Times says that the poultry of that region is dying off with the chicken cholera, and adds, very significantly, that the "market is at present well supplied with dead poultry."

Exegetical Nonsense.—The following is another specimen of the wild fancies of some professed expositors. With such as this, the people are, or ought to be, disgusted; but the evil of the matter is, that by these exhibitions, they lose confidence in those prophetic expositors which are sound and reasonable.

"According to a new book on the prophecies by Rev. Mr. Baxter of Canada, the time is near when Napoleon is to unite under himself the ten kingdoms of Great Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Algeria, Tripoli, Egypt, Greece, Syria and Turkey. Napoleon will capture Jerusalem, commence a general persecution of Christians, confiscate the Romish church property, institute public worship of his own image, imprint his name on the people's foreheads and hands; then famine for eighteen months, a great smoke for three weeks, five months of locusts, horsemen and horses breathing brimstone, and various other equally probable events too numerous to mention."—Springfield Republican.

England.—Minister Adams has been instructed to decline the offer of the British government for arbitration on the Alabama claims. This leaves the whole matter open again, with no proposition pending from either party. Hints are said to be given out from the British legation at Washington that the next proposition may be to trade off British Columbia for the claims. If Mr. Seward can bring this about, and so secure our entire control of the Pacific coast, and at the same time settle all outstanding accounts with Great Britain, he will be ready to retire with honor from the state department.

France and Prussia.—A late paper speaking of the prospect of war between these two powers, says, that in strength and resources they are about equally matched; and when the contest comes it will be one of giants which will shake the world.

Drunkenness in the U. S. Senate.—The following paragraph indicates the painful necessity for such efforts to promote temperance among congressmen as Senator Wilson and others have engaged in during the past winter:—

Mrs. Saulsbury appealed personally to senators not to press the resolution expelling her husband, promising to take him home to Delaware. No man could resist such an appeal. It is impossible to think of such an incident without emotion. Mr. Saulsbury is a man of very marked abilities,—one of the ablest, most cogent and effective speakers in the Senate, of fine personal appearance, tall, erect, dark complexion, with piercing black eyes and jet black hair, courtly and impressive in his manner, and of noble and generous impulses. But for the disease which afflicts and overmasters him, he would be one of the most influential public men of the Senate and the country. Yet he is saved from ignominious expulsion only by the sympathy felt for his noble and devoted wife. Another senator, whose term has just expired,—a man of clear intellect, finished culture and fascinating manners, but cursed by the same affliction, was tolerated in the Senate only from a similar motive. One of the most touching sights to be seen in Washington during the session, was the presence in the gallery of his wife and daughter, waiting night after night, often till long past midnight, anxious and distressed, to accompany him to their home. It may be said to his credit, that whatever he may have been to the rest of the world, he was never anything but respectful, obedient and tender to them.

The Indians on the Plains.—Gen. Wessel, who is at Fort Phil. Kearny, thinks the Crow Indians can be kept quiet by the presence of the large force of troops now at that point. A large number of Sioux are camped on Powder River, opposite Fort Reno. A correspondent says the Cheyenne village, where our troops have been camped for several days, was burned on the 20th inst., involving a loss of about $100,000. Gen. Custer was still pursuing the Cheyennes, who had fled northward.

The Public Debt—Another Reduction.—The workings of the Treasury for the month just closing will show another large reduction of the National debt. In the next statement, Secretary McCulloch hopes to reduce the total debt to about $2,500,000,000, at which point he believes it must remain stationary so long as the present rate of Government income and expenses is maintained.

Peace Conference in Europe.—London, April 29.—The European conference, which is to meet in London next month to settle the dispute between France and Prussia in regard to Luxemburg, will consist of representatives from Great Britain, France, Austria and Russia, and the king of Holland, as Grand Duke of Luxemburg. It is understood that the following terms are agreed upon as a basis for the deliberations of the conference: 1st. France is not to enlarge her present boundaries. 2d. The fortifications of Luxemburg are to be evacuated and dismantled. 3d. The future political status of the Grand Duchy is to be ascertained and determined by the conference. 4th. The final decision of the conference is to be guaranteed by all the governments participating therein.

France.—The panic among the working men still continues. The tailors' strike has not succeeded in producing as yet any very beneficial results to that class of operatives, and the subject is still bitterly agitated between masters and employees. In all cases where a man dares go to work at the old price, he is hardly dealt with by his comrades, and it is only a day or two since one unfortunate man carrying to an employer a new coat which he had made, was set upon by an enraged group, beaten, and his piece of work torn into shreds, and scattered in the street. It was thought the discharge of the 10,000 workmen from the Champ de Mars last week, would cause trouble, but Napoleon has set them all at work upon the city improvements. New strikes are occurring constantly. In many cases, too, whole quarters of the city are the scenes of violent protestations against the raising of rents. Two days since, there was a meeting of 4,000 students in the Latin quarter, and the whole body threatened to leave their apartments at once if their "layer" was augmented. So the proprietors are compelled to leave students and grisettes in undisturbed possession.

The South.—THE POLITICAL PERIL OF THE FREEDMEN. An estimate of the voting population of the ten reconstructing states gives an aggregate of 661,000 white and 412,000 colored voters. In Mississippi and South Carolina the negroes are in the majority, the former having 58,000 black to 56,000 white voters; the latter 50,000 black to 44,000 white. In the other eight states the white voters decidedly outnumber the black; in Alabama 81,000 to 55,000; Arkansas, 51,000 to 14,000; Florida, 12,000 to 8,000; Georgia, 90,000 to 58,000; Louisiana, 48,000 to 23,000; North Carolina, 94,000 to 45,000; Texas, 80,000 to 35,000; Virginia, 105,000 to 66,000. These figures make it clear that we cannot leave out of account the white population of the South in our party efforts and our calculations for the future. It is important to secure the colored vote, but we want also a large share of the white.

If parties should divide in the South on the line of color, or so nearly there that only the few whites who call themselves radical, vote with the freedmen, there would be a chance—that the colored voters would control the elections only in South Carolina and Mississippi. It will be unfortunate for the colored voters and for the republican party if the line is thus drawn. For this reason every intelligent republican must deprecate the evil influence of the white men who are instigating the negroes to demand confiscation and the division of the property of the South among themselves, as at the Richmond convention of Thursday. No such measure could be adopted without establishing perpetual war in the South, certain to end at last in the destruction or expulsion of the weaker race. But it will not be attempted, and it is a cruelty to the negroes to delude them with such false hopes. Politically nothing more mischievous can be conceived, for the threat of such agrarianism will tend to consolidate the white vote in hostility to the freedmen and the republican party. Of similar influence is the demonstration at Mobile, where thousands of freedmen went armed to a political meeting, and defiantly fired off their guns and pistols at its close.

Gen. Wilson and other republicans who take the stump at the South, and the congressional committee conducting the canvass, should use their influence to counteract these tendencies to wild and violent measures, and to save the freedmen from the control of the narrow-minded and fanatical men who are misleading them. The freedmen must be assured of equal rights and protection in person and property, but they must not be deluded and led into excesses by the false notion that it is now their opportunity to avenge centuries of wrong by the robbery and humiliation of the white population. Only by the establishment of mutually just and friendly relations can the highest welfare of the freedmen be secured, and those who stir them to hostility and vengeance are their worst enemies. The republican party cannot countenance any course so false and ruinous.—Springfield Republican.

Pernicious Legislation.

A SUBSCRIBER sends us a copy of the St. Paul Weekly Press, with the following article marked for publication. The paper is a large and influential one, published in St. Paul, Minnesota; and the article is another index of the growing agitation on the Sabbath question.

Editors St. Paul Press.

Do the readers of the Press, in general, think how much unnecessary legislation we have every winter? Each new member of our Legislature, seeing that his predecessor was not returned, thinks it must be an implied censure of his course; and forthwith resolves to make his "calling and re-election sure," by some bright idea, such as perhaps a State road; which, if ever laid out, would have to be re-surveyed before it could be found, after the lapse of a year, or which passes into oblivion as soon as the commissioners are gone. Nor is this all; our statutes are encumbered with a vast amount of incoherent trash, called general laws, which are not only useless but pernicious in the extreme. In some parts of the State, a law may be obeyed and enforced; while in others it is a mere "dead letter." There are many enactments that seem to have been passed exclusively for the purpose of being contemned and disregarded. This is all wrong. Better be without law, than to have the majesty of the State insulted by a total disregard of her solemn enactments. Let each penal law have a provision for strict accountability for its enforcement; punishing severely the prosecuting attorney, judge, justice, sheriff, or other officer who allows the guilty to escape through his neglect of duty; or, as is so common, by "settling," and paying the complaining witness, the whole or part of his supposed loss. A rank burglary was settled in this city, by the burglar paying some twenty-one dollars to complainant, not the people. Was the attorney, justice, or other officer cognizant of that fact? I cannot tell. But should the like again occur, I will find out.

We have in common with the rest of the States, a Sunday law, or Sabbath law. This law provides for the punishment, by fine or imprisonment, of any one who shall, during the hours from 12 p. m. Saturday night to 12 p. m. Sunday night, labor even at his lawful occupation. Neither is there any provision exempting those who believe in any other Sabbath day, as the Seventh Day Baptists, the Seventh Day Adventists, &c. Even if such a provision had been inserted, the principle would have been just as bad. The constitution of the United States, or of this State, does not allow any infringement of the right of conscience. And man has just as good a right to solemnize Friday as Saturday, or any other day, and the Legislature has no power to make him observe any other day than the one of his choice. Nor has it the power to make him observe any day, if he chooses not to. No one can doubt the right of the Hindoos to emigrate to St. Paul, and build a temple to Buda, and set there idol therein, and on any day they choose, assemble there peacefully to worship it.

But, says one, "would you allow every grog shop, gambling hell and brothel, to open and continue in full blast, while decent folks are at worship?" No! Neither would I legislate to allow them, for a paltry sum, to deal out their distilled damnation on any other day. Saturday is the day on which most of the shopping is done, and whisky drunk. Think ye, that the law abiding Seventh-day Baptist, Adventist or Jew, does not feel as keenly the desecration of his Sabbath, as ye do? Who gave you the power to say that after he—as in conscience bound—has kept sacred his Sabbath, he must then keep yours? A man may believe he is bound by conscience to work every day in the week. Can you make a law to compel him to break his conscience, and obey yours? If you have such right then they who believe that the day is not far distant when we shall have an established religion, are not far from right. Is Sunday made Sabbath by man's law, simply because God in the ten commandments ordained the Seventh day? Is this the reason we have Sunday laws, because bigoted men are not willing to run the chance of the seventh day being adopted by the masses? Do our Legislators lend their aid to such motives? No! the simple fact is, some wiseacre, to gain popularity, and a re-election, proposed the bill; and it being an act passed by Constantine, and each bigoted successor in temporal power, through kings to the rulers of kings—the people—the Legislature pass it, Governor signs it; and another "dead letter" is grafted on the legal tree, to assist in decaying and rotting its trunk, which, when it falls, may sweep away Constitution and all; and from the wreck may spring the absolute temporal and spiritual power, so faithfully prophesied by many of the different Christian sects.

I have been always an observer of Sunday as Sabbath, and probably shall always remain so, my conscience not conflicting therewith. But I deny the power of constitution or laws to compel me to observe that or any other day. It has always been the habit of churches, from time immemorial, to court the aid of the temporal power to sustain a pet idea. But America has been ruled too long by liberal minds, to long allow herself to be such a tool of bigotry.

If our legislators are wise, they will overhaul this "relic of barbarism," as it truly is, and repeal it. We have more than a hundred voters in this county who keep Saturday for Sabbath. There are many hundreds more in other parts of the State. They are most of them, very peaceful, law-abiding citizens: besides being eminent for consistent Christianity. It would be a fine sight, would it not, to see, perhaps, the elder arraigned in court for working on the first day of the week, and having been fined, and no money to pay his fine, to see him associate with lawless outlaws, midnight brawlers, and petty thieves, and babbling drunkards, and lewd women, in the public jail. You may say the picture is overdrawn. I say it is not, if you carry out your law, and what use is there of the law unless to be obeyed?

Enact as many laws as you like, but execute them.

Conference Department.

Exhorting one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching. Heb. x, 25.

This Department is designed to fill the same place in the paper that the Conference or Social Meeting does in the worship of G. d. speak often one to another to comfort, edify and aid each other in the way of holiness and true Christian experience.

From Sister Cornell.

BRO. SMITH: I have often been cheered by the testimonies of dear brethren and sisters in the Review, and have felt that I would gladly contribute my mite in favor of the precious truth, but have as often been prevented by a sense of my unworthiness and inability. I feel that there can be none among the ranks of Sabbath-keepers who have greater reason to love the truth, or greater cause for gratitude to God for being permitted to embrace it, than myself. When it first arrested my attention, I was a cold-hearted backslider, wandering further and still further from God, yet ignorant, as it were, of the path I was treading, and at times despairing almost of hope. The Bible was a book of mysteries, and I was unconsciously wending my way to Spiritualism and Infidelity.

In this condition I first heard the truth on the Sabbath; but so hard and blinded was my heart, that for three years I rejected it; yet my kind heavenly Father continued to call after me in love until I felt it was his to command, and mine to obey, whether I were saved or lost. I yielded from a conviction of duty, not because I expected salvation. I could see no light in any other part of present truth, and little thought of ever seeing or embracing any more of it; but I was disappointed. A peace of mind to which I had long been a stranger, was mine again to enjoy, and present truth that had been hidden from my view now shone forth in unspeakable beauty, and I felt, as it were, lost in wonder, love, and praise.

Six years have nearly rolled away since, and I yet rejoice that God is fitting up his people to stand with the King in his beauty upon Mount Zion; and I want to be there. Yes, I want to walk the gold-paved streets of the city of God, and join in the song of the redeemed, and clap glad hands with loved ones that have long slumbered in the tomb. And am I willing to endure with the remnant? I want to be. Heaven will be cheap enough after all we suffer here. Then brethren and sisters, let us gird on the whole armor. Though trials come, earthly friends fail and foes all unite, we know that victory is ours through our Lord Jesus, if we are faithful to the grace he has promised.

And he is soon coming. Yes, we are admonished almost hourly that he is "nigh even at the door." Be ye also ready seems whispered by every passing breeze. And shall any of us slumber till the Master has risen up and shut to the door? Trials and temptations are for us a little while; but God has promised us strength and grace. Let us lean on his strong arm, and we are safe.

Yours, striving to overcome.

PHEBE L. CORNELL.

N. Brownville, Mich.

From Bro. Stover.

BRO. SMITH: the cause is onward and upward here at Sandyville. The Lord is working for his people, and our meetings have had a growing interest so far. Five more of the youth have spoken in our meetings since Bro. Bourdeau was here; making fourteen in all. Other hearts have been touched and tendered that have not made a public confession as yet. We feel to thank and praise the Lord for his goodness to his people.

The majority of the brethren are looking forward, and letting the past go with the things of the past, and are now reaching forward for the prize at the end of the race.

We hope that we may not have our hearts saddened any more, and that the past experience will prove a lasting benefit, that we may no more have such heavy burdens for our ministers when they come among us. Brethren, pray for us.

ANDREW J. STOVER.

Sandyville, Iowa.

SISTER M. J. KAY writes from Kickapoo, Ill. I wish to say to the lonely ones through the Review, that I never regretted starting to keep all the commandments of God and have the faith of Jesus. I have been very lonely in times past. The Review is a welcome visitor to us all. It is nearly all the preaching that we have except as we go to Princeville some ten miles distant; but the Lord being my helper I am determined to go on, and be an overcomer, and have right to the tree of life.

DAILY NEARER.

NEARER home, nearer home!

However dark and lonely
The path through which we roam;
This is a journey only;
And though we oft, affrighted,
Shrink back with sigh and moan,
Our camp-fires still are lighted
"A day's march nearer home."

Nearer home, nearer home!

Oh, j-y beyond expressing,
That over thorn and stone
Our feet are homeward pressing!
For though we leave behind us
Some buds of hope unblown,
The sunset still doth find us
"A day's march nearer home."

Nearer home, nearer home!

O many-mansioned dwelling,
Beneath thy shining dome
No tides of grief are swelling;
And toward thy fadeless glory
With eager haste we come
Repeating earth's brief story,
"A day's march nearer home."

Nearer home, nearer home!

Soon through its open portals
The ransomed hosts will come,
To welcome us immortals;
Then be the path before us
With wrecks of roses strown,
Each night we'll sing in chorus,
"A day's march nearer home."

CAN YOU TELL WHAT IT COSTS? At a temperance meeting, held lately, in London, it was stated, on good authority, that the consumption of intoxicating liquors in England, costs $400,000,000 annually. What an immense sum of money! and all worse than wasted. In eight years this sum would pay the debt of the United States. But it is of little moment in comparison with the actual cost. Who can compute the loss in health, morals, hopes—yes, and the loss in souls, for it is written—"No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God." Remember, too, that every soul thus lost, is of more value than the entire world, and say can you tell what it costs?

A NEW PLACE OF FUTURE PUNISHMENT.—The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Daily News, alluding to the death of Mouravieff, informs us that "thousands of sorrowing mothers, sisters, and wives now pray the Almighty to inflict that just retribution in heaven which he escaped on earth."

Obituary Notices.

Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth.
Rev. xiv, 13.

DIED of consumption in Eldred, McKean Co., Pa., sister P. Frost, in the seventy-fifth year of her age. Sister F. embraced the truth about six years ago, and has been a firm believer in the same ever since. Though she lived with her children who were not believers in present truth, she tried to live a consistent Christian. She left a bright evidence that her peace was made with God. The writer spoke on the occasion from 2 Tim. iv, 7, 8. I. BARROWS.

DIED in Boston, Apr. 17th, Sister Hannah Page, aged 77 years. She was a great sufferer during her sickness, but bore it with Christian resignation and patience. She has been for a long time a believer in present truth, and died in full hope of a blessed immortality when Jesus comes. Appropriate remarks were made on the funeral occasion by Eld. Wm. C. Thurman.

Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.

J. L. PRESCOTT.

DIED, at her residence, near Ithaca, Mich., our much-esteemed sister, Eliza Ann Squire, April 25, 1867, in the 83d year of her age, after a sickness of four hours. She leaves an affectionate husband, and six children, one an infant, to mourn her loss. Sister Squire embraced the present truth under the preaching of Bro. Van Horn and Lawrence, when the tent was at Ithaca, nearly three years ago. She has ever been willing to bear her testimony in its favor. We believe she died in full hope of a part in the first resurrection.

The Publishing Association.

The Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association was incorporated in Battle Creek, Mich., May 3, 1861. Its object is to issue "periodicals, books, tracts, documents, and other publications, calculated to impart instruction on Bible truth, especially the fulfillment of prophecy, the commandments of God, and the teachings of Jesus Christ." Its capital stock is raised by shares at $10 each; and every shareholder is entitled to one vote in all the deliberations of the Association, for every share that he or she may hold. All lovers of truth, who "keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus," are still invited to take shares in the Association, and have a voice in all its deliberations.

The Advent Review and Sabbath Herald

Is a twelve-page religious family paper, issued weekly by the S. D. A. Publishing Association, and devoted to an earnest investigation of all Bible questions. It is designed to be an exponent of momentous and solemn truths pertaining to the present time, some of which are set forth by no other periodical in the land. The fulfillment of prophecy, the second personal advent of the Saviour as an event now near at hand, immortality through Christ alone, a change of heart through the operation of the Holy Spirit, the observance of the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, the divinity and mediatorial work of Christ, and the development of a holy character by obedience to the perfect and holy law of God, as embodied in the decalogue, are among its special themes. And while it will endeavor to present impartially both sides of all important questions, it has a definite theory to teach, and hence will not devote its space to an indiscriminate and aimless mass of conflicting sentiments and views.

Regular price, $2.50 per year, or $1.25 for a volume of 26 numbers. On trial for six months $1.00. No subscriptions taken for less than six months. To the worthy poor, free, by their reporting themselves and requesting its continuance, once in six months. The friends of the Review are invited to earnest and unceasing efforts to extend its circulation.

The Youth's Instructor

Is a monthly sheet, published as above, and designed to be to the youth and children what the Review and Herald is to those of riper years. You who wish to see your children instructed in the great truths which so interest you, will here find a sheet in which these things are set forth in a plain and interesting manner, free from the popular fables and errors of the age. It should not only visit regularly every youth and child who professes to be a follower of Jesus, but should be taken and read in every Sabbath-keeping family. Don't forget the children. See that they have the Instructor. Terms, 25 cts. per year in advance.

The Health Reformer.

This is the title of a monthly health journal, "devoted to an exposition of the laws of our being, and the application of those laws in the preservation of health and the treatment of disease." It is an earnest advocate of the true philosophy of life, the only rational method of treating disease, and the best means of preserving health. Practical instructions will be given from month to month relative to water, air, light, food, sleep, rest, recreation, &c. Health, its recovery and preservation, is a subject of world-wide interest, whatever may be a person's tenets in other respects; and to this the Reformer will be exclusively devoted. Edited by H. S. Lay, M. D., Managing Physician of the Western Health-Reform Institute. Terms $1.00 in advance for a volume of twelve numbers. Address Dr. H. S. Lay, Battle Creek, Mich.

The Sabbath Question

Is becoming a theme of wide-spread and absorbing interest. To those who wish to give the subject a thorough investigation, we recommend the History of the Sabbath. As a work setting forth a connected Bible view of the Sabbath question, its history since the Christian era, and the different steps by which the human institution of the first day of the week has usurped the place of the Bible institution of the seventh day, it is unsurpassed by any publication extant. Between two and three hundred quotations from history are given, to each of which is appended a full reference to the authority from which it is taken. It is replete with facts and arguments which challenge denial or refutation. Other works on this subject, from the penny tract to the largest size pamphlet, will be found noticed in our book list. There is no other Bible subject upon which a more extensive misunderstanding exists, than upon the Sabbath question. Circulate the books, and spread abroad the light on this subject.

The Second Advent.

The works upon this important subject to which we would call especial attention, are, The Prophecy of Daniel, The Sanctuary and 2300 Days, and The Three Messages of Rev. xiv. The first gives an exposition of the plain and thrilling prophecies of Daniel ii, vii, and viii, showing from the course of empire that the God of Heaven is about to set up his kingdom. The Sanctuary question is the great central subject of the plan of salvation, and yet there are but few, comparatively, who have any acquaintance with it. It gives a new interest to a great part of the Bible, leads to an intelligent view of the position and work of Christ as our great High Priest in Heaven, completely explains the past Advent movement, and shows clearly our position in prophecy and the world's history. The three messages bring to view present duty, and future peril. All should read these books, and ponder well their teaching.

The Review and Herald.

Battle Creek, Mich., Third-day, May 7, 1867.

Those coming to Conference with teams, will please bring what they can conveniently in the line of quilts, blankets, buffalo robes, &c., as all such articles will come in place.

Remember the fast, next Sabbath, May 11. See remarks of Bro. Andrews in another column.

A FEW COPIES OF A RARE WORK. We have on hand some copies of Storrs' Six Sermons, in sheets. This is one of the first works on the state of the dead, and destiny of the wicked, and has probably done as much as any other one work in spreading the light on that subject. Price, postpaid, 5c.

One number more of the Review will be published before Conference, and then the paper will be omitted one week, No. 24 being issued May 28, instead of May 21.

Quarterly Meetings in Minn., and Report from Iowa, are necessarily laid over till next week.

Read the article, "Babylon is Fallen." We have never taken stronger ground on the fall of the churches, than is there set forth from other Advent writers.

STILL COMING UP. It seems that the United States, as symbolized in prophecy, Rev. xiii, 11, and onward, is still developing its greatness by the acquisition of new territory, as well as by increasing in riches and strength. In other words, the two horned beast is still "coming up." An eastern paper remarks in reference to the late purchase of Russian America:—

"The growth of the United States territorially has been very remarkable. Russian America is the fifth grand addition to our domain, and our territory is now more than four times as large as at the organization of the government. Each successive addition has been objected to on the ground that we already had too much territory, but we have found use for it all, and events have amply justified the wisdom and foresight by which the various purchases have been made."

And how has this growth and development been brought about? Not by war and conquest as in the case of most European kingdoms, but by the silent and peaceable means of purchase. The winds did not "strive upon the sea," and the beast arise by conquering and overturning its predecessors, but it came up peaceably "out of the earth."

Thoughts on the Revelation.

THIS work is now in the hands of the binder, and will probably be ready for orders as soon as they can be sent in. Neatly and substantially bound in cloth, pp. 328. Price, $1.00, postage 12c.

New Tracts.

THE Association has just issued four new tracts, on timely and important subjects.

1. "Popular Objections to the Resurrection of the Body Briefly Considered." This is an able defense of that great hope of the church in all ages, the resurrection of the body, against all grades of skepticism. It is just the thing to assure the hearts of believers on that subject in reference to which the great apostle to the Gentiles had hope toward God. 20 pp. Price, 3c.

2. "Geology and the Bible," containing testimony from different sources, confirming what the Bible says of the longevity and great stature of the first generations of men, and showing that there was no pre-Adamic age of the world. 16 pp. Price, 2c.

3. A new edition of the excellent tract, "Thoughts for the candid," by Bro. J. N. Andrews, containing a brief consideration of the following subjects: A Gloomy Doctrine, The Prayer of the Souls under the Altar, Rev. vi, 11, and Killing the Soul, Matt. x, 28: Luke xii, 4, 5. Eight pages. Price 1c.

4. "The Heavenly Meeting," by J. Matteson. A tract relating to the second advent, and describing in glowing terms the joy of meeting Jesus, the angels and the saints of all ages. Four pages. Price 1c.

Postage on these tracts is 2 cts for a single copy, by the package, 2cts for each four ounces or fraction thereof. Four copies of the first, eight of the second, sixteen of the third, and thirty-two of the fourth, weigh respectively four ounces, and may be sent for 2cts postage.

"Peek-a-boo."

How it looks to a person, who, unfortunately being obliged to come into church in prayer time, sees from twenty to fifty pair of eyes staring at him on his entering. Is it right for professed Christians in the midst of the sacred act of worshipping God, to have their minds diverted from so holy an act and to stare and look about the room in prayer time, and investigate every little noise which may happen to occur? Says the Saviour, "Watch unto prayer," and an apostle, "Let all things be done decently and in order." Brethren and sisters of the third angel's message, let us never act peek-a-boo in time of prayer. G. W. A.

MEETINGS IN WISCONSIN.

MARCH 6th, I left home for Hundred Mile Grove. I arrived at Bro. Jordan's at Lodi, the 8th, and went with him to meeting Sabbath morning. I tarried with the brethren here till the 25th, laboring from house to house, and trying to preach the word of life to them. The brethren are greatly scattered, and have to make quite an effort to all get together on the Sabbath. We tried to hold up the present truth before them, and warn them of the dangers that lie in their way. We trust that our time has not been spent in vain. The brethren seem much encouraged, and four or five have made a start to go through with the people of God to Mount Zion. God grant that they may be faithful and overcome at last.

The 25th and 26th, I visited at Lodi, and tried to encourage the brethren all I could. The 27th, I rode from Lodi to Dell Prairie, thirty-five miles. I was truly glad to meet the little band of brethren and sisters that reside here and find them still striving to serve the Lord. I stayed with them till Monday, April 1st. Held seven meetings with them. The Lord gave liberty in presenting the truth, and we sincerely hope that this effort may prove a blessing to them. On first-day, March 31st, we went some two miles to a stream of water where eight willing souls were buried with their Lord in baptism. Oh! that they may endure to the end that they may be saved.

It is a pleasing sight to see the young come out from the world and leave its follies and fashions and take upon themselves the yoke of Christ. This is choosing the good part that shall never be taken away from them.

In the afternoon we met together, had a short discourse and an excellent social meeting, after which we organized s. b. amounting to $98.20 yearly. This shows that these dear brethren and sisters love the truth and are anxious to help carry it forward.

April 1st, left for Marquette. Was met at Cambria by Bro. Farrar. The roads were almost impassable, which, together with a rain and snow storm, was greatly against our meeting. Still there was a goodly number present, and the Lord met with us. The brethren and sisters here and at Mackford are firm in the truth. The opposition they have to meet only confirms their faith.

I received on this tour $1075.00, stock taken in the Health Institute, which shows that the brethren have confidence in this branch of the work of God.

I returned home April 10th, and shall probably remain here till after our State Conference.

R. F. ANDREWS.

Appointments.

And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of Heaven is at hand.

THE next Monthly Meeting of the Lisbon, Anamosa and Marion churches will be held in Lisbon Sabbath and first-day, May 18 and 19, 1867.

Minnesota State Conference.

In accordance with the suggestion of the General Conference Committee, and in harmony with the invitation of the brethren at that place, we appoint the Minnesota State Conference to be held at Mantorville, Dodge Co., commencing Thursday, June 13, at 6 p. m., and continuing till the Sunday evening following.

We invite every church in the Conference, and every little company of Sabbath-keepers who hold regular prayer-meetings, and pay Systematic Benevolence, to send a delegate. Let all such send with their delegates to the Conference a written report of their standing, their losses and additions, during the year, also the yearly amount of their Systematic Benevolence fund. The brethren who attend will bring some bedding and provisions, as the brethren at Mantorville are too few in number to sustain such a meeting without such accommodation.

MINN. STATE CONF. COM.

If the Lord will, I will meet with the brethren and sisters at Portland, Me., in a Monthly Meeting, June 12. Perhaps some other preacher also may attend. Of course all are invited to attend who can consistently. I would like to see some one from Woodstock. D. M. CANRIGHT.

"ABIDE WITH US."

"ABIDE with us," our Saviour, the day is now far spent,
And we, like those disciples, who once to Emmaus went,
Would pray thee with us tarry, not only for a night,
But with us take up thine abode, our hearts to thee unite.

"Abide with us," we pray thee. The way we tread is drear
And lone, when thou art absent, but thou our path can cheer.
Our hearts to thee would open, we now would let thee in,
Nor longer bid thee knocking stand, by lukewarmness and sin.

"Abide with us," dear Jesus, when clouds of darkness lower,
And shield us by thy Spirit from Satan's cruel power;
May we, in deep affliction, our refuge find in thee,
And as our day, so may our strength, now and forever be.

"Abide with us," our Saviour. Fulfilling signs portend
A day of darkness near at hand; momentous scenes impend;
Thou only canst sustain us, amid devouring flame;
Oh, heed our importunity, thy presence, Lord, we claim.

We ask thee to abide with us, not merely to sojourn,
Expound to us thy sacred truth, and cause our hearts to burn,
Open our eyes to know the Lord, nor let our unbelief
Harden our hearts, and blind our minds, and bring our souls to grief.

In thy pavilion shelter us, amid the gathering storm,
While angels stand for our defence, like men of war in form;
Dwell in us by thy Spirit, till thy majesty we see,
And then "forever with the Lord" may we abide with thee.

The Sermon.

I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom.
PREACH THE WORD. 2 Tim iv, 2.

THE LAST WORK OF THE TRUE CHURCH.

BY ELD. E. B. SAUNDERS.

TEXT. "Surely the Lord will do nothing but he revealeth his secret unto his servants, the prophets." Am. s iii, 7.

How may we discern the work of God, and the people upon whom his blessing rests, when all profess to be walking in the light, and to be living out the teachings of the word of God? Every church has its creed or articles of faith founded on the Bible; and all profess to enjoy the deep moving of the Spirit of God. One sect will believe that certain acts are necessary, while another sect requires certain other and different acts, and each claims evidence from the word of God to sustain its theory, till we have, instead of the one way, a multitude of conflicting creeds—a babel of confusion, receiving from the Holy Spirit the fitting name, "Babylon." No wonder that many honest hearts are bewildered, and know not which way to turn, or how to escape the snare of Satan. The light of truth is progressive, and doctrines once obscure, in time, shine like the noonday sun, the Holy Spirit illuminating those Bible doctrines designed to become present truth to each generation, and testing their character as disciples of Christ.

Once, faith in Jesus Christ was the burden of apostolic preaching, and caused believers much persecution. To acknowledge Jesus was to forfeit their lives; yet multitudes believed; for the Spirit of God illuminated every text in the Old Testament bearing on this subject, till it seemed to them to be the grand truth upon which salvation depended.

Again, when Papal darkness covered the earth, and men were blindly trying to merit salvation by works, the Holy Spirit shone brightly on the doctrine of salvation by faith. The Lord, through Luther and others, tore off the mask of Papal works, and those scriptures teaching faith in the blood of Jesus, stood out in bold relief against their traditions. To them it was the evidence of truth, and they cherished it, though their lives were in danger, and many were put to death; yet it was the path of safety. The days of the Wesleys, of Roger Williams, and William Miller, might be mentioned, wherein the Spirit of God illuminated doctrines before dark or obscure. God blessed the efforts of these holy men, and owned them as his; but shall we stop where Luther did? shall we go only as far as Wesley went? The Holy Spirit, like the pillar of cloud, is going before the people of God and lighting up their pathway. This is the office of the Spirit. "Howbeit, when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth." John xvi, 13. If we stop where Luther or Wesley stopped, the Spirit of light and truth will leave us to grope our way in darkness; so we find the only safe path for us is to walk in the advancing light of truth.

The great questions we may ask ourselves in order to find the people of God and the truths belonging to our day, are, first, In what portion of the time allotted to this fallen world are we living? Secondly, What is the faith of the people of God, as pointed out in the Bible, belonging to this time, and their present duty?

We will now consider the first inquiry, namely,

I. In what portion of the time allotted to this fallen world are we living? The apostles Peter, Paul, and others, lived about eighteen hundred years ago; if we find them speaking of their own times as the "last days," "last times," &c., we may justly conclude that we are living in the latter part of time. Thus Peter speaks of what Joel says shall come to pass in the last days, as receiving a fulfillment in his day. Acts ii, 16, 17; and Paul in speaking of the ministry of Christ and the apostles, says, "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." Heb. i, 1, 2. Hence we understand that the last days had begun to draw near eighteen hundred years ago, and that we must be very much nearer the last day than was the apostolic church; but other scriptures point out our whereabouts with greater certainty.

The disciples greatly desired to understand these things, and came privately to our Lord, saying, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" He graciously answers their questions, but first cautions them, in their eagerness for that day, against deception, false Christs and false prophets; also points them to tribulation, hatred and death, as yet before them; of a great apostasy, in which the love of many would grow cold; also of a tribulation so great that the people of God were well-nigh destroyed from the earth. Then follow the signs which betoken the near approach of the end; signs far beyond the reach of human agency, or for human wisdom and foresight to discover. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven." Have all or a portion of these signs been fulfilled? I do not expect in one short discourse to enter into the details of the fulfillment of the scriptures mentioned, but merely give a brief outline.

More than seventeen centuries passed before the church or the world acknowledged that they had seen the first sign fulfilled, namely, the darkening of the sun; and man had well-nigh forgotten that such a sign was to be given, but God never forgets; he designed to awaken Christians to a reality of his existence, and to startle them from their sleep. In May, 1780, in the time of full moon, when an eclipse of the sun could not take place, the sun suddenly refused to shine, and a pall of darkness covered the earth at mid-day; the fowls went to rest, and everything betokened the sudden approach of night. Then men with strange feelings of awe and fear looked into each other's faces to read, if possible, the meaning of the strange occurrence; and a feeling seemed to take possession of all that the day of judgment had come; solemnity rested upon every countenance, and men noted for holiness were thronged by their anxious neighbors to learn the way to God. The night following was one of intense darkness, though it was at a time of full moon, yet the moon refused to give its light. Such an event had never occurred before, and never has since; and it could be no other than the sign referred to by our Saviour.

Has the sign next in order, namely, the falling of the stars, been fulfilled? In November, 1833, people were startled by what appeared to be the stars falling in showers from the heavens, and they fell as described in the Revelation, like a fig-tree casting her untimely figs when shaken of a mighty wind. This has ever been regarded as a fulfillment of our Lord's words, and as a sign that the end of the world was near.

The shaking of the powers of the heavens will take place when the Lord shall roar out of Zion and utter his voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and the earth shall shake. Joel iii, 16. It will be in immediate connection with the coming of our Lord, hence the last sign given by our Saviour before his second coming, has been fulfilled. Our Lord told us that when we should see these things come to pass, then we might know that he is near, even at the doors.

But there are other events transpiring around us, which show us that we are near the end of time. The prophecy of Daniel has been opened to our understanding, so that we can trace the course of universal empire down through the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian and Roman empires. We have passed the division of the Roman empire into ten portions, spoken of in Dan. ii, 41; vii, 24, and have seen the rise of the little horn, which is the Papacy, Dan. viii, 8, coming up and exercising its power over the saints of God, and seeming to defy the God of Heaven by its acts of blasphemy, and trampling the holy law of God under foot, as though it originated with some earthly tyrant, and ought to be abhorred by Christians. We have seen this horn called by Paul, The Man of Sin, exercising its power for the long period of twelve hundred and sixty years; then we have seen it crippled and wasting from the effects of the deadly wound, Rev. xiii, 3, given it by Napoleon in 1798, and its reviving slightly afterwards, till now but a name remains. The authority of the Pope is confined to the walls of Rome, and men bid him defiance even there. Paul, speaking of this power, said that the Lord should consume him by the brightness of his coming, 2 Thess. ii, 8, and the prophet Daniel said, "They shall take away his dominion to consume and to destroy it unto the end." Dan. vii, 26. The consumption has been going on till but a vestige remains. Hence we must be near the end.

Other signs we have seen fulfilled before our eyes, which the great apostle to the Gentiles said should transpire in the last days. Spiritualism, or spirit manifestations, commenced in 1848, and now they influence millions of our race, and lead them from God and his truth. "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils." 1 Tim. iv, 1. It is not our design to enter into a discussion of the merits of Spiritualism, but simply to mention it as one of the signs of the end. The wonders performed by the aid of spirits will increase, till they will, if possible, deceive the very elect, and will gather the kings of the earth to the battle of the great day of God Almighty. Rev. xvi, 14. Hence, the great day is not far off, and we are living when Satan is training and arming his subjects for the last great conflict. Yet time passes along, the sun rises and sets, the seasons come and go just as they did in the days of our fathers; and our eyes are not half open to discover our whereabouts on the ocean of time; our chart is neglected, our compass forgotten, and our anchor lost. Oh! how can we escape certain destruction?

We behold a popular church, professing to love God, yet hating his law; exalting the name of Jesus, but not loving his appearing; professing to be separate from the world, yet acting like the world, loving its pleasures, frivolities, and vain show, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men, while the precious truth of God is degraded and trampled under foot. Dan. viii, 12. Her watchmen are blind, Isa. lvi, 10; ignorant of the truth, seeing only peace and safety in the future. Religion is used as a cloak to cover the greatest crimes. Self-love and self-exaltation is the one desire of its ministers; all desire to be great, and many seek to be greatest. The desire of worldly gain also fills a large place in their hearts. To enjoy the good things of this life is their study. Paul has described the pleasure-seeking church of the last days, and we see it fulfilled in our own times; hence we must be in the last days. Let us read his description in 2 Tim. iii, 1-5: "This know also that in the last days perilous times shall come; for men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away." Can we read this description of the churches and fail to see its fulfillment in our own time?

Other signs might be given, both in the heavens above and the earth beneath, but these are sufficient to lead us to the conclusion that we are near the close of time, and that Jesus' coming is nigh at hand, and corruption and darkness cover the earth and especially the church professing to be the church of Christ.

It being established, then, that we are living in the closing scenes of this world, it becomes us to inquire what is our duty and the duty of the church in this time. This leads us to the second inquiry, namely,

II. What is to be the faith of God's people, as pointed out in the Bible, belonging to this time, and their present duty? One office of the Holy Spirit is to guide believers into all truth; hence, if we are living in the last days, the true people of God will be led by the Spirit to know it, and they will be looking for the end of all things, for Jesus' coming, and will be trying to get ready to receive him. When Jesus went away, he left a little anxious company looking forward with bright hope to the day when their Lord would come and take them to his home in the kingdom of Heaven. The coming day seemed to be the theme of conversation, and the longing desire of their hearts; such a people our Lord will come to save; such a people he will expect to find at his second advent; hence the faith of the remnant church will be the same as that taught by the apostles; and we now turn to the writings of chosen men of God to learn their faith in regard to the second coming of Christ.

Paul commends the church at Thessalonica for their readiness to receive them (Paul, Sylvanus, and Timothy), and to turn from "idols to serve the living God, and to wait for his Son from Heaven." 1 Thess. i, 10. This church had been founded by these apostolic teachers, and had been brought from the service of dumb idols, up to that high degree of faith evinced by their waiting for the coming of Jesus. Such was the earnest zeal of this church that they were likely to be deceived by false teachers; so in his second letter he beseeches them that they "be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter, as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand." Here we may learn that this church were looking for Jesus, and were liable to be deceived, so Paul writes to inform them of their danger. He does not tell them that they had departed from the faith or were cherishing a heresy, but gives them a scriptural reason for not expecting the day of Christ immediately; namely, the falling away in the church and the development of the Man of Sin. But this reason will not apply to us; for the Man of Sin is in the past. And even Paul himself had hope in the appearing of Jesus, that in that day he should receive a crown of righteousness which the Lord would give not only to him, but to all who love his appearing. Hence, love for the appearing of Jesus will be a characteristic of the people of God in the last days.

The same apostle writing to Titus, says, "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world." All are ready to acknowledge that these words are for us, and that we ought to heed them; but how do all feel about the next verse? "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Are these things to be spoken of privately only, as a mere matter of opinion, or publicly and openly? "These things speak, and exhort and rebuke with all authority."

The apostle James does not condemn the brethren for looking for Jesus, but comforts them in their affliction with the thought that "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh;" and Peter warns all who "have obtained a like precious faith with us" against scoffers, who will come in the last days, saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?" If scoffers mock at his coming, believers will be doing the opposite, that is, looking for him. None can read the writings of the beloved John without feeling that he had an intense longing for the coming of Jesus; and nearly the last sentence of the Bible from his pen indicates his desire: "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

We have seen that Spiritualism is a manifestation of Satanic power belonging to our own times, and that they teach a doctrine concerning demons. They have spread over the earth with wonderful rapidity, and the prophet has said, "When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him." Isa. lix, 19. Satan, the great enemy of our race, has come in like a flood with his rapping, writing, and wonder-working delusion; and now the Spirit of the Lord, through his chosen servants, will lift up a standard in opposition. The manifestation of the unclean spirits, according to their own testimony, is designed to convince men of the immortality of the soul. This being their design, the church of God will be teaching the truth in respect to immortality; they will bring out the Bible doctrine on this point.

In the Bible, the dead are represented as asleep, unconscious of anything transpiring on earth, it being plainly stated that the "dead know not anything;" that their "love, and their hatred, and their envy is now perished;" that "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest;" and that in death a man "hath no pre-eminence above a beast;" for "all go to one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again;" that in the day of his death "his thoughts perish;" that "the dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence;" that in this state a man's sons "come to honor, and he knoweth it not, and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them." The whole hope of a future is, in the Bible, based upon a resurrection from the dead; and this life being the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, Rom. vi, 23, "he that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life." "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."

With such promises as this, it is no wonder that the church cling to the word of God, instead of to the fables of Spiritualism or nominal Christendom. It is no wonder they looked forward to Jesus' coming with such intense anxiety. The news of Jesus near was music in their ears; and their hearts thrilled with emotion in hope of a blissful immortality in the city of our God. Oh! precious hope! preserved for us! handed down through eighteen centuries of Pagan and Papal oppression and darkness to quicken the faith and courage of the little remnant, and hold them, like an anchor, till the last terrible storm of Satanic darkness shall pass by! Doubly precious now, are these promises of life as we draw near the glorious day. Doubly precious hope! Doubly precious truth! May thy holy light beam into the farthest recesses of our heart, and the renewing Spirit of God make thee still more dear.

Satan has sinned with a high hand against Heaven, but he does not rest satisfied here. He will, if possible, lead poor, fallen man to the same depths of iniquity. He would fain lead them to cast away the Bible as a book of fables. He does this effectually by means of spirit manifestations; and all that he can influence into this channel he feels are securely his. But all will not believe his lying deception. His great masterpiece was too overdrawn to deceive all; hence some milder deception must be used; something savoring of Christianity to quiet the consciences of the naturally religious. He has therefore caused division and distraction among the professed people of God, till they hardly know what they do believe; but with a confused idea that their particular sect must be right, they are led on by blind guides till they will all fall into the ditch of bigotry and superstition. Traditions, handed down from heathen times, are regarded with greater sanctity than the commandments of God. Satan is well pleased with such worship, knowing it is in vain. Matt. xv, 9. Satan has struck directly at the government of God, by leading the minds of his willing victims away from the perfect law of God—away from the perfect rule by which all mankind will be tried in the judgment—to regard as holy a counterfeit, never accepted at the bar of God. Man teaches his fellow-man to trample under foot the authority of the Most High. The Sabbath which holy men delighted to honor, has been degraded to a level with the common days, while Sunday, a common day, not sanctified, not blessed, not commanded, has been elevated to the honorable position belonging to the Sabbath of the Lord. God will not save his people with all this error and superstition darkening their minds; but will first purify them of these errors and bring them up to that enlightened state where they can worship God understandingly. He will "purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Titus ii, 14. The prophet has spoken of the work of the true church in the last days as engaging in the restoration of the Sabbath. "Thus saith the Lord, keep ye judgment, and do justice; for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed. Blessed is the man that doeth this, and the son of man that layeth hold on it; that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and keepeth his hand from doing any evil." Isa. lvi, 1, 2. We have the time given when the blessing will rest upon those who keep the Sabbath: it is when salvation is near to come, and salvation will come when Jesus comes the second time. Heb. ix, 28. The same prophet speaking of the time when men are waiting for the Lord, and looking for him, commands them to "bind up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples." Isa. viii, 16, 17. The testimony, or law, has been crushed by the iron heel of Rome (Dan. vii, 25), till that power, in its decline, loses its control over the minds of men; and now while men are looking for their Lord, they are called upon to bind up the law among his disciples or Christians. Hence the true church will engage in this work of restoration.

The last great work of the remnant church, some of the main features of which have been mentioned, will not be done in a corner. By these things mankind will be tested; hence the warning will be faithfully given. Numbers are of no advantage in the work of the Lord. He can use many or few. A few consecrated servants are better than an army of half-hearted professors. The faithful few will cry aloud and spare not; they will lift up their voice like a trumpet and show the people their transgression and the house of Jacob their sins.

We tremble and hesitate when we find the fourth commandment binding upon us; the cross appears too heavy for us to take up; and we wait, making one excuse and another, till we grieve the tender Spirit of God, and our minds grow dark, and Satan catches away the good seed. Poor, fallen humanity hates to humble itself before God, praying for pardon and strength to confess the truth. When we believe that Jesus is soon coming, and are ashamed to confess this truth before others, we deny our Lord. When we are ashamed of the law of God and the Sabbath, we virtually deny our Lord who died to magnify the law and make it honorable. When we are ashamed of any point of present truth, we are virtually ashamed of the great Author of it, and of such he will be ashamed before his Father and the angels.

God calls upon us to love him, to honor him, saying that such he will honor. And shall we expect exaltation and honor from God while we trample under foot one of his commandments, or evade one of his ordinances? Nothing but a joyful obedience to all the Lord requires, will be accepted when our cases come up before God. The church in the last days will be found without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; not like the world, walking in all the pride of their abominations, well described by Isaiah, as walking "with stretched-forth necks, and wanton eyes;" but humble, obedient, poor, afflicted, seeking righteousness and meekness, in hope of final acceptance and pardon through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The Lord could send angels to warn the inhabitants of earth and get the light of truth before them; but then they would believe without faith; the dignity and glory of angels would compel belief. But God has seen fit to require faith, simple faith in him and his word, and has chosen poor, frail man to declare his word to his perishing fellow-men. The last message is one of great solemnity; for soon probation will end, and the affairs of this world will forever close; besides, eternal interests are at stake, and only a moment, as it were, of time in which to prepare to meet the Lord. Jesus is performing the closing work of his priestly office, making the last plea for us. Oh! shall we be merry? shall we seek pleasure, hilarity and glee, while we have eternal interests at stake? Can we deny our Lord, or refuse to hear his reproach in such a time as this? Will we treat the warning of the messengers of God with the utmost unconcern, or what is worse, mock them in their earnest, faithful efforts to save us? A merciful God has reached down his hand to raise us up. He graciously invites us to come; he pleads his own, undying love, and his great compassion on us; he tells us of the agony of his dear Son, of his blood like sweat, and the hours of mortal agony he endured for us while hanging between the heavens and the earth, when angels refused to behold the dreadful sight and veiled their faces, and even the sun refused to shine on such a scene.

Such things has he told us, that we may know the infinite cost of our redemption. But God does not stop here; he not only invites and pleads, but he has portrayed before us in beautiful language the unseen glories of the world to come—its hills and vales, its rivers of water of life, its beautiful trees of golden fruit, its peaceful, loving inhabitants—of the golden city with its pearly gates, its streets of gold and jasper walls, to encourage the rebellious people of earth to throw down their weapons of rebellion and accept of pardon.

But God is still more condescending toward us. He even sends his messengers to us personally, to entreat of us to be reconciled to God. They faithfully point out our danger, tell us of Jesus' coming, open our minds to understand the Scriptures, and do all they can to encourage us to obedience. But if we refuse, oh! if we refuse, our condemnation will be just, and our blood will be upon our own heads.

THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

A REVIEW OF THE LATE ACTION OF THE METHODISTS——THE AUTHOR'S OPINIONS—HIS REASONS AND HIS IDEAS OF CONSCIENTIOUS RIGHT.

OWATONNA, OCT. 4, 1867.

EDITORS ST. PAUL PRESS: In the WEEKLY PRESS of Sept. 26th, I find the proceedings of the M. E. Church Conference. Among the resolves I find a request for the publication of their proceedings on the Sabbath question in all the St. Paul papers. Again, I find the following language in the report of a committee, composed in part of Revs. D. Cobb, of the Jackson street Church, St. Paul, and Taher Brooks, President of Hamline University: "That never was there greater need of vigilance on the part of the Christian church, to preserve the Christian Sabbath from desecration and threatened extinction, than there is now. Opposition to it—to its sanctity and its obligations—is organized, wide spread, and determined. * * * Our army and navy regulations require an inspection of soldiers and marines on the Sabbath. * * * The Sabbath is a divine institution. Its obligations are therefore authoritative. * * * Resolved, that it is clearly the province of the State, and imperatively its duty to prohibit, by legal enactment, all amusements, occupations, habits and customs on the Sabbath day, that are dangerous to public virtue and morality."

Now what does this mean? Does it mean that without regard to the honest, moral convictions of others, the M. E. Church is in favor of establishing by force of man's law, what not one of them can find in divine law? And this, too, in a land of liberty. Yes, it does. When Methodism was started in England—a land of religious oppression—they met the enactments of Parliament prohibiting them. Have they arrived, too, at the height of power that leads to intoleration?

Let us review. They ask a hearing through the press; let a mass of those who dissent from them be heard also. They set out with the avowal that others oppose the sanctity of the "Christian Sabbath." This means Sunday. Now I ask Messrs. Cobb and Brooks to show one word in Holy Writ, establishing the first day of the week as Sabbath. In one of their resolves they quote a part of the fourth commandment, and omit the rest, which condemns their Sunday Sabbath. Now, let us be candid. I have always kept, and always shall, the Sunday Sabbath, as a day of rest. But I deny its sanctity; and ask these Reverend gentlemen to make it appear. I am aware that long ages have elapsed since the heathen Sunday was, by man's law, made the Christian Sabbath, but that proves nothing.

We believe in republican governments and freedom of religion; yet monarchy and intolerance are older than all these ideas. A large mass of good men believe in the Jewish law, which ordained the seventh day as the Sabbath. Shall our State enact a law, sending American citizens to jail, because they keep the fourth commandment, instead of the edict of Constantine? We have men who would suffer martyrdom rather than obey such a law, and they, in Christianity, are as blameless as any in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Are these men prepared for the results of such a law?

Rev. Mr. Ingraham, of Goodhue county, told me he believed the words, "Six days shalt thou labor," were as binding as the words, "but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord." Will these men enact a law, that shall send an officer on the seventh day of the week, and arrest Mr. Ingraham in his pulpit, because he worked the Sunday before? And suppose he should refuse to pay the fine laid, commit him to jail with horse thieves, vagrants, murderers, and drinking brawlers!

I know that the mass of people, who at first sight approved these resolves, would never submit to see a law so enforced. Yet the drunken brawler has as much right to enforce such a law in its letter, as you have to lock him up. Never make a law for huncombe. Enforce all law.

Again; there are many that believe as I do, that all of the Jewish law was abolished, even the law regarding the Sabbath. "Blotting out the hand writing of ordinances that were against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross. Let no man, therefore, judge you, in meat or in drink, or in respect of a holyday, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days." (In the original, "or of the Sabbaths.") Col. ii, 14, 16. Again, a man may be confined all the week at a desk, attending to his daily labor. Now suppose the Sabbath divine; even then he must only use it as a day of rest. Could it be a rest to him to be confined either in his own house, or the church. Would it not rather be keeping it as a rest to ramble over the fields and groves, inhaling new vigor for to-morrow's confinement? Not but what I believe in church-going and Christianity. But man-made laws never drove Christianity where the heart was stubborn and free.

Let the time-honored custom of keeping Sunday as a day of rest, be perpetuated. Let us have a day on which to hold meetings, and feel at ease from our daily toil. Let us hope it may, for convenience, be as universal as may be. But do not let us follow the lead of almost every land, and as soon as we obtain numbers sufficient, try to compel others, in religious matters, to do and think as we do by penal law. Let any man show me a law with penalties enacted by man, in the interest of a religion or sect, and I will show where men attempted, in every instance, to perpetuate an error.

The simple fact is, the Constitution of the United States, and of our own State, forbid such laws. They clearly interfere with the rights of conscience, and are mere nullities, besides being an insult to free thought.

Let no one think that the great mass, even of those who think as I do, would be willing to have all our laws that forbid disturbances of religious meeting by hoisterous and unbecoming language or actions; that forbid evil practices on Sunday, that are calculated to disturb the quiet church-goers, repealed. No! rather let them be extended to every day of the week; so the man who believes in a seventh-day Sabbath, may have the same protection to his sacred day, as others. But whatever is lawful on Monday, is lawful on Sunday.

The Chinaman may, by our constitution, set up a temple to Buddha or Shiva, everywhere in our land, and on any day he pleases, be undisturbed in worshipping therein. It is the light of Christianity, not the force of civil law, that makes us the steady, church-going people we are. And our freedom from Popery, and all intolerance, is the effect of a free conscience, unbound by either a law-made priesthood or a carnal enactment. Every law in aid of religious opinions, as to give them force over dissenters, is a breach of that great charter of liberty, made by our forefathers, in which we are guaranteed the right to do and think in religious matters as we please. Never unite, in the slightest way, the Church and State, or both will fall. —L'Inconnue.

GOD'S PROVIDENCE.

"With patient mind thy course of duty run;
 God nothing does, nor suffers to be done,
 But thou wouldst do thyself, couldst thou but see
 The end of all events as well as he."

WORK.

WHAT are you now doing for the salvation of souls? Is there not now a soul unsaved for whose salvation you ought just now to make an effort? But, perhaps, sacrifices in time, labor, money, or feeling, may be required in order to reach that soul. Will you now make the effort? Or will you delay it till a more convenient season, and let that unsaved soul remain as lost? Unless you are wholly sure that you have already made every prayerful effort within your power to clear your skirt of this blood, haste to do it now, for Satan, the accuser, is rejoicing over your sins of "omission" as well as those of "commission." Is your mind not free to perform this neglected duty? Seek God in prayer. Perhaps thou hast left thy first love. Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, "and do the first works;" lest the light be removed from you and you be left in darkness. If Christ made sacrifice to save souls, the Christian must, in this respect, be Christ-like. Have you become lukewarm? Seek to arouse those energies due the Master's cause. Seek to "live holiness" in such a manner that there will be no difference between your life and the precepts of truth. Without this harmony of precept and example, your efforts for the salvation of others will be of little or no effect. Live so through the day, that when you lie down at night you can compose your mind as if you were not to awake "till the heavens be no more." Get into that nearness to God that it is your privilege to be, and when you awake in the morning consider that new day as your last, and live accordingly. Let the mantle of earthly pleasure hang loosely about you. When the fruit is ripe it falls off the tree easily. So when a Christian is truly weaned from the world, he is prepared for death. A soul disengaged from the world is a heavenly one, and to such Christ's coming will be none too soon, and from such the teachings of the Spirit will go forth pure, and with the power of God unto salvation.

Now, in the beginning of the new Conference year, let each resolve upon a searching work, with ourselves first, and thus be prepared to seek the salvation of others. "Now is the accepted time."

THE LOST SHEEP.

I HAVE just read the sermon in the REVIEW, "The Lost Sheep." I always read the sermons with interest, but the present one more so than usual. I have watched, with great interest, Bro. White's drawing out and searching after the lost sheep of the house of Israel. I fully believe the Lord is in the work, and may the Lord, through the prayers of the church, fully support Bro. and Sr. White in their arduous labors of love in restoring such to the fold. And may others co-operate in this great and good work, and may the church enter fully into the spirit of it, until the sheep that have gone astray may all be gathered into the fold.

Dear brethren and sisters, may we all look beyond the watchmen on the walls; yes, look to Jesus, in his humiliation, for lessons of wisdom, of patience, of forbearance, and a forgiving spirit. Oh! for a meek and quiet spirit! A humble and teachable spirit! May we confess and forsake all our sins, that they may all be blotted out of the book of remembrance, and our names be retained in the Lamb's book of life. Oh! for a deeper work of grace in all our hearts! And may God have mercy, and send help in this our time of need.

ALMOST HOME.

GLORY be to God, we are almost home! Earth's long night of weeping is most over. Soon, if faithful, we shall hear the welcome words from the lips of Jesus, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. A few more aches and pains of this mortal life; a few more death-bed scenes; a few more tears, and we shall enter the heavenly rest. Oh! how we sometimes long for the Eden-land, the earth made new. I am weary of the sin and wickedness of this world. I long for the world to come, where nothing can mar our perfect peace. It is true there is much that seems lovely here, but it is transitory. Here we see decay stamped upon almost everything. Here the hand of disease pales the cheek, the eye grows dim, and like the flowers, we wither, droop, and die. But thank God, when we are made immortal no disease can ever prey upon our frames; neither will there be any more death.

"Here disease invades our frames,
 We wither, droop, and die,
 But there eternal youth shall bloom,
 And bright will beam each eye."

Oh! I long for the immortal life where no one will say, I am sick. I long to behold the dear ones that now sleep in death, and clasp them in immortal arms, nevermore to part. It is but a little while ere the voice of the Archangel and the trump of God will call the sleepers forth from their graves. "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Oh! what a joyful day that will be to God's dear children; but a sad one to them that know not God. Lord, help us to endure to the end like good soldiers of the cross, that we may be saved, is my prayer.

"All hail the morn of glory nigh,
 The pilgrim longs to see;
 That dries the tears from every eye,
 Creation's jubilee."

The End Approaching—Ominous Signs.

THE following is from the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, and whether signs or not, it shows a very peculiar state of things.

"Human affairs seem to be approaching a crisis. Great events thicken around us. Decades of years now accomplish results that formerly required centuries. Sin moves with quickened steps; so, too, holiness. The hour is instinct with momentous deeds.

A night of crime is settling down upon the world. In our own nation it is dark and tempestuous, passion and tragic. Drunkenness runs riot. Speculation is unsettling the foundations of public confidence. Skepticism is robbing all classes of their faith and hopes. Fraud and dishonesty darken the halls of trade. Robberies and murders are frequent. Peculation and bribery dwell in high places. The land is full of wickedness. Great cities are seats of sin, pollution, wretchedness. Not over-drawn is this life-picture of to-day.

The counterpart and corrective of all this is seen in the steps of God's providence, admonishing men in the tempest and the earthquake. Turn seaward, and behold the tornado engulfing vast argosies of ships. Look northward, and witness the earthquake shocks that extend far inland from the ocean; or southward, and see them accompanied by mountainous tidal waves that submerged fleets and cities. It is Jehovah who speaks to man in tremblings of the rock-ribbed earth and destroying winds. And what shall we say of cholera, traveling like a destroying angel among the nations; of other epidemics, decimating shiploads of emigrants, or falling upon communities and depopulating them; or of fires, explosions, and railroad accidents, that destroy millions of property and thousands of lives, and send thrills of sadness through widely-scattered homes? Are not these God's messengers of wrath—his visible footsteps—dissuading from evil deeds, and sent as warnings to the incorrigible? They premonish the evil-doer that God is just, as well as good, and that the day of retribution will certainly come. They are daily-occurring revelations of God to show his eternal hatred of sinful deeds."

Daniel's Reward.

WHEN Belshazzar, the sacrilegious idolator, was alarmed at the mysterious writing upon the wall of his banqueting-room, he promised Daniel that if he would make known the interpretation of those words which the miraculous hand had inscribed, he should be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about his neck, and be proclaimed the third ruler in the kingdom. Daniel performed the task and received the reward. But here the question arises, Why was the third rank promised to him? Why not the second, which he seemed to have enjoyed under Nebuchadnezzar, as Joseph had done under Pharaoh, and Mordecai under Ahasuerus? To this question there has for a long time no satisfactory answer. But in the year 1854, Sir Henry Rawlinson made the important discovery from documents obtained from the ancient site of "Ur of the Chaldees," that Nabonadius, the son-in-law and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, associated with him in the government during the latter years of his reign, his son Balshazzar, and allowed him his royal title. There were, therefore, two kings at that time; Belshazzar himself occupied the second place of honor, and hence the highest portion to which any subject could be elevated was that of the third personage in the empire.

THE way to have your secrets kept is to keep them yourself.

Obituary Notices.

Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth.

DIED in Battle Creek, Mich., June 25, 1868, Sr. ELECTA PRATT, aged 90 years, 6 months, and 14 days. The deceased, Electa Hubbard, was born in Sunderland, Mass., Dec. 11, 1777. Her husband, William Pratt, was a soldier in the war of 1812, living at that time near Buffalo, N. Y. They afterward removed to Huron Co., Ohio, and from there to Kalamazoo Co., Mich., where he died in 1848. Since that time to the time of her death she has lived with her son, Bro. Edward Pratt, now of this place. She embraced the truth of the Sabbath about five years ago; though in her "second childhood," she seemed to lay hold of the truth with all the strength left her by age. Hearing the family talking about the wrong of tobacco-using, and its being inconsistent with the high and holy profession of the Christian, she immediately laid aside her pipe, and broke off the habit of smoking at the age of 85—thus giving an evidence of her conscientiousness, setting an example of self-denial, and leaving a standing reproof to the strong and vigorous who dally with depraved appetites, and plead the excuse of the strength of habit.

Though very young at the time, she distinctly remembered "the dark day" of 1780, which shows how strong an impression was produced by that phenomenon, as it is well known that a very startling event is indelibly fixed on the mind of a mere child. About three years ago her eyesight returned, since which time she has been able to read without glasses. In her last sickness her senses failed one by one—her sight, speech, and hearing, each in turn being entirely lost. She appeared to be conscious very nearly to the time of her decease, and when shut out from this world, spent much of her time in prayer.

Funeral on Sabbath, 27th, at the house of worship. Discourse from Deut. v, 29. J. H. WAGGONER.

DIED, in Palmyra, Jefferson Co., Wisconsin, June 17, 1868, my brother-in-law, Seaman Christopher, in the nineteenth year of his age. He embraced the present truth last winter under the labors of Brn. R. F. Andrews and H. C. Blanchard, at Little Prairie, Wis. His sufferings were great, but he bore them all with Christian fortitude, feeling wholly resigned to the will of God. He exhorted all of his friends to meet him in the kingdom. We feel his loss, but sorrow not as those that have no hope. Remarks by Eld. J. Matteson, from Rev. xiv, 12, 13. J. W. BLAKE.

OUR FAITH AND HOPE;

Or, Reasons Why We Believe as We Do.

NUMBER EIGHT.—THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

BY ELDER JAMES WHITE.

"CAN ye not discern the signs of the times?" Matt. 16: 3.

Our Lord asked the Pharisees and Sadducees this question at a time when they came to him tempting him for a sign from Heaven. It was a reproof to them for their unbelief in the signs mentioned by the Old-Testament writers, which they professed to believe, and which were actually fulfilling before their eyes, yet disregarded by them. They could tell the weather for the morrow, but had no skill in those prophecies that pointed to that time. "When it is evening, ye say it will be fair weather, for the sky is red; and in the morning, it will be foul weather to-day, for the sky is red and lowering. O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?"

We will here name some of the signs which the Jews had as evidence of Jesus' being the true Messiah.

SIGNS OF THE FIRST ADVENT.

1. The star that appeared to guide the wise men to the place of the infant Saviour, Matt. 2: 2, 9; prophesied of in Num. 24: 17.
2. He was born of a virgin, Matt. 1: 18-25; spoken of in Isa. 7: 14.
3. Bethlehem was his birthplace, Matt. 2: 1; mentioned in Micah 5: 2.
4. Herod's slaying all the children in Bethlehem, from two years old and under, Matt. 2: 16, 18; prophesied of in Jer. 31: 15.
5. His forerunner, John. The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, &c. Isa. 40: 3. All Judea and Jerusalem saw this sign when they went out to be baptized of John. Matt. 3: 1-6.
6. The gospel preached. When Jesus stood up in the synagogue to read, he opened the book and read where it is written, Isa. 61: 1, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel," &c. The eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened upon him. And he said unto them, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." Luke 4: 16-21.
7. His humility when on trial. "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth. He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." Isa. 53: 7.

8. The manner and circumstances of his death. "They gaped upon me with their mouths as a ravening and a roaring lion. I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint. My heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels. . . . They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture;" Ps. 22: 13-18. This prophecy had an exact and literal accomplishment at the crucifixion of Christ, and the Jews saw it. Read Matt. 27: 35.

9. The fulfillment of the seventy weeks of Dan. 9: 24-27. The Jews understood this, or might have understood it. Caiaphas, being high priest that year, said to them, "Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. And this spake he not of himself, but being high priest that year, he prophesied [or taught the prophecies] that Jesus should die for that nation, and not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one, the children of God that were scattered abroad." John 11: 49-52. We might add to these signs the miracles of Christ, his resurrection, the pouring out of the Holy Ghost on the day of pentecost, and still others which were distinctly spoken of by the prophets.

But notwithstanding all this scripture was fulfilling before the faces of the rulers of the Jews, and all these signs were actually accomplished in a little more than thirty years, and they themselves had to acknowledge that notable miracles had been done, yet they believed not.

Well may it be said by this generation, that the Jews deserved wrath, and God was just in destroying their nation and place. But how is it with the professed people of God at this day? Do they believe in that Word which they blame the Jews for rejecting? The Jews were looking for a temporal kingdom, and overlooked the signs of Christ's first advent. The nominal church, as a body, is looking for a temporal millennium, and overlook the signs of his second advent, which are more numerous and forcible than those of his first advent. Then if the signs of Christ's second coming are doubted and rejected by the professed people of God of this generation, the sin of unbelief will rest upon them heavier than it did upon the Jews, in proportion as they reject greater light.

SIGNS OF THE SECOND ADVENT.

1. The dark day of May 19, 1780. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. 24: 29. The tribulation, here mentioned, is that which was upon the church of Christ for 1260 years, noted in Dan. 7: 25; Rev. 12: 6; 13: 5. In Matt. 24: 21, it is said to be "tribulation such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." During the 1260 years of papal persecution, fifty, and some writers say a hundred, millions of Christians were put to death by sword, flame, and rack, and by every other engine of cruelty that wicked men and demons could invent. It was a greater tribulation than the church will ever suffer. It is true that the prophet speaks of a "time of trouble such as never was," when Michael [Christ] shall stand up.

Dan. 12: 1. But that will be a national trouble upon all the wicked, and not on the people of God; for "at that time," says the prophet, "thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book."

The tribulation named in the text cannot apply to the destruction of Jerusalem; for that trouble on that nation was not so great as that of the cities of the plain, when God rained fire and brimstone from heaven on them; or the destruction of the old world by the flood. Neither was it so great as the day of God's anger will be, when the last vials of his wrath shall be poured out.

If this tribulation be applied to the Jews, or any other class of unbelieving men, it cannot be harmonized with Dan. 12: 1, which speaks of the time of trouble such as never was, when Michael shall stand up. Certainly there could not be two times of trouble, at different periods, greater than ever was, or ever would be. Therefore we apply the tribulation spoken of in Matt. 24: 21, 29, to the church during the 1260 years, and the trouble mentioned in Dan. 12: 1, to the unbelieving world, to be experienced by them in the future.

Then, immediately after the tribulation of those days of papal persecution, the sun was to be darkened. Mark this: it does not say, after those days; but after the tribulation of those days. The days reached to 1798, eighteen years this side of the dark day; but the tribulation of the days ceased before the sun was darkened in 1780. The days of tribulation were shortened for the elect's sake. Verse 22. The reformation under Martin Luther modified this tribulation, and continued to restrain the rage and consume the power of the papacy until 1700; since which time, according to all church history, there has been no general persecution against the church. Mark 13: 24, makes this point very plain: "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened." That is, before the 1260 years should close; but after the tribulation, or martyrdom of the church ceased, the sun was darkened. Those who would point to the future, or to the past, prior to the eighteenth century, for the darkening of the sun here mentioned, will do well to read again Mark 13: 24. "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened."

"A something strikingly awful shall forewarn that the world will come to an end, and that the last day is even at the door."—Martin Luther.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived: 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man; for his lamp was trimmed, and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society—Life of Edward Lee.

"The 19th day of May, 1780, was a remarkably dark day. Candles were lighted in many houses. The birds were silent and disappeared. The fowls retired to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of judgment was at hand. The legislature of Connecticut was in session, at Hartford, but being unable to transact business, adjourned.—President Dwight, in (Ct.) Historical Collections.

"ANNIVERSARY OF THE DARK DAY.—The dark day, May 19, 1780, is thus described by Mr. Stone, in his history of Beverly: 'The sun rose clear, but soon assumed a brassy hue. About 10 o'clock, A. M., it became unusually dark. The darkness continued to increase till about one o'clock, when it began to decrease. During this time, candles became necessary. The birds disappeared and were silent, the fowls went to their roosts, the cocks crew as at daybreak, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. The alarm produced by this unusual aspect of the heavens was great.'—Portsmouth Journal, May 20, 1843.

The supernatural darkening of the sun, May 19, 1780, has been so universally understood that Noah Webster's dictionary, in the edition for 1869, under the head of Explanatory and Pronouncing Vocabulary of Noted Names, says,

"The dark day, May 19, 1780;—so called on account of a remarkable darkness on that day, extending over all New England. In some places, persons could not see to read common print in the open air for several hours together. Birds sang their evening songs, disappeared, and became silent; fowls went to roost; cattle sought the barn-yard; and candles were lighted in the houses. The obscuration began about ten o'clock in the morning, and continued till the middle of the next night, but with differences of degree and duration in different places. For several days previous, the wind had been variable, but chiefly from the south-west and the north-east. The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known."

"From Robert Sears' Guide to Knowledge, published in New York, 1844, we extract the following: 'On the 19th of May, 1780, an uncommon darkness took place all over New England, and extended to Canada. It continued about fourteen hours, or from ten o'clock in the morning till midnight. The darkness was so great that people were unable to read common print, or tell the time of the day by their watches, or to dine, or transact their ordinary business, without the light of candles. They became dull and gloomy, and some were excessively frightened. The fowls went to roost. Objects could not be distinguished but at a very little distance, and everything bore the appearance of gloom and night. Similar days have occasionally been known, though inferior in the degree or extent of their darkness. The causes of these phenomena are unknown. They certainly were not the result of eclipses.'"

2. The dark night of May 19, 1780. "And the moon shall not give her light." Matt. 24: 29.

"The moon shines with a borrowed light; and, therefore, if the sun from whom she borrows her light is turned into darkness, she must fail, of course, and become bankrupt."—Matthew Henry.

"The night succeeding that day (May 19, 1780,) was of such pitchy darkness that, in some instances, horses could not be compelled to leave the stable when wanted for service. About midnight, the clouds were dispersed, and the moon and stars appeared with unimpaired brilliancy."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20, 1843.—Extract from Stone's History of Beverly.

Mr. Tenny, of Exeter, N. H., quoted by Mr. Gage, to the Historical Society, speaking of the dark day and dark night of May 19, 1780, says:

"The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."

Dr. Adams, speaking of the dark night says:

"At nine, it was a darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost every one who happened to be out in the evening, got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night as it was in the day, as the moon had fulfilled the day before."

3. The falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833. "And the stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. 24: 29. We here give an extract from an article written by Henry Dana Ward, in regard to the falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833, published in the Journal of Commerce, Nov. 15, 1833:

"At the cry, 'Look out of the window,' I sprang from a deep sleep, and with wonder saw the east lighted up with the dawn and meteors. The zenith, the north, and the west also, showed the falling stars, in the very image of one thing, and only one, I ever heard of. I called to my wife to behold; and while robing, she exclaimed, 'See how the stars fall!' I replied, 'That is the wonder!' and we felt in our hearts that it was a sign of the last days. For, truly, 'the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. 6: 13. This language of the prophet has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday, it was literally fulfilled. The ancients understood by aster, in Greek, and stella, in Latin, the smaller lights of heaven. The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore, the idea of the prophet, as it is expressed in the original Greek, was literally fulfilled in the phenomenon of yesterday.

"And how did they fall? Neither myself, nor one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy before quoted."

"The stars fell 'even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet. The falling stars did not come as if from several trees shaken, but from one: those which appeared in the east fell toward the east; those which appeared in the north fell toward the north; those which appeared in the west fell toward the west; and those which appeared in the south (for I went out of my residence into the Park) fell toward the south. And they fell not as the ripe fruit falls. Far from it; but they flew, they were cast, like the unripe fruit, which at first refuses to leave the branch; and when, under a violent pressure it does break its hold, it flies swiftly, straight off, descending; and in the multitude falling, some cross the track of others, as they are thrown with more or less force, but each one falls on its own side of the tree. Such was the appearance of the above phenomenon to the inmates of my house."

Prof. Olmstead, of Yale College, says:

"The extent of the shower of 1833 was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the east, to the Pacific on the west; and from the northern coast of South America, to undefined regions among the British possessions on the north, the exhibition was visible, and everywhere presented nearly the same appearance.

"The meteors did not fly at random over all parts of the sky, but appeared to emanate from a point in the constellation Leo, near a star called Gamma Leonis, in the bend of the sickle.

"This is no longer to be regarded as a terrestrial, but as a celestial phenomenon; and shooting stars are now to be no more viewed as casual productions of the upper regions of the atmosphere, but as visitants from other worlds, or from the planetary voids."

The People's Magazine, Boston, Jan., 1834, on the falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833, says:

"The Rockingham (Va.) Register calls it 'A rain of fire,'—thousands of stars being seen at once; some said it began with considerable noise.

"The Journal of Commerce informs, that 'three hundred miles this side of Liverpool the phenomenon was as splendid there as here; and that in St. Lawrence County there was a snow storm during the phenomenon, in which the falling stars appeared like lightning. . . . That in Germantown, Pa., they seemed like showers of great hail.'

"The Lancaster (Pa.) Examiner says: 'The air was filled with innumerable meteors or stars; . . . hundreds of thousands of brilliant bodies might be seen falling at every moment, . . . sloping their descent toward the earth, at an angle of about forty-five degrees, resembling flashes of fire.'"

This is important testimony as to the vast extent of the falling stars, and also from their emanating from a single point in the heavens. It was the greatest display of celestial fire-works recorded on the pages of history. It was no atmospheric or terrestrial phenomenon, common to the upper regions of the earth; but a display of the divine power, baffling the science of man.

After our Lord names these three signs; first, the sun darkened; second, the moon not giving her light; and third, the stars falling from heaven, Matt. 24: 29-31, he gives the parable of the fig-tree.

"Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it [He, margin,] is near, even at the doors." Matt. 24: 32, 33.

The parable of the fig-tree is probably the most forcible that could be used by our Lord to inspire in the hearts of his people faith in his speedy coming. When the trees of the field begin to put forth their leaves, and the tender grass springs up, and the ground is being covered with its green, velvet carpet, we know that summer is nigh. If one should doubt, and talk of the season's changing back to winter, he would be thought insane. It is a certainty with us that summer is coming when we see these signs in nature. We know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, or with the same certainty, know that Christ's coming is at the doors when the signs in the sun, moon and stars are fulfilled.

Here, dear reader, our Lord has stated the object of these signs, which is, that we may know when his coming is at the doors. But we are told that the church is not to know anything of the period of Christ's second advent. Then, we inquire, why did our Lord give signs of the event? Are they given to deceive us? to lead the honest Christian to look for Christ's coming when, in fact, nothing is to be known of the time of the event? Certainly not. The fact that Christ foretells signs of his coming, and then states the object of those signs, that the church may know when the event is near, even at the doors, is sufficient proof that it is the design of Heaven that the church should understand the period of the second advent.

Correct Ideas of Burden Bearing.

GAL. 6: 2: "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ."

Verse 5: "For every man shall bear his own burden."

The apostle Paul was decidedly a reasoner. A mind as logical as his would not find it difficult to preserve consistency either of statement or conclusion. Certainly he would not contradict himself in writing two sentences so nearly connected as are the above quoted from his letter to the Galatians. And yet were all the "burdens" of life alike in their nature, and to be borne under like circumstances, we could see no consistency in the two verses.

In looking around we shall find three kinds of burdens to be borne; viz., those which we can and ought to bear with or for one another; those which we cannot bear for one another; and those which we ought not to bear for one another.

The first, referred to in verse 2, are burdens which are laid upon us as servants of God; those which fall upon us because we are the followers of Christ. These are all the scoffs, scorns, insults, hatreds, persecutions, losses, and injuries, we receive or suffer as Christians. Such we should bear for each other's sake, not only as a duty, but as a joyful privilege.

As a duty, because it is enjoined by our Saviour; it is to follow him in his labor of love, who suffered not for himself, but for others. It is the manifestation of the spirit of the gospel; the spirit of disinterested kindness—the opposite of all selfishness.

As a privilege, because it is suffering for Christ's sake; rather, it is suffering with him. His servants are his representatives, and what we do to or for them, we do to or for him. Matt. 25: 40. Paul rejoiced in his sufferings for his brethren, because he thereby filled up that which was behind of the afflictions of Christ, in his flesh, for his (Christ's) body's sake, which is the church. Col. 1: 24. No doubt all the disciples regretted through all their lives that they "forsook him and fled" in the hour of his betrayal. It was a sore trial to the flesh then, but what a record would it have been for one of them to stand boldly by his side, and brave the anger of the Jews and the power of the Roman soldiers for the sake of their Master—the holy Son of God! What a privilege it is to suffer with Jesus!

And there are some burdens which we must bear alone; no human aid can reach us in the struggle. These are the burdens of personal duty; of self-denial; of cross-bearing; of overcoming our besetments and passions. These, perhaps, the apostle referred to in verse 5. Divine grace can assist us in the work, but grace will not do our work for us. Overcoming is a heart work, a life struggle. God will do great things for us—more than we can conceive; but he will not do for us what he has commanded us to do. Grace will enable us to obey; but it will not remove the obligation or necessity therefor.

And again there are other burdens which we ought to bear alone; these are the burdens of our own wrongs. If we suffer as evil-doers, we have no right to throw the burden on our brethren, on the church, or on the Close of the Volume.

THIS week adds another to the thirty-four completed volumes of the REVIEW, now standing upon our library shelves. A period of twenty years is covered by this array of volumes. In them is the record of a movement which has been life and salvation to many, a movement which as many more probably have rejected, but of which more still are yet ignorant. The record of the rise and progress of the last message of mercy to the present time, stands upon their pages. We cannot, for a moment, entertain the thought that time enough remains to complete as many more volumes of this paper. And how much is yet to be done! How replete then must be the few volumes yet to be published, with accounts of the rapid progress of the cause, and the wonderful work of the Lord for his truth and people. This we confidently expect to see; for God never fails to carry out his plans and accomplish his purposes.

How many experiences are recorded in these numerous volumes! How much labor do they represent! How many have toiled with brain and pen to fill their pages! What changes have been recorded! What fulfillments of prophecy have been chronicled! What truth has been brought out! But one after another, the volumes have closed. Thirty-five now stand completed. All is finished in regard to them except the good influence which they are destined still to exert.

So all things are closing. How many lives are daily closing! How soon this world's history itself will end, and the great voice from the throne of the temple of God in Heaven be heard, saying, It is done! What a close this will be! To the wicked, the close of all their hopes, the close of their dreams of happiness, the close of their schemes of pleasure. To the righteous, the close of all their sorrows, the close of their trials and afflictions, the close of their warfare and weary pilgrimage. It remains for us yet to determine whether the final consummation shall be to us a day of inexpressible joy, or of unutterable woe. Let us live in reference to the coming issue. "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

Signs of the Times—No. 5.

NATURE gives indication of the coming doom. As when Eve put forth her hand and took of the forbidden fruit,

"Earth felt the wound; and Nature from her seat
Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe
That all was lost."

so now, Nature gives premonitory symptoms of the great change that is approaching. Strange sights, unusual occurrences, startling phenomena, crowd thick upon us as advance heralds of the coming crisis.

We scarcely need refer the reader to the predictions which set forth this class of signs. The sun was to be darkened, the moon was to withhold her light, the stars were to fall from heaven, there were to be wonders in heaven above and in the earth beneath, earthquakes, famines, pestilences, floods, and storms; and following these, more or less immediately, was to appear the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven. Matt. 24: 29-35, and parallel passages in the other evangelists; Acts 2: 19, 20; Rev. 6: 12, &c.

Almost as unnecessary is it to refer the reader to those events which have furnished a fulfillment of these predictions. The dark day of May 19, 1780, the dark night following, the falling of the stars in November, 1833, stand as unquestionable fulfillments of the predicted signs in the sun, moon, and stars. But it may be said by those who labor hard to disbelieve, that there have been many dark days and nights, and frequent occurrences of falling stars, so that the occasions we have referred to, cannot be taken as signs of the end. It has already been noticed that events which are of frequent occurrence cannot be taken as signs unless they are of a very marked or unnatural character; but if an event occurs containing these marked, unusual features, then it matters not how many events of a like nature have occurred in the past; for this one so far stands pre-eminent and alone. Now granting that there were dark days previous to 1780, and some, it is true, are mentioned, it still remains a fact that nothing of the kind ever occurred which would bear any comparison with the dark day of 1780, either in the wide extent, or the intensity, of the darkness. In both these respects it was almost as marked as though nothing of the kind had ever transpired. So that when we look for a darkening of the sun as the fulfillment of the prediction, the only natural and consistent course is to fix upon this one as the event in question.

But the prophecy has made the matter even more definite than this; for it has located the time when that darkness should occur which was to constitute a sign of the coming end. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days," says Matthew. The days referred to are the days of papal tribulation upon the church mentioned before. This is a definite period of 1260 years, as is shown by the prophecies of Daniel and of John. The tribulation that was to be inflicted upon the church by the papal power, was not to continue, and owing to the Reformation did not continue, through the whole period. The predicted darkening of the sun was to occur shortly after the tribulation of those days was made to cease; and it was yet to be before the prophetic period terminated; for Mark definitely says, "In those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened," &c. The days ended in 1798, and eighteen years before that time, the sun, according to the prediction, was darkened. The event thus occurred at the precise time between the restraining of the tribulation, and the ending of the days. In view of this fact, it matters not, not only how many darkenings of the sun there may have been in centuries past, but it matters not even if some of them were as remarkable events as the one under notice; for the prophecy, looking down to a definite period in the future, said that there the sun should be darkened as a sign of the end; and when we find the sun darkened at that time, that darkening, say what we will of other like events, is the predicted sign of the end.

One objection is thus disposed of; another is sometimes urged. It is claimed by some that the prophecy is not to be taken in a literal, but a figurative, sense. Very well, let us look at it in this light. If it is to be taken in a figurative sense, what does it mean? What is denoted by the sun, moon, and stars? The answer is, Men in high and exalted positions, kings and potentates. And their being darkened and falling from heaven, denotes that they would be brought down from their lofty stations. In other words, the prediction, taken figuratively, denotes war, revolution and trouble among the great men of the earth. Turning to the parallel record in Luke, this objection is entirely removed by the happy antithesis which the writer there introduces. He says, 21: 25, "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars, and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity. Here the celestial, and terrestrial phenomena are set forth in the plainest contrast: the signs in the sun, moon, and stars, are one thing; and the signs upon the earth are another thing. And this predicted distress and perplexity upon the earth must embrace all the revolutions among men which is contemplated in the prophecy; and it must be taken in its literal sense; hence the declarations respecting the sun, moon, and stars, are equally literal, and refer to signs to be manifested in those heavenly bodies. Would the sacred writer express, in figurative language, distress, revolution, and perplexity among the great men of the earth, and connect therewith by the word, and, as though he was about to speak of something else, a declaration of the same thing in literal language? This would make nonsense of the sacred record.

It is not our object to repeat the testimony which has been given concerning those striking events. Eyewitnesses have left on record their descriptions of the startling scenes, and the impressions produced upon all who beheld them. It is enough. Science cannot explain them. Even conjecture flags and falters in its attempt to account for them. There is but one solution of the mystery. God veiled the great luminaries of the day and night, and shook out fiery meteors in the aerial heavens, in fulfillment of his word. The prediction was literal, the time was specified, the fulfillment was exact. The sun has been darkened, the moon has refused to give her light, and the stars have fallen from heaven. What shall we do with these things? Those who view them aright will acknowledge them to be the finger of God tracing out before all the inhabitants of the land the great fact that the Divine Agency is still at work in the fulfillment of his word, and that the end of all things, of which these are the heralds and precursors, is about to come.

We might speak of other phenomena, strange sights above, strange events below; the Aurora Borealis, known only about two hundred years; terrific storms, the alarming frequency and intensity of earthquakes, great tidal waves, the sea and the waves roaring, and men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming upon the earth.

On the single item of earthquakes, look at the following figures, taken from Robert Mallet, by M. Ponton, Fellow of the Royal Society at Edinburgh. We find the table in "The Coming Earthquake" by D. T. Taylor. Earthquakes recorded before the Christian Era, for a period of 1700 years, 58; thence to end of 9th century, 900 years, 197; thence to end of 15th century, 600 years, 532; thence to end of 18th century, 300 years, 2804; thence to 1850, only 50 years, 3240; and finally, a writer in Harper's Magazine states that he has prepared "from very imperfect materials, a list of upwards of TWO HUNDRED EARTHQUAKES, reported to have occurred in the fourteen months between October 1867 and January, 1869—a number many times in excess of that of any preceding year." For a full examination of this branch of the subject, with a full account of tidal waves, tempests, hurricanes, and floods, the reader is referred to the work above mentioned.

But we have good times still, urge the dreamers of peace and safety. There have been bright days and lovely nights since the darkening of the sun and moon in 1780. The starry heavens have shone as brightly and serenely since the wonderful meteoric display of 1833, as ever before. We have had summer and winter, sunshine and rain, soft breezes and gentle showers, favorable seasons and fruitful years. To which it may be replied, Very true; and all this you will still have; "for while the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease." A sufficient number of things will continue as they were, to cause the wilful skeptic to exclaim, All things continue as they were from the beginning; and where is the promise of his coming? And at the same time there will be deviations from nature, signs and phenomena, enough to show all those whose eyes are open to discern the tokens of the coming end, that the great day is even at the door. And honest faith answers, Enough there have already been.

Writing for the Press.

We have reached a season of the year when the energies of almost all classes of our subscribers are called out in other directions than writing for our paper. Consequently, our correspondence at this season is apt to lag, and a dearth of original matter prevail at the Office. We therefore take this occasion to send out, as a gentle reminder of what we want and how we want it, the following article from the Morning Star, which we clip from an exchange. If all are not moved by it to immediately seize the pen, and fortified with such an amount of the excellent graces of patience and forbearance as to be able to stand half a dozen rejections with perfect equanimity, they are less easily moved than we anticipate. But to the article:

"Ministers and laymen ought to write more for the papers. It would do them good to write, and do the public good to read what they write. But if they at-

THE NEW YEAR.

Why hail we thus each new-born year,
With voice of joy and scenes of mirth?
What room for gay and festive cheer,
While woe and darkness span the earth?
While sin and suffering, pain and death, still throw
Their baleful shadow over all below?

Earth trembles at the cannon's roar,
War's murderous visage scours the plain,
Its fairest spots are drenched with gore,
Its fruitful fields are piled with slain.
And what are all these slow revolving years,
But funeral pageants of distress and tears?

Contagions spread their wings of pall,
Fierce tempests rage with blasting breath,
And earthquake throes, engulfing all,
Make short and sure the way to death.
No peace, no safety, no enduring cheer,
To him who builds his hopes and treasures here.

Yet glad we hail each New Year's morn;
For from the great high throne of Heaven
A royal fiat forth has gone,
A glorious word to earth is given:
Behold, says He who looks creation through,
Where sin has marred my works, I make anew.

New earth to smile before his face,
New heavens in crystal beauty dressed,
New years to run a guiltless race,
New joys for each immortal breast,
New flowers upspringing from the sinless sod,
New waters sparkling from the throne of God.

New bodies for these feeble forms,
New life from o'en the mouldering tomb,
New skies unrent by raging storms,
New beauty, new unfading bloom,
New scenes the eternal era to begin,
Of peace for war, of righteousness for sin.

Speed then away, O tardy years!
Fly quickly hours that intervene!
Groaning we wait the time when tears
Shall be but things that once have been.
Dawn, thou blest morn, so long in promise given,
The glorious glad New Year of God and Heaven.

OUR FAITH AND HOPE;

Or, Reasons Why We Believe as We Do.

NUMBER THREE.—SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

BY ELDER JAMES WHITE.

"What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?"—DISCIPLES.

"When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors."—JESUS. Matt. 24:3, 33.

WHEN SHALL THESE THINGS BE?

VERSES 15-20: "When ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place (whoso readeth, let him understand); then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains; let him which is on the housetop not come down to take anything out of his house; neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. And woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day."

The "abomination of desolation" is called "armies" in Luke 21:20, and refers to the Roman army. "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh." This desolating power is spoken of by Daniel as follows: "And the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. . . . And for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate." Margin, "desolator." Dan. 9:26, 27. Here is a clear prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman armies. Our Lord referred to the book of Daniel, and taught his disciples to read and understand it; and when they should see what was there predicted take place, they must make their escape.

The flight of the Christians of Judea to the mountains would be attended with difficulties. And their subsequent condition would be that of hardships and sufferings. The Lord knew this, and gave them the instructions and warnings necessary. The statement of verse 19 was given to save them from the sorrows of unnecessary woe. That was a time of trouble. But one, "such as never was," is before the people of God.

Jesus recognizes the existence of the Sabbath in verse 20, as late as the destruction of Jerusalem, as verily as he does the seasons of the year. The Sabbath is the uniform term of both Testaments to designate the very day on which Jehovah rested after the creation, the day upon which he put his blessing, and which he set apart for man.

Jesus does not speak of the Sabbath as being only a seventh part of time, or one day in seven, and no day in particular. "The Sabbath" are the plain words of our Lord, referring to the last day of the first week of time, and, also, to the last day of each subsequent week. But if the term, the Sabbath, means only a seventh part of time, or one day in seven, and no day in particular, then we may read this definition into the text as follows: But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on a seventh part of time! or on one day in seven. If such a prayer could be answered, pray tell us when the disciples could take their flight.

VERSE 21: "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." The "great tribulation" here mentioned is that of the church of Jesus Christ, and not the tribulation of the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem. We offer the following reasons:—

1. It is a fact that the tribulation of the Christian church, especially under the reign of the papacy, was greater than God's people had suffered before "since the beginning of the world." But it is not true that the tribulation of the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem was the greatest tribulation the world ever witnessed. The tribulation of the inhabitants of the cities of the plain when God rained on them fire and brimstone, or, the tribulation when God destroyed all men from the face of the earth, save eight souls, by the flood, was certainly greater than that at the destruction of Jerusalem.

2. The tribulation of the Christian church has been greater than it will ever be again. True, a time of trouble, "such as never was," spoken of in Dan. 12:1, is coming upon the world; but we find in the same verse this blessed promise, "And at that time thy people shall be delivered." The tribulation of the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem was not greater than the world will ever witness. The vials of Jehovah's unmingled wrath are yet to be poured out, not upon the people of one nation only, but upon the guilty millions of all nations. "The slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth; they shall not be lamented, neither gathered, nor buried." Jer. 25:33.

3. If this tribulation be applied to the Jews, or any other class of unbelieving men, it cannot be harmonized with Dan. 12:1, which speaks of the time of trouble such as never was, when Michael shall stand up. Certainly there cannot be two times of trouble, at different periods, greater than ever was, or ever would be. Therefore, we apply the "tribulation" spoken of in Matt. 24:21, 29, to the church of Christ, extending down through the 1260 years of papal persecution; and the "trouble" mentioned in Dan. 12:1, to the unbelieving world, to be experienced by them in the future.

4. The period of tribulation was shortened for the elect's sake. Who are the elect here mentioned? The Jews? No; their house had been pronounced desolate. They were left of God in their hardness of heart and blindness of mind. Says Paul, "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles." The elect were the followers of our Lord Jesus Christ. And where were they when tribulation was upon the Jews? They had fled to the mountains. How absurd, then, to say that the days of the tribulation of the Jews, in the city of Jerusalem, were shortened for the sake of the elect, who had fled from the place of tribulation.

5. The connection between verses 20 and 21, shows that the tribulation was to commence with those Christians who were to flee out of the city. "But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day; for then shall be great tribulation." Our Lord here speaks of the tribulation which his people would suffer from the time of their flight onward. We follow them in their flight to the mountains, and then pass along down through the noted persecutions of the church of God under pagan Rome, and we see, indeed, tribulation. And when we come to the period of papal persecution, we see them suffering the most cruel tortures, and dying the most dreadful deaths, that wicked men and demons could inflict. This last period is especially noted in prophecy.

The prophet Daniel saw the papacy, its blasphemy, its arrogance, its work of death on the saints, and its duration as a persecuting power, under the symbol of the little horn. "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time." Chap. 7:25.

It is generally admitted that "a time and times and the dividing of time" is 1260 years. We shall not here offer proof on the point. Commencing the 1260 years A. D. 538, they reach to A. D. 1798, when Berthier, a French general, entered Rome, and took it. The pope was taken prisoner and shut up in the Vatican. The papacy was stripped of its civil power. Here ended the period of tribulation spoken of by our Lord, which was

SHORTENED FOR THE ELECT'S SAKE.

VERSE 22: "And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." The papacy was clothed with civil power to punish heretics for 1260 years; and had not the period of tribulation of the elect in the providence of God been shortened, the martyrdom of the church would have continued to 1798, in which event, in all human probability, no flesh of the elect would have been saved. But the reformation under Martin Luther, and those associated with this great reformer, modified this tribulation, and continued to restrain the rage and consume the power of the papacy until 1700, since which time, according to all church history, there has been no general persecution against the church. We are brought in this prophetic discourse of our Lord, down into the eighteenth century, very near the present time. We should naturally expect, then, that the instructions and warnings of the next verse would be applicable to this generation.

VERSES 23, 24: "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there, believe it not. For there shall arise false christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; inasmuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." Here is a description of the spiritual deception of the present age. False christs arose soon after the first advent of Christ, to deceive the Jews in regard to that event (see verse 5); likewise false christs and false prophets have arisen at this day to deceive the people on the subject of the second advent. The Shakers say, "Lo, here is Christ. His second coming is in the person of Ann Lee." "Lo, he is there," cry many of the popular ministers of these times. "His second coming is at the conversion of sinners, or at the death of saints." So they have as many second comings of Christ as there are sinners converted, and saints die. Senseless theology this! "Lo, here," exclaim a host of Spiritualists, and they "show great signs and wonders." If possible they would deceive the very elect. And we regard it as a safe conclusion, that they will yet deceive all others but the elect.

VERSES 27, 28: "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." We are very happy that our Lord has not only pointed out false christs and false prophets, and has warned us against their mystical teachings, but he has in contrast set before us the manner of his second coming in the plainest terms. The vivid lightning flashing out of the distant east, and shining even to the west, lights up the whole heavens. What, then, when the Lord comes in flaming glory, and all the holy angels with him? The presence of only one holy angel at the new sepulcher where Christ lay in death, caused the Roman guard to shake and become as dead men. The light and glory of one angel completely overpowered those strong sentinels. The Son of Man is coming in his own kingly glory, and in the glory of his Father, attended by all the holy angels. Then the whole heavens will blaze with glory, and the whole earth will tremble before him.

VERSES 29-31: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet; and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."

We have before seen that our Lord speaks in this chapter of the long period of tribulation upon his followers, and we have also seen how those days of tribulation were shortened for the elect's sake. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," &c. We refer the reader to the noted dark day of May 19, 1780, as the fulfillment of this declaration. Mark this. It does not read, after those days, but "after the tribulation of those days." The days (1260 years, Dan. 7:25) reached to 1798, eighteen years this side of the dark day in 1780. Mark 13:24, makes this point still plainer. "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened." That is, before the 1260 years closed, but after the tribulation or martyrdom of the saints ceased, the sun was darkened. Those who would point to the future, or to the past, prior to the eighteenth century, for the darkening of the sun here mentioned, will do well to read again Mark 13:24: "But in those days, after that tribulation,

THE SUN SHALL BE DARKENED."

"A something strikingly awful shall forewarn that the world will come to an end, and that the last day is even at the door."—Martin Luther.

In May 19, 1780, there was a remarkable fulfillment of the predicted darkening of the sun; and in reference to the facts and date, there can be no doubt; for, besides the historical accounts, which all agree, there were many aged men, with whom men of the present generation have mingled and conversed, who witnessed it, and have testified to it.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived; 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the Judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man; for his lamp was trimmed, and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society—Life of Edward Lee.

"The 19th day of May, 1780, was a remarkably dark day. Candles were lighted in many houses. The birds were silent and disappeared. The fowls retired to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of Judgment was at hand. The legislature of Connecticut was in session, at Hartford, but being unable to transact business, adjourned."—President Dwight, in (Ct.) Historical Collections.

"ANNIVERSARY OF THE DARK DAY.—The dark day, May 19, 1780, is thus described by Mr. Stone, in his history of Beverly: 'The sun rose clear, but soon assumed a brassy hue. About 10 o'clock, A. M., it became unusually dark. The darkness continued to increase till about one o'clock, when it began to decrease. During this time, candles became necessary. The birds disappeared and were silent, the fowls went to their roosts, the cocks crew as at daybreak, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. The alarm produced by this unusual aspect of the heavens was great.'"—Portsmouth Journal, May 20, 1843.

The supernatural darkening of the sun, May 19, 1780, has been so universally understood that Noah Webster's dictionary, in the edition for 1869, under the head of Explanatory and Pronouncing Vocabulary of Noted Names, says,

"The dark day, May 19, 1780;—so called on account of a remarkable darkness on that day, extending over all New England. In some places, persons could not see to read common print in the open air for several hours together. Birds sang their evening songs, disappeared, and became silent; fowls went to roost; cattle sought the barn-yard; and candles were lighted in the houses. The obscuration began about ten o'clock in the morning, and continued till the middle of the next night, but with differences of degree and duration in different places. For several days previous, the wind had been variable, but chiefly from the south-west and the north-east. The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known."

"From Robert Sears' Guide to Knowledge, published in New York, 1844, we extract the following: 'On the 19th of May, 1780, an uncommon darkness took place all over New England, and extended to Canada. It continued about fourteen hours, or from ten o'clock in the morning till midnight. The darkness was so great that people were unable to read common print, or tell the time of the day by their watches, or to dine, or transact their ordinary business, without the light of candles. They became dull and gloomy, and some were excessively frightened. The fowls went to roost. Objects could not be distinguished but at a very little distance, and everything bore the appearance of gloom and night. Similar days have occasionally been known, though inferior in the degree or extent of their darkness. The causes of these phenomena are unknown. They certainly were not the result of eclipses.'"

"THE MOON SHALL NOT GIVE HER LIGHT."

"The moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun from whom she borrows her light is turned into darkness, she must fail, of course, and become bankrupt."—Matthew Henry.

"The night succeeding that day (May 19, 1780,) was of such pitchy darkness, that in some instances, horses could not be compelled to leave the stable when wanted for service. About midnight, the clouds were dispersed, and the moon and stars appeared with unimpaired brilliancy."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20, 1843.—Extract from Stone's History of Beverly.

Mr. Tenny, of Exeter, N. H., quoted by Mr. Gage, to the Historical Society, speaking of the dark day and dark night of May 19, 1780, says:

"The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes was equally invisible with the blackest velvet.

Dr. Adams, speaking of the dark night, says:

"At nine, it was a darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost every one who happened to be out in the evening, got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night as it was in the day, as the moon had full the day before."

THE STARS SHALL FALL FROM HEAVEN.

We here give an extract from an article written by Henry Dana Ward, in regard to the falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833, published in the Journal of Commerce, Nov. 15, 1833:

"At the cry, 'look out of the window,' I sprang from a deep sleep, and with wonder saw the east lighted up with the dawn and meteors. The zenith, the north, and the west also, showed the falling stars, in the very image of one thing, and only one, I ever heard of. I called to my wife to behold; and while robing, she exclaimed, 'See how the stars fall!' I replied, 'That is the wonder!' and we felt in our hearts that it was a sign of the last days. For, truly, 'the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. 6:13. This language of the prophet has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday, it was literally fulfilled. The ancients understood by aster, in Greek, and stella, in Latin, the smaller lights of heaven. The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore, the idea of the prophet, as it is expressed in the original Greek, was literally fulfilled in the phenomenon of yesterday.

"And how did they fall? Neither myself, nor one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy before quoted."

"The stars fell 'even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet. The falling stars did not come as if from several trees shaken, but from one: those which appeared in the east, fell toward the east; those which appeared in the north, fell toward the north; those which appeared in the west, fell toward the west; and those which appeared in the south (for I went out of my residence into the park), fell toward the south. And they fell not as the ripe fruit falls. Far from it; but they flew, they were cast, like the unripe fruit, which at first refuses to leave the branch; and when, under a violent pressure, it does break its hold, it flies swiftly, straight off, descending; and in the multitude falling, some cross the track of others, as they are thrown with more or less force; but each one falls on its own side of the tree. Such was the appearance of the above phenomenon to the inmates of my house."

Prof. Olmstead, of Yale College, says:—

"The extent of the shower of 1833 was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the east, to the Pacific on the west; and from the northern coast of South America, to undefined regions among the British possessions on the north, the exhibition was visible, and everywhere presented nearly the same appearance.

"The meteors did not fly at random over all parts of the sky, but appeared to emanate from a point in the constellation Leo, near a star called Gamma Leonis, in the bend of the sickle.

"This is no longer to be regarded as a terrestrial, but as a celestial, phenomenon; and shooting stars are now to be no more viewed as casual productions of the upper regions of the atmosphere, but as visitants from other worlds, or from the planetary voids."

The People's Magazine, Boston, January, 1834, on the falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833, says:—

"The Rockingham (Va.) Register calls it 'A rain of fire,'—thousands of stars being seen at once; some said it began with considerable noise.

"The Journal of Commerce informs us that 'three hundred miles this side of Liverpool the phenomenon was as splendid there as here; and that in St. Lawrence County there was a snow-storm during the phenomenon, in which the falling stars appeared like lightning; . . . that in Germantown, Pa., they seemed like showers of great hail.'

"The Lancaster (Pa.) Examiner says: 'The air was filled with innumerable meteors or stars; . . . hundreds of thousands of brilliant bodies might be seen falling at every moment, . . . sloping their descent toward the earth, at an angle of about forty-five degrees, resembling flashes of fire.'"

This is important testimony as to the vast extent of the falling stars, and also as to their emanating from a single point in the heavens. It was the greatest display of celestial fire-works recorded on the pages of history. It was no atmospheric or terrestrial phenomenon, common to the upper regions of the earth; but a display of the divine power, baffling the science of man.

The Pope as a Subject.

For several weeks, the city of Rome and the remainder of the papal territory have been a part of the kingdom of Italy; and the pope, for more than a thousand years one of the sovereigns of Europe, has become the subject of a secular prince. One must have read the history of the proud and overbearing pontiffs of the middle ages, who not only claimed to be vicars of Christ upon earth, but to have full power over all emperors and kings of the world, in order to fully perceive the immense difference between the position which Gregory VII. and Innocent III. occupied, and the one in which Pius IX. finds himself.

Nothing connected with the end of the temporal powers impresses the attentive observer so much as the apparently-total absence of a papal party in the annexed States. Poland has been subjected to Russia for about one hundred years; and even to this day, the Poles, almost to a man, demand their sovereignty, and are only waiting for a favorable opportunity to rise again for their independence. Northern Schleswig persists in sending Danish representatives to the German Parliament, and their ballots defy the power the bullets of which have just proved so formidable to one of the greatest nations of Europe. Don Carlos and Isabella of Spain, and even the ex-King of Naples, have their parties, which are willing to remain loyal to them, and risk, for their cause, property, and even life. But where is now the pope's party in the late papal States? When the Italian army marched upon Rome, the entire population of the invaded territory remained passive and indifferent spectators; and when, after the occupation, an opportunity was offered to the annexed people, for the first time, to express their own wishes, they cast an almost unanimous vote for the ratification of their union with Italy.

Even the pope's adherents cannot deny that there is a total absence of all signs from which the existence of a strong party still devoted to the interests of the pope could be inferred. This remarkable fact admits of only a twofold explanation—either the immense majority of the people were, as it appears, really opposed to the pope's temporal rule, and hailed the annexation to Italy as a deliverance from a hated yoke, or they were totally indifferent, and did not deem the pope's cause worth making the least sacrifice for. In either case, the pope's hold on his former subjects will be noted in history for its unparalleled weakness.

In view of this readiness of the Romans to abandon the cause of their former ruler, it may appear strange that the Italian government appears as anxious to reconcile the pope to his fate, and that it is so far ahead of the majority of the Italian Parliament, and, as it seems, of the Italian people, in its readiness to make far-reaching concessions. All the official declarations of the Italian government since the annexation, breathe this spirit; and the recent speech from the throne speaks out this sentiment, even more strongly than any other public document. A semi-sovereignty is to be found for the pope, which will secure to him an entire independence as head of the Roman Catholic Church, and make him and the world, if possible, forget that he has become a citizen of Italy.

This strange conduct is very commonly ascribed to the personal feelings of the present king, who is believed, if not in his morality, at least in his fears of future punishment, to be a professor of the doctrines of his church, and therefore to be anxious to get rid of the ex-communication which he has incurred by dispossessing the pope of the patrimony of St. Peter. The supposition is by no means improbable, though we think there are other reasons determining the conduct of both the king and the Italian statesmen in this cause. One of these reasons we believe to be the doubt of the Italian statesmen as to the present strength of the Catholic religion in the hearts of the Italian people. The temporal rule of the pope and the priests is hated, and one might suppose that, as even the Ecumenical Councils declare that no good Catholic dare, in any way, aid in the overthrow of the temporal power, the Catholic church would be now as weak in Rome as the cause of the pope. Such, however, is not the case. Inconsistent as it may be, there are millions of Catholics who form an entirely different conception of their church from that of the popes and the Council, and who are willing to honor, as the head of the church, him whom they are glad to see dethroned as a secular prince. This feeling prevails to a large extent throughout the Catholic countries, and it is not the statesmen of Italy alone who regard it as necessary to make concessions to it.

Another reason for the conduct of the Italian Government may be found in the natural demand of all governments of large countries which have a Catholic population, for guarantees that the head of a church to which millions of their subjects belong, be not influenced in his decisions by the Italian Government. Then this demand might lead to serious complications, which the Italian Government, especially for the present, wishes to avoid.

For a considerable portion of the Italian people, the conciliatory spirit of the Italian Government will do much to accustom them to the new state of things. When the new relation of the papacy to the modern state shall once have become a fixed and unalterable principle of society, its full significance must become apparent, even to the duller eye; for however smooth the transition may be made, the condition of the pope as a subject is in itself the radical reverse of the form of society which in the middle ages was declared by all the popes to be the true one, and according to which all powers of the earth, civil no less than ecclesiastical, were to be subjects of the pope.—Methodist.

THIS truly has been an eventful year. In it some of our ablest statesmen, ministers of the gospel, educators, scientific men, and those renowned in the literary world, have died. In it the great Council at Rome declared an old man in his dotage the vicegerent of Jesus Christ on earth, and in a few days the pope saw the ambition of his life crumble to ashes, an army enter Rome, and the Vatican endangered; in it one of the most powerful monarchs of the world has been deposed and carried away into exile; in it some of the most wonderful displays in the sidereal heavens above and in the earth beneath us have taken place; meteors of great brilliancy and remarkable beauty have been witnessed. The display of "Northern Lights" this season, has been unusual in magnitude and grandeur, while shooting stars have been frequent. We have had a number of earthquakes, spreading terror in their pathway. The circles around the moon have been tinted with the colors of the rainbow, and the moon itself appeared like a bright globe of fire surrounded by rings of various hues.

In addition to these displays of nature, the human family has been visited with fire and sword. Deadly diseases have traversed sections of country, and swept away their victims by thousands. Famine and pestilence have done their work of destruction. Treachery and wickedness of men have filled the cup of human woe, and vice and intemperance have taken thousands of the fairest and most promising in our midst. But above all these woes of afflicted humanity, it has been a remarkable year for bloodshed. To say nothing of the lesser wars in other parts of the world, we call attention to the fearful struggle which has been raging in Alsace, and Lorraine, and around Paris. Within the last four months more blood has been shed than in any other equal period in modern times, even in the "most destructive campaigns of Napoleon, in the invasion of Russia, followed by the retreat from Moscow. Battles have been fought more bloody than Borodino; on a single day the carnage equalled that of Leipsic and Waterloo rolled into one. After the battle of Gravelotte, a writer followed the line of the dead for seven miles. Heaps of corpses lay on every hand a ghastly spectacle; men and horses, friend and foe,

'In one red burial blent.'

The battle plain is now covered with graves, while far away in every city of Germany, as well as of France, the hospitals are filled with mangled remains of that terrible day. In addition to the carnage of the field, we read of the desolations of provinces, of villages burned, of peasants flying in dismay from their late happy homes, and seeking refuge with the beasts of the forest. Such is the tale of horror which makes the world turn pale, and which can only be described in language like that of the book of Revelation, when a seal is opened, or a vial full of plagues is poured out into the air."

In view of this page of dark and terrible history, the sober-minded may well pause, as the old year is about expiring, and ask, What does it all mean? Is there no hand of Providence in all this? Yes, verily, there is; and oh! would that we could read in the glow of the heated furnace, God's displeasure at the monstrous sins on account of which he suffers these afflictions to come upon us. We ask, with breathless anxiety, "Shall the next year be as this?" Oh! that the red war-cloud, and the dire famine, and the destroying malarial, and the earthquake shock, may not visit us. But God is just, and as long as man revels in his sin, so long shall we be unable to read the mysterious sentence written on the wall, "MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN."—Golden Censer.

MORALITY without religion is only a kind of dead reckoning—an endeavor to find our place on a cloudy sea by measuring the distance we have run, without any observation of the heavenly bodies.

BEHOLD, HE COMETH.

Not in poverty and shame,
As when first to earth He came,
When by human power and pride
Scorned, insulted, crucified;
Not with cymbals, fife, nor drum,
Will the conquering Hero come;
Not with banners floating high,
Rent with shot, of gory dye;
Not with thund'ring cannon peal,
Not by armies clad in steel,

Will His regal feet be set
On the heights of Olivet;
But in clouds will Zion's King
Come, as on the lightning's wing.
Saints redeemed, the quick, the dead,
Shall attend their glorious Head;
Robed in light, the angel choir—
Spirits—ministers of fire—
Fire, hail, and wind, and storm,
Shall surround His dazzling form.

Ev'ry eye that form shall see;
They, who nailed him to the tree;
They, who dared—the self-accursed—
Mock with gall his dying thirst.
Every knee to him shall bow;
Low shall bend each haughty brow,
Ev'ry guilty heart shall quake—
Heav'n, and earth, and seas, shall shake.
Have the hill-tops caught his light?
Watchman! tell us of the night.

NUMBER FOUR.—SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

BY ELDER JAMES WHITE.

"What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?"—DISCIPLES.

"When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors."—JESUS. Matt. 24:3, 33.

POWERS OF THE HEAVENS SHAKEN.

THIS event we must regard as being future. It holds the same place in the events of this chapter, that the departing of the heavens as a scroll does in the events of the sixth seal of Rev. 6. Both follow the falling stars. Please compare Matt. 24:29, 30, with Rev. 6:12, 17. The Scriptures plainly teach that, prior to the resurrection of the just by the voice of the Son of God, the voice of God the Father will shake the heavens and the earth, when will be fulfilled the shaking of the powers of the heavens. This will probably take place at the pouring out of the seventh vial into the air. Rev. 16:17. Then it is said, "And there came a great voice out of the temple of Heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done." This is not the voice of the Son of God as he descends to raise the dead. It comes from the throne of God in the temple of Heaven. "Whose voice then shook the earth; but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven." Heb. 12:26. "The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and the earth shall shake; but the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel." Joel 3:16.

We would not speak too positively of future events; but venture the opinion that the voice of the Father will shake the heavens and the earth before the sign of the Son of Man appears. The people of God will be safe. Islands may disappear, and mountains be thrown down; but the saints will remain unharmed. Earthquakes may break up the earth's surface, so that kings and nobles, rich and poor, bond and free, may hide "themselves in dens and in the rocks of the mountains," still God will be the hope of his people.

SIGN OF THE SON OF MAN.

This is not one of the signs which show that the Son of Man is near; but "the sign of the Son of Man in heaven." It is that which signifies his position. When Christ ascended from the mount of Olivet, "a cloud received him" from the sight of the disciples. They still gazed at the cloud as it rolled upward, bearing the Saviour toward the Father's throne; but they could not see his person. When he comes "in like manner" as he was taken up to Heaven, the cloud will appear small in the distance; but as it draws near, it will apparently increase in size. It will signify to those who are looking for his return, that he is there, soon to burst forth from the cloud in matchless glory. This cloud will be the sign of the Son of Man in heaven.

THE TRIBES OF THE EARTH MOURN.

During the pouring out of the seven last plagues, and at the time of the shaking of the powers of the heavens, a large portion of the wicked will doubtless be destroyed. A portion still remain, to view scenes still more terrific, and to endure anguish more dreadful. The sign is seen in heaven. The once slighted, insulted, and crucified Saviour, now King of kings, and Lord of lords, is coming near the earth! His glory blazes everywhere! The saints hope and rejoice with trembling; but what an hour for the wicked! The tribes of the earth mourn. Amid the ruins of shivered creation they hold one general prayer-meeting. Kings and great men, rich men, chief captains and mighty men, free and bond, all, yes, all unite in the general wail. As the Son of Man in the glory of his Father, attended by all the holy angels, draws still nearer, consternation fills every breast. They hide in dens, and in the rocks of the mountains. Their only hope is to be concealed from the glory of that scene. They know it is too late to pray for mercy; that probation for the human family has ended forever. Here is a copy of that dreadful prayer: "Mountains and rocks, fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" Rev. 6:16, 17.

But rocks cannot shelter them from the burning glory manifested by the King of kings, attended by the whole heavenly host. The presence of but one angel before Joseph's sepulcher, caused the keepers to fall like dead men. Then when "the Son of Man shall come in the glory of the Father," "and all the holy angels with him," no sinner can endure the scene, and live. The exceeding brightness of that vast multitude of angels, brighter than a thousand suns at noonday, will pierce the sinner's lowest hiding-place, and will "make a speedy riddance of all them that dwell in the land." Zeph. 1:18. Or, as Paul says, "Whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness [bright shining, Macknight's translation] of his coming." O Christian brother, we warn you to watch and be ready to receive your Saviour with joy. Backslider, arouse, and return to the Lord while he may be found. And, poor sinner, though you have never tasted of the pardoning love of Christ, you, too, may come and find pardon, and a shelter from approaching wrath.

JESUS NEXT APPEARS.

The Son of Man will be seen "coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." But before his coming, a great work will be done for his people. Should he suddenly burst upon them now, they could not endure "the power and great glory" of the scene. This subject is well illustrated by the following words of the prophet: "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord, his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain; as the latter and former rain unto the earth." Hosea 6:3. The morning is a beautiful figure of the opening glory of the day of God. The day-star first appears, then the dawn of day. And as the light of day increases, our eyes are enabled to endure it, and view the sun shining in his strength. But, should the light of the sun burst upon the world suddenly at midnight, no human eye could endure it.

So will the people of God be prepared to meet their coming King. They must first break away from the love and cares of this world, and consecrate all to the Lord. Then will they, in due time, share the outpouring of the Holy Spirit "as the rain, as the latter and the former rain upon the earth." The day-star will arise in their hearts. 2 Pet. 1:19. Those who have taken heed to the sure word of prophecy through the dark, watching night, will then raise their heads in triumph. They are filled with faith, and with the Holy Spirit. Glory is poured upon them till they can gaze on Christ and angels. The trumpet sounds. The angels are dispatched to the graves' mouths. The voice of the Son of God awakes the sleeping saints of all ages. They come forth in immortal perfection; and as they leave the earth, the living saints are changed. The "elect from one end of heaven to the other," each with an angel bright and strong to lead the way, are all caught up to meet the Lord, who waits in mid-heaven to receive the purchase of his blood. As language would fail to describe what follows, dear reader, we leave you here to contemplate it, praying that we may be prepared to participate in the meeting scene.

PARABLE OF THE FIG-TREE.

Verses 32, 33. "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it [He, margin] is near, even at the doors." The parable of the fig-tree is probably the most forcible figure that could be used by our Lord to illustrate this subject. When the trees of the field begin to put forth their leaves, and the tender grass springs up, and the ground is being covered with its green, velvet carpet, we know that summer is nigh. It is a certainty with us that summer is coming when we see these signs in nature. We know that summer is nigh. "So likewise," or, with the same certainty, we may know that Christ's coming is at the doors when the signs in the sun, moon, and stars, are fulfilled.

Here, dear reader, our Lord has stated the object of these signs, which is, that we may know when his coming is at the doors. But we are told that the church is not to know anything of the period of Christ's second advent. Then, we inquire, why did our Lord give signs of the event? Are they given to deceive us? to lead the honest Christian to look for Christ's coming when, in fact, nothing is to be known of the time of the event? Certainly not. The fact that Christ foretells signs of his coming, and then states the object of those signs, that the church may know when the event is near, even at the doors, is sufficient proof that it is the design of Heaven that the church should understand the period of the second advent.

ALL THESE THINGS.

Our Lord says (Luke 21:28), "And when these things BEGIN to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." The signs began to come to pass with the dark day of 1780. Then it could be said that redemption draweth nigh, and from that time the humble follower of Jesus might look up in expectation of witnessing his glorious appearing. But (verse 31) "when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."

The signs in the sun, moon, and stars, are all that were given to base faith upon. All the other events mentioned in connection with these, have their fulfillment after the faith of God's people is perfected, and the doom of all sinners is fixed; therefore they cannot be embraced in the phrase "all these things." The three signs having come to pass, we may now learn the parable of the fig-tree, and know that Christ's coming is near, even at the doors. The phrase, "all these things," does not embrace the mourning of the tribes of the earth, and the sign of the Son of Man. Neither does it embrace the shaking of the powers of the heavens; for that does not take place until the seventh vial is poured out. But the faith of God's people is perfected, and the doom of all sinners is forever fixed, before the pouring out of the first vial. The parable of the fig-tree was given to inspire faith in the minds of those who hear the reasons of Christ's soon coming. But to suppose that this parable is to be learned after it is said, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still, . . . and he that is holy, let him be holy still," after the thunder, lightning, great earthquake, and great hail, "each stone about the weight of a talent," is most absurd. No! The phrase, "all these things," in verse 33, embraces the three great signs in the sun, moon, and stars, given to strengthen the faith of God's people, while merciful warnings are being given to the world. Here, then, since the falling stars of 1833, the parable of the fig-tree has force, and we may know that Christ's coming is near, even at the doors, with all the certainty that we know that summer is nigh when the trees put forth their tender buds and leaves.

THIS GENERATION SHALL NOT PASS.

Verses 34, 35. "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled." Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Many suppose that our Lord here speaks of the generation then living, who listened to his teachings. That such are in error on this point, the following facts clearly prove:

1. It is certainly true that what is embraced in the phrase, "all these things," was not fulfilled in that generation.

2. It could not be the generation living in the days of his flesh, for he said to them (Luke 11:29), "There shall no sign be given it but the sign of Jonas, the prophet."

It is evident that our Lord refers to the generation who were to see the signs fulfilled, and who were to be instructed by the parable of the fig-tree. In this prophetic discourse, he leads the minds of his disciples down over the events of the Christian age, mentions the signs in the sun, moon, and stars, which were to appear in the last generation, and then declares that this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled.

In like manner, Paul carries his brethren forward to the resurrection, when he says, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." 1 Cor. 15:51, 52. Or, "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." 1 Thess. 4:17. The things here mentioned by the apostle did not take place in his day. They have not yet taken place. Notwithstanding, he speaks of them as though they would take place in his day, and he have a part in them.

Also, in like manner is the mind carried backward in Ps. 95:10. "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation." The generation here spoken of provoked the Lord in the wilderness, long before David lived. He goes back and speaks of it as though it were present. In this manner our Lord goes forward, and speaks of the last generation as though it were then present.

We do not believe that the phrase, "this generation," marks any definite number of years. Some suppose that our Lord designed to teach that some who were witnesses of the dark day in 1780 would live to witness the second coming of the Saviour. But it is our opinion that the Lord designed to teach that the people who should live at the time of the fulfillment of the last sign (the falling stars of 1833), and should hear the proclamation of the coming of Christ, based partly upon the fulfilled signs, should witness the scenes connected with his coming.

The proclamation of the coming and kingdom of Christ is given to the last generation. God did not send Noah to preach to the next to the last generation before the flood, but to the last. The very generation which was destroyed by the waters of the flood saw Noah build the ark, and heard his warning voice. So God has raised up men to give the solemn warning to the world at the right time to give force to the warning. And the very generation of men that live after the three great signs are fulfilled, and who hear and reject the warning message from Heaven, will drink the cup of the unmingled wrath of God. For such, the seven last plagues are reserved. And those of this very generation who receive the message, suffer disappointments, and endure the trials of the waiting position, will witness the coming of Christ, and exclaim, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord, we have waited for him; we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." Isa. 25: 9.

With what emphasis our Lord gave utterance to this sentiment. It is a rebuke upon our unbelief. As we read it, God help us to believe it: "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." "And as though this were not enough to lead us to unwavering faith, he adds these forcible words: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."

S. D. Adventists and Their Critics.

BY ELD. J. H. WAGGONER.

THE World's Crisis is published by the Advent Christian Publishing Association, in Boston, Mass. This Association is composed of one branch of the people called Adventists. Another branch, under the name of American Millennial Association, publishes the Advent Herald, also in Boston. The main differences of these bodies are these: the latter believes the soul is immortal, and that the Sabbath is changed to the first day of the week. The former denies the immortality of the soul, and teaches the abolition of the ten commandments; and, consequently, that there is no Sabbath in this dispensation. These remarks are only true of the bodies, and do not apply to every individual among them; for some articles have appeared in the Herald looking toward the abolition of the commandments, while some have also appeared in the Crisis teaching that the Sabbath is not abolished. But these are inconsiderable exceptions. Another body of Advent believers publishes the ADVENT REVIEW AND HERALD OF THE SABBATH, in Battle Creek, Michigan. This body agrees with the first of the above (the Crisis) in regard to the nature of man, but disagrees with both of them in this: the REVIEW teaches that the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord still, and ever binding on man.

The ADVENT REVIEW has pursued a course tending to preserve friendly relations with the bodies represented by the other papers mentioned; and so far as the Advent Herald is concerned, the effort has been successful. Although the supporters of that paper believe the REVIEW is in error both in regard to the Sabbath, and to the condition of man in death, and destruction of the wicked, nothing has ever passed between the papers, or the ministers of the respective bodies, to my knowledge, inconsistent with the most liberal courtesy, and fraternal feeling. But with the Crisis it is somewhat different. I regret to say that many things have appeared in its columns, at different times, manifesting a very bitter spirit, not at all in harmony with that meekness and kindness toward others which are essential elements of Christian character. These things consist in personalities, insinuations (which are always difficult to meet because they are evasive), and misrepresentations. The latest specimen of vituperation, not by any means the only one, is found in a report of travels and labors of Hiram Munger. With Mr. Munger, personally, we have always been on the most friendly terms. We make no attack on him; but we feel compelled to defend ourselves from a violent and unjust attack made by him, published in the Crisis of Oct. 1870. That you may better understand the nature and spirit of the attack to which I refer, I copy as follows:—

"Richmond. This is an old Advent church, which has been visited with two or three whirlwinds within a few years, which only confused and broke a few of the branches, while the trunk of the tree and the roots are in good soil. The second attack of the seventh-day people, or Ellen G. White's messengers, have just closed a five weeks' bombardment, stumping and bragging of their argument, Goliath-like. I understand a young David, after being threatened and stumped to fight, silenced their battery in a short time, and turned the mesmeric current. If ever there was a time to take off this hypocritical wart or fungus flesh from the Advent body, it is now. I know God does not bless it. It proves a corroding curse wherever it goes.

"The doctrine is pushed into communities Mahomet-like, and calmed down by a mesmeric anodyne, until the subjects are dead or dozy enough to submit to the rigid law of taxing, which, by the way, has awakened some from their stupor, and their eyes are fully open to the imposition and curse on a religious and Christian community. I am aware that in saying this I call down the bulls of this pretended church upon me; but let them come. If these were my last words, I would warn my brethren and the world against this delusion. We as a people have supported it thus far, and are guilty by keeping silent, as a body, so long. So long as they claim the name of Adventist, they are a cancer to this body, and the worst forms of the cancer are out of sight. Whitewash and paint cover up the internal inflammation (so all say that have had the experience in it), just as the freemasons who have had their eyes opened to that trap of the devil, and have exposed it.

"It is time to rid ourselves of these influences, and be free. What if some are honest? So much the more need of trying to liberate them from this snare, by lifting our voices against it."

A few points in the above I notice:

1. The reader would suppose, from this report, that the Seventh-day Adventists had pretty nearly broken up the "old Advent church" in Richmond. This is not the case. It was divided, or rather torn in pieces, by internal dissensions, and by trials and jealousies among the preachers; so much so that when Eld. Wellcome left that place, its identity was nearly lost. A reliable individual in that neighborhood said to me, "When I. C. Wellcome preached his farewell discourse here there were just seven persons in the house, and I was one of them." This was in the "Reed Meeting House." When I went there and preached the Sabbath and Third Angel's Message, only two individuals anywise connected with the church embraced it. They who styled and considered themselves "the Advent church," would neither hear it nor admit me into their house to preach it.

2. The silly boast of "silencing their battery," is worth but little in the neighborhood where both sides were heard. But boasting is characteristic of many of that class, who, while they profess to be led only by "the law of Christ," have not yet learned that "boasting is excluded" by that law. Rom. 3. But these boasts we are used to hearing, and care nothing for them. They who wish to understand the realities of the case can try for themselves. We seek no controversies and shall never run from them.

3. We are styled a "hypocritical wart or fungus flesh," to be taken off from the advent body. Paul said of them that have a "form of godliness" and deny the power thereof, in the last days, they shall be "false accusers." The above words contain a false accusation, and we have every reason to believe it is willful, for we have given every evidence that it is possible for any people to give that we are honestly sincere, walking out on our conscientious convictions. We believe that Mr. Munger and his co-laborers who oppose the holy law of God are deeply in error; but we do not therefore denounce them as a body of hypocrites. By what authority is such a judgment rendered? On what evidence based? We feel very free to meet our accusers before the righteous Judge of all on such an unchristian and slanderous accusation as the above. Or if this remark is of local application, designed specially for the Seventh-day Adventists of Richmond, it is then peculiarly unfortunate, as the whole community will bear witness. Among them are those against whom a word of suspicion has never been raised, except by such reckless maligners as Hiram Munger. It certainly cannot raise the Crisis in the estimation of the people of Richmond that it should contain such inexcusable slanders of some of their best citizens. They who deal in such wholesale denunciations, should be able to present a higher standard of morality and Christianity in their own lives, which the no-law Adventists have not done, either in Richmond or in the country at large.

4. He says he knows God does not bless us. How does he know it? We know he does bless us. We stand on Bible ground. "Whatsoever we ask we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight." 1 John 3:22. We know it by an experience worth more to us than all the treasures of this world; one which happily sustains us in the midst of the scorn, reproach, and hatred we receive for our faith.

5. We not only believe, but know, by observation and experience, that the truth we teach proves a great blessing to all who in heart embrace it; and the "corroding curse" is found in the opposition to it. How can it prove a curse to any man or community to believe that the ten commandments are binding, and to live accordingly? Let us reason together. We can readily understand how it may prove a curse to believe and teach that the ten commandments are abolished, and to live according to that belief. Such a belief we know by observation, as we might judge by reason, tends to laxity in regard to the great principles of morality taught by those commandments. Antinomianism, which we zealously and constantly oppose, but which is one of the cardinal points of no-law Adventism, as taught by the Crisis, has ever been regarded by the eminently pious of all ages, as the greatest perversion of Christianity—the bane of society. That it is evil, and only evil, we think we can prove by abundant Scripture testimony. To us it is evidence of blindness of mind, if not of hardness of heart, to stigmatize obedience to the law of God as a curse. "Sin is the transgression of the law," and sin is an accursed thing, and the foundation of all curses. We endeavor to keep the commandments of God, and to "teach men so." Matt. 5:17-19; Rev. 14:9-12. What is there evil in this? The Lord be judge between us!

6. He says we push our doctrines into communities "Mahomet-like." We would be pleased if he would point out the likeness. Will he please to do it, or retract the slander? The former he cannot do, for there is no likeness in the case; the latter we have no hope he will do until he gets converted to a spirit of Christian charity not found in his article. Mahomet went forth with the spirit of persecution, enforcing his doctrines by the sword. In this respect I invite you to institute a comparison between us and our opponents—the no-law Adventists. The REVIEW AND HERALD has now entered upon its 37th (half yearly) volume. And I affirm with confidence that during its entire publication not an article has appeared in its columns so unjust in statement, so denunciatory in style, so bitter in spirit, and evincing so strong a desire to ride down by authority, or in other words, to persecute into submission, as this article by Hiram Munger. And he is not the only one of that class that has manifested such a spirit toward us.

The charge is eminently unjust and untrue. We have depended upon evidence, upon argument alone, seconded by the Spirit of God, always, and in all places. We have avoided railing accusations, even in cases wherein we knew that the characters of our opponents were assailable, that our cause might rest only on its merits. We have never menaced nor threatened. "Being persecuted, we suffer it; being defamed we intreat." In this respect there is a marked contrast between our publications and such articles as this of Mr. Munger. That his words do show the spirit of Mahomet, of real persecution, is very plain. We appeal to the honest, the candid everywhere, that if Mr. Munger understood the language he used, he knew it was unjust and false as applied to us.

7. We are unitedly and determinedly, publicly and privately, committed in our opposition to the practice of mesmerism. Will Mr. Munger affirm the same of himself and all of his fellow-laborers?

8. "Submit to the rigid law of taxing." This is another charge entirely destitute of truth, and shows an ignorance of language, or recklessness in its use. We do teach obedience to the Scriptural rule of giving—"as God hath prospered," which we denominate "Systematic Benevolence." The same in substance has been repeatedly urged upon the great denominations of the land, by their most devoted and energetic men. An eminent minister of Europe came to America purposely to lay the same ("Systematic Benevolence") before the great convention of Protestants which was expected to assemble in 1870. And we know that "first-day Adventist" ministers have expressed the wish that they could get their people to adopt the same plan! A tax is an impost levied by authority and in nowise partakes of the nature of a free-will offering. That all our offerings are free, is proved in that all our members exercise their own choice in the amount to be laid aside for the support of the gospel. We recommend a plan which is uniform in its operation, that, as the Scripture enjoins, "one be not eased and another burdened." Is this wrong? We leave it with the Author of the injunction on which the plan is based. We act with his fear before our eyes. Those who hate the cause we advocate are envious that our brethren generally have such confidence in the Scriptures that they adopt and follow the divine plan of giving "as God hath prospered" them. But in so acting they must receive the blessing of Heaven and give the best possible evidence that the charge of hypocrisy is false.

But on this point, it is due that I remark further. There is an insinuation in the words of the writer, calculated to do great injustice. It is often set forth by that class that we adopt this plan because of our love of money. We love justice, equality, and the cause of God. This charge of money-loving and money-getting, so often made by our opponents, is about as just as the charge of speculation laid against Messrs. Miller and Himes in 1843.

While writing this, there fell into my hands a copy of the Morning Star, the organ of the P. W. Baptists, containing the twenty-second annual report of the Corresponding Secretary of the Systematic Benevolence Society. From this report, I quote as follows:

"We are gratified also in being able to record the formation of a Systematic Benevolence Society at New Haven, Conn., last January, at a meeting of persons of various evangelical denominations. An Executive Committee was appointed to present the subject of Systematic Benevolence to the ministers and churches, and to do other necessary work. This society, so far from being denominational, has for its field the whole American church, and not merely one benevolent cause, but all. Its object, as stated in its circular, is to persuade, as far as possible, every minister and Christian in our land to adopt in his practice the principle of systematic and proportionate giving, i. e., a stated proportion of his income to aid in the world's evangelization, both at home and abroad. * * *

"The circular argues that the unsystematic, irregular, and impulsive giving, on which our benevolent operations are now so largely dependent, is utterly inadequate for the vast work which the church has to do. A very large increase of benevolent contributions is manifestly needed. A higher style of Christian giving must be adopted. If the members of our churches could be induced to fix upon one-tenth of their income to be devoted to objects of Christian benevolence, we should have, it is estimated, an immediate increase of not less than four-fold in the amount contributed to the support and spread of the gospel."

The report mentions the names of Dr. Barnes and other eminent men who have given their influence to this object, and it is worthy of notice that the circular of the society organized at New Haven by the various denominations, recommends the same plan and the same proportionate sum that is recommended, and quite generally adopted, by Seventh-day Adventists. More attention has been given to this subject in Europe than in America, and the report speaks of its practical working there.

"As an illustration of the practical working of this system of laying aside a tenth, we quote the present year's contribution of the mission churches in Turkey, which is reported as amounting to $15,000 in gold, making an average of over $5 per member. Comparing the wages of laborers in Turkey, (12 to 15 cts. per day,) with wages in this country, this average amount of $5 per member would correspond to an average contribution of over $50 from each one of our American church members.

"Our feeble churches little understand the strength they would find imparted to them, if each member could be persuaded conscientiously to lay aside a tenth of his income as an offering to God. Instead of the piteous and almost heart-rending calls for aid which are sent to Home Mission Boards, many of them, like the very poor church where Hohannes first preached that memorable sermon, would be surprised to find themselves suddenly able not only to sustain their own churches, but also to aid in the establishment of churches in new fields."

Why is it that the no-law Adventists have never raised the cry of warning nor uttered their protest through the Crisis against this work in "the various denominations?" Are they so wedded to influence and names that they overlook in large bodies that which they persistently condemn in a small one? Or are their envy and prejudices so strongly excited against us that they fear in our taking a right position we shall be blessed and prospered? On no part of our practice have we been assailed more than on this; and whatever motive they may choose to assign for their action, the facts are to their own discredit, and ready to meet them which ever way they turn.

9. He says, "We as a people have supported it thus far, and are guilty by keeping silence so long." I quote as it appeared in the Crisis. The article is a fair specimen of the support our faith has received from them. Though I have no right to go back of the record, I will suggest that, perhaps Mr. Munger may have written "suffered it," and "supported" may have got in by blindness of MS., or the printer's oversight. It matters little which form of speech is used. The language throughout is evidently as strong and bitter as he could possibly make it. In connection with the above I quote another sentence as follows: "It is time to rid ourselves of these influences, and be free." Now in all kindness and good nature I ask, What are you going to do about it? We have never attached ourselves to your body, nor attempted, nor desired to do so. We have asked no favors at your hands save this: that you will do us justice and not misrepresent us. Again I ask, What are you going to do about it? This question will be better appreciated if I quote once more from the article.

10. "So long as they claim the name of Adventists, they are a cancer to this body." Surely, "this body" must be in a bad condition! A "cancer," a body of "fungus flesh," a "hypocritical wart," which it is troubled to get rid of. Our offending, according to this, is two-fold. 1. We earnestly preach just what we believe the Bible teaches. 2. We call ourselves Adventists. And our kind-hearted friends of the "Crisis party" have too long suffered us to do so!!! Is it then so, that we are to be permitted to do so no longer? How shall this terrible evil of our being true to God and our own consciences be remedied? We have a very strong, yes a growing, inclination to continue preaching just as we have aforetime. But Mr. Munger proposes that we be suffered to do so no longer. Who is "Mahomet-like" now? Is there not a fulfillment of prophecy in this? Please read Rev. 12:17. Is it not becoming more and more evident that we are in the last days?

But again, we must not be suffered to injure them by calling ourselves Adventists. Just how they propose to prevent it we are not informed; and we strongly suspect the effort will fail. We have a very strong reason to offer for calling ourselves Adventists. It is this: We are Adventists! We claim the name as especially belonging to us. The Seventh-day Adventists were the first to adopt the name of "Adventists," as a denominational designation. It was adopted by the "no-law" body some time afterward, and not without strong opposition among themselves. It is a singular freak of Christian modesty in them to now come forward and dispute our right to the name. If they wish to bear a name altogether differing from ours, they are welcome to carry out the plan that some of them have entertained; they may drop the title of Adventists. But we shall not.

Reader, thus far I have noticed the different points in the article to show the spirit manifested by the no-law Adventists toward us. But to notice these points is not the object of my writing, only so far as these all tend toward the main point; viz., to inquire who are entitled to the name of Adventists. Our idea of the true Adventist is this: one who believes, on Bible evidence, that the Lord is coming soon, and is earnestly preparing for that work. Many among the no-law Adventists have very little idea of the subject of the Lord's coming. Many of their preachers seldom

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., THIRD-DAY, MAY 9, 1871.

URIAH SMITH, EDITOR.

My Witnesses.

"Ye are my witnesses saith the Lord." He says this to his people; and these witnesses he has had through all the rebellious ages of this world's history. The deeper the darkness of the age, the brighter has shone the light of God's truth in the lives of his followers. And he has never suffered himself to be outdone. He has matched evil with goodness every time. In the ages of the most fearful apostasy, some have ever been found who felt it incumbent on them to be as pre-eminently good as the servants of sin were pre-eminently wicked.

Noah among the antediluvians, Lot among the Sodomites, Ahijah in the days of Jeroboam, and Elijah in the days of Ahab, appear as notable examples.

The earth was full of violence, when Noah stood out in brilliant contrast with the dark background, as righteous before God. The wickedness of the Sodomites was such that God through his judgments made them an example to all who should after live ungodly, when Lot vexed his soul with their filthy words and unlawful acts. And the sinfulness of the age of Jeroboam and Ahab was such, that the lives of Ahijah and Elijah stand out as striking examples of godliness and virtue.

To realize the full wickedness of Jeroboam and the moral darkness that prevailed during the period of his reign, one must carefully read the record of his rebellious deeds, the frequent reference made throughout the Scriptures to him as a leader in sin, and the terrible denunciation of God's wrath against his iniquity. God expressly gave him the opportunity of following him. A prophet of the Lord announced to him his future sovereignty over the ten tribes which should revolt from the house of David, and promised him that if he would walk in the way of the Lord's commandments, his throne should be made sure like the throne of David. What a magnificent opportunity was presented before him. But he turned from it. Selfish considerations took supreme possession of his soul. He turned to idolatry. A powerful ruler of ten of the twelve tribes, he turned the people also into idolatry. He caused Israel to sin. He cast God behind his back, so that God testified of him that he had done iniquity above all that were before him, and determined in righteous indignation to root his house and posterity from the land of the living.

A fearful tide of apostasy thus swept over Israel. A monster of iniquity has the control of affairs. Will all be carried away by this flood of evil? Where are God's witnesses? Where are his agents to match this work of the enemy? Suddenly they appeared. A "man of God," we read, testified against the king, and Ahijah the prophet, the same who announced his elevation to the throne, announced his utter overthrow and rejection for all the iniquities which he had committed. Thus God had servants who were true to him and filled with his power; and the light of their life relieved in a measure the surrounding darkness.

But that age of rebellion and apostasy went still deeper into sin. Soon Ahab appeared upon the throne of Israel; and wicked as Israel had been, wicked as Jeroboam had been, it is recorded of Ahab that "he did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him," and that he "did more to provoke the God of Israel to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him."

To match this monument of wickedness, as a witness for God's truth and an instrument of his power, appeared the illustrious prophet of Heaven, Elijah, towering, as a man of God, above the ordinary level of saints and righteous men, as Ahab towered above the masses of sinners, as an embodiment of iniquity and evil.

And thus it has been in every age. When the enemy has worked, God has worked. Evil has not been able to surpass the good. Whenever the enemy has put upon the stage a prime minister of sin, God has raised up servants of his own as eminent for righteousness and virtue as the former for corruption and crime. And as it has been, we may expect it will be.

Reader, do these thoughts suggest further comparison and present duty? How is it at the present time? Will it not be in these days as it ever has been? Does not God design to have living examples of his righteousness and truth, equal to the development of iniquity and evil in these days? But we all know that the last days are to be days of surpassing wickedness. Evil men and seducers are to wax worse and worse. Sin is to run riot, and the world be swallowed up in floods of unprecedented wickedness. What then may we, on the other hand, expect? That God will have a people eminent for piety and holy living. Who will they be? Those to whom he has committed his truth; those who are called out to look and prepare for his coming and kingdom. Do we, then, come up to the standard? Are we endeavoring to live as holy lives, as the wicked around us are living abandoned ones? As the world is growing worse are we growing better? We must be doing this if we would be among his chosen ones at last.

To maintain the required standard of purity and devotion is our privilege; for God has promised all needed help: it is our duty; for God requires it: and it is our necessity; for without it we fail of Heaven at last.

To Correspondents.

An article, "Be ye Holy," is passed by for want of signature.

D. S. JAMES: It is not certain who made the vow mentioned in Acts 18:18, Paul or Aquila. Many commentators refer it to the latter. The vow was probably that of a Nazarite, see Num. 6, and may have been made before his conversion to Christianity. But if not, it can easily be accounted for; for, 1. Paul wished to disarm the Jews of prejudice, and hence performed things which to him were matters of indifference, because they were still considered essential by them; and, 2. Offerings and sacrifices had a political as well as typical use; for from them, the State or civil government derived its support. It was therefore proper even for Christians, as citizens of that commonwealth, to present them for their political uses, though their typical significance had ceased.

We understand John 2:24, 25, to be simply a declaration of the Lord's omniscience, shown by his power to read the hearts of men.

J. N. LOUGHBOROUGH: The word translated, "made void," in Ps. 119:126: "They have made void thy law," is not the same as the one rendered "made void" in Rom 3:31, though it has a similar signification. The word in Psalm 119, is discedannumi, which means to "scatter abroad, disband, drive away." Katargeo, the word employed in Romans, means "to set free, to leave unemployed or idle," hence "to render useless, to make void, to abolish."

R. J. FOSTER: We think the words "letter" and "spirit" in Rom. 2:27, 29; 7:6, are not used in the same sense as in 2 Cor. 3:6. In the latter they seem to denote the old and new covenants, or the civil administration of the law under the former dispensation, in the Jewish nation as a theocracy, and the spiritual administration of the law in this dispensation, among Christians as a household of faith. While in Romans the same words evidently refer to an inward, spiritual, living worship, in contrast with an outward, formal, dead one.

R. D. BENHAM: The book was thankfully received. Should have acknowledged it before, but have been trying to find time to notice it.

J. C. BUNCH: Isa. 65:20, and Zech. 14:16-21 cannot be taken to prove mortality in the new earth, because we have testimony which is plain, positive, and direct, that there will be no death there, and all these passages from which an inference can be drawn to the contrary, are confessedly obscure. Direct testimony cannot give place to the indirect. We believe all the cutting off that is spoken of in both passages takes place before the new earth becomes the possession of the saints.

H. J. JOHNSON: For an exposition of Rev. 12, see Thoughts on the Revelation.

INQUIRER: For an exposition of Luke 17:34-37, see Answers to Objections against the Visions pp. 57-68. We have not time now to notice Mal. 1:12, 13, and 3:8-12. Should be pleased to have some of our preaching brethren prepare remarks on those passages for the REVIEW.

J. O. CORLISS: We have no evidence that the darkness during the dark day of 1780, extended beyond New England, and the Canadas; but at the same time it was the most remarkable and extensive phenomenon of the kind that has occurred since the crucifixion of Christ; and hence is sufficient to fulfill the prophecy.

The Course of Day.

WHAT do we mean by this expression? Simply this: that each day of the week makes a definite circuit of the globe. But does not each day begin and end to each individual just where he is? Assuredly it does. Then what more is there, or can there be, to the subject? To those who have given the matter no special thought, this is all there is to it. The day begins and ends in each place to its inhabitants, and the most of them regard this as all that pertains to any day of the week. Why are they not right? Simply because there are, east and west, other people, and other places, in the world. But how does this have any bearing upon the subject? Strange to say many apparently thoughtful persons fail to see that it has any bearing at all. They know when any given day begins and ends with them, and they never look beyond that single fact. Indeed such persons can with difficulty be induced to give any thought to the subject. They are indifferent, simply because they think they understand it well enough already, and that there is no important idea concerning it which they do not already grasp.

Yet there is something more which they need to learn. The proof is found in one very palpable fact of which few persons are ignorant. A day is added to the reckoning of those who circumnavigate the globe in an easterly direction, and a day is lost from the reckoning of those who circumnavigate it in a westerly direction. To the seventh-day man, this is a matter of importance, as it furnishes the most plausible argument against the observance of the definite seventh day. To the first day man, it is even of greater interest, for this change of reckoning in circumnavigating the globe furnishes his principal proof that the fourth commandment calls for the sabbatical observance of the seventh part of our time, and not for that of the definite seventh day. It is of special interest also to those who do not regard any day as sacred, for no person who has any love for truth can feel indifferent at the supposed confusion and indefiniteness of dates which seems to be by this fact established.

Why is it that this apparent gain or loss of a day occurs? This brings us to consider the nature of the course of day, for it is involved in this very thing. Because every individual does have a definite day of twenty-four hours for each of the seven days of the week, he must not therefore conclude that the day begins and ends its course with him.

The measurement of time as established by the Creator is very worthy of our admiration. It gives to each place definite days of twenty-four hours, and it gives to our globe the circuit of day which must be carefully distinguished from the simple existence of definite twenty-four-hour days in any one locality. Does any one feel disposed to call this distinction a foolish and unlearned question? Before they do this, let them answer this inquiry: Does each day of the week commence all round the world at once? If it does, then indeed there is no circuit of day to our globe; for it begins everywhere at the same instant, and ends everywhere at the same identical moment. But in that case, whereas it is sunset, afternoon, noon, forenoon, morning, midnight, and evening, at the very same instant in different and successive points in the compass of our globe, it follows of necessity that each day, if it begins at the same instant all over the globe, begins at every hour and even minute of the entire twenty-four hours of day and night. Any one can see that such an idea would make the observance of the Sabbath practically an impossibility. For in addition to the fact that some point on the world's surface must be selected for the place at which day should begin at sunset, there must also be an exact measurement from that precise meridian to that of each individual the world over. And as this would involve the beginning of day at some point of the globe during each moment of day and night, and as there is nothing in nature to mark all the moments or even hours of the twenty-four, it would follow that the whole thing after being determined by an exact computation of each man's meridian to fix the time of day or night at which he should commence the day (provided it could be agreed where is the exact meridian that should have the day begin with sunset), there would be only one thing that could be depended upon to govern the beginning of the days of the week, and that is—clocks! A very unfortunate state of the case to those who happen to have none, and are not able to buy; and equally such to those who have clocks that will not keep good time!

But if this were the proper way to reckon days, viz., by having them each begin at the same instant the world over, the difficulty by no means pertains to the Sabbath-keeper only. For all the natural divisions of time would have to be disregarded by nearly all the people on the globe; for the days of the week would commence in different parts of the world at every moment of day and night. Such would be the case were it true that the days of the week begin at the same instant the world over. Happily no such reckoning of time was ever ordained by the Lawgiver, for he is not the author of confusion, but all his ways are perfect. Indeed not one particle of evidence exists to show that each day of the week commences all over the world at the same instant. We copy the following forcible argument of Eld. Waggoner in reply to one who contended that the Sabbath begins at the same instant to all the inhabitants of the world. Bro. W. speaks thus:—

recognizes the fact that the day commences at sunset, and sunset does not occur at all places at the same time; therefore, the day does not commence in all places at the same time. The Bible plainly teaches that the day commences with the evening; and as all days commence at that time, what is said in Lev. 23:32, will apply to all Sabbaths at all times, and in all places. But the writer of the foregoing letters urges that we should begin to keep the seventh day at the same time they would begin to keep the same day in Asia! Let us see how this will work.

"Two men, one in Asia and one in America, wish to keep the Sabbath according to the Bible. They read in the Bible that (1.) the seventh day is the Sabbath. Ex. 20:9. (2.) The evening is the first part of the day. Gen. 1. (3.) That the evening begins at the setting of the sun. Josh. 8:29; 10:26, 27; Mark 1:32. And (4.) therefore) The Sabbath must be observed from even to even, that is, from sunset to sunset. Lev. 23:32. Now if they both keep the Sabbath according to the Bible, they will both keep it according to these particulars. As time rolls on, the sun rises the sixth time in the week on the American—it is sixth-day morning with him. Thinking of the circumstances of his Asiatic brother, he soliloquizes thus:

"The sun is now setting in Asia, and my brother there now commences to keep the Sabbath. It is said that God is a God of order, and uniformity is desirable, so I must now begin to keep the Sabbath, in order to keep it with my brother. But the Bible is my rule, and I will see if I can begin the Sabbath here at the same time my brother in Asia begins it, and obey the rule. The rule says I must keep the seventh day; if I begin now, I shall keep part of the sixth day and part of the seventh day. The rule says I must keep it from evening to evening; if I begin now, I shall keep it from morning to morning. I must not violate the rule; therefore I must not yet commence my rest of the Sabbath. Neither will it do for my brother to wait till the sun sets here, in order to begin with me, for the sun has already set there, and the seventh day has there commenced. The rule requires him to begin now. And if he waits to begin with me, the Sabbath will be half gone there when he begins; so he will then keep half of the seventh day and half of the first day. Therefore, if we begin at the same time, we must violate the rule, or else get the sun to set in Asia and America at the same time! But the former, we must not do, and the latter, we cannot do; therefore, he must begin now, and I must wait till the sun sets here, and the Sabbath begins with me."

"Who can say he has not arrived at a safe conclusion? It is, in fact, the only conclusion at which he could possibly arrive without doing violence to the sacred rule.

"Suppose a law should be passed at Washington that a certain document should be placed on record in Washington, and in the capital of every State of the Union, on the fourth of July, exactly at noon. Would the Secretary in Sacramento fulfill the law, if he made the record at the same time that it was made in Washington? Surely not; for the law requires it to be made at noon, in every place, but noon does not come at Sacramento some three or four hours before the sun reaches the meridian. There is not a person in the land so wild as to suppose, nor so reckless as to urge, that the record must be made at the same time, absolutely, in each State of the Union. But 'noon' is no more definite than 'evening' or 'the setting of the sun,' what will apply to one, in this respect, will apply to the other. Why, then, will people argue so absurdly in respect to the commencement of the Sabbath?"—Advent Review, July 15, 1869.

It is certain, therefore, that day does not begin at the same instant to all mankind. It does begin with sunset as has been clearly shown, and sunset makes the circuit of the globe westward. This being true, it follows that there is such a thing as a circuit to day, as well as definite days of just twenty-four hours each. Here is an important truth:

Each day makes the circuit of the globe in forty-eight hours, and each day occupies twenty-four hours in passing any one point in its course around the world.

If the reader will have patience, the statement shall be proved, and its importance made manifest. That each day of the week occupies twenty-four hours in passing any point in its course round the world, is manifest. For every one knows that wherever he may be, each day of the week comes to him and continues with him for twenty-four hours. He may also understand that as each day does begin earlier to those who live to the east of himself than it does to him, and that it does not begin to those who live west of himself so early as it does with him, that it follows of necessity that the course of day is more than twenty-four hours long. But how can it be shown that the course or circuit of day around our world is just forty-eight hours?

This can be done without difficulty. For as the days of the week begin with sunset, so also is it true that sunset makes the circuit of the globe. It requires twenty-four hours for sunset to go round the world. And therefore when it has accomplished the circuit of the globe the day is ended where the circuit began, but is only commenced at the place where that circuit closes. And as day is thus ended on one side of the day line, and just begun on the other side of that line, it will take the end of day just as long to make the circuit of the globe as it required for the be-

An Unexpected Phenomenon.

THE DARKNESS OVER NEW ENGLAND IN 1780.

"TWAS on a May day of the far old year
Seventeen hundred eighty that there fell
Over the bloom and sweet life of the spring,
Over the fresh earth and the heaven of noon,
A horror of great darkness, like the night
In day of which the Norland sagas tell—
The twilight of the gods. The low-hung sky
Was black with ominous clouds, save where its rim
Was fringed with a dull glow, like that which climbs
The crater's sides from the red hell below.
Birds ceased to sing, and all the barn-yard fowls
Roosted; the cattle at the pasture bars
Lowed, and looked homeward; bats on leathern wings
Flitted abroad; the sounds of labor died;
Men prayed, and women wept: all ears grew sharp
To hear the doom-blast of the trumpet shatter
The black sky, that the dreadful face of Christ
Might look from the rent clouds, not as he looked,
A loving guest at Bethany, but stern
As justice and inexorable law. —Whittier.

On the 19th day of May, 1780, the inhabitants of New England and the adjacent parts were the trembling witnesses of an event in nature which has never been fully described nor analyzed. We refer to the wide-spread and mysterious withdrawal of the natural sunlight, which so startled our ancestors and covered the land with gloom on that memorable occasion; a phenomenon in its kind never experienced before nor since in the country, and which, while religion attempted to account for it as a fulfilled prophecy, yet science has not unfolded its quality nor discovered its cause. Ninety-one years have passed away since the extraordinary darkness transpired. The living witnesses are getting to be few, but still our sources of information concerning all the features of the day and night are ample, and before us as we write are over forty different testimonies relating to the scene we seek to exhaustively depict. They are mainly from persons who saw what they describe, and embrace evidence from historical collections, histories of States and towns, histories of the revolution, journals of legislatures, newspapers of the day, sermons of the ministry, personal memoirs, memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, professors in colleges, poets, philosophers, physicians, scientists, and savans; among them Noah Webster, LL. D., who wrote, "I stood and viewed the phenomenon, for which no satisfactory cause has been assigned."

The year we have named was celebrated for its numerous auroral exhibitions in this latitude. They covered the midnight heavens with corruscations of red and silver, and streamed out like lightning, seeming, says one writer, fairly to flash warmth in the face. A single sun spot over 50,000 miles in diameter was seen with the naked eye by William Herschel the previous year, and in 1780 others were visible and recorded by Lelande. The winter preceding May was marked by extraordinary severity. Snow lay on the ground from the middle of November to the middle of April four feet deep everywhere. In December and January a snow storm continued seven successive days, and the snow fell to a depth of four feet on a level in this single storm, with drifts eight and ten feet high. Sheep were buried in the drifts for many days, and even men and animals perished with cold. Long Island Sound was crossed by heavy artillery on the ice.

Narragansett Bay froze over so hard that men traversed the ice from Providence to Newport in skating parties, and from Fall River to Newport loads of wood were conveyed on the ice through Bristol ferry. The journal of the House of Representatives of Connecticut records it as "the severest hard winter within the memory of man," followed by "the most backward spring recollected by aged and observing citizens." War, too, added its rigors to the dreary aspect of nature.

The month of May was dry and cold. Previous to the 19th, a vapor filled the air for several days. There was a smell of sulphur in the air; and on the day of the great darkness, Etna discharged lava from a new mouth and the eruption was accompanied with violent earthquakes in Southern Italy. The morning of the 19th was overcast with some clouds, and rain fell over the country, with lightning and thunder. The sun on rising shone not with its accustomed clearness. Its face seemed veiled and the aspect somewhat lurid. Scarcely any motion was in the air; what there was of wind came from the south-west; vanes were not stirred, and sails and flags hung idle. By nine o'clock in the forenoon, without previous warning the darkness stole gradually on, with a luminous appearance near the horizon, as if the obscuring cloud had dropped down from overhead. There was a yellowness of the atmosphere that made clear silver to assume a grass green hue. Then a dense, undefinable vapor settled rapidly and without aerial movement over all the land and ocean from Pennsylvania to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the darkness it caused increasing by degrees until the sunlight was effectually shut out. Ordinary cloud it was not. The rapidity with which so large an extent of country was enveloped precludes the possibility of supposing this to have been a natural cloud moving laterally. Besides this, the day was too calm to imagine such a thing. Down came the darkness thicker and thicker. By ten o'clock the air was loaded with a heavy gloom. The heavens were tinged with a yellowish or faint red; the lurid look increased; few, if any, ordinary clouds were visible. The sun, in disappearing, took on a brassy hue. The lurid, brassy color spread everywhere, above and below. The grass assumed the color of the sky, and all out-doors wore a sickly, weird and melancholy aspect, a dusky appearance as if seen through a smoked glass. Nature donned a frightful look. No one had seen the like before, and the hearts of thousands grew faint with fear. So low was the overhanging vapor that it appeared to rest upon the very earth, and the hills in some places could not be seen at the distance of only half a mile. Especially was this true at Pepperell and Groton in Massachusetts. By eleven o'clock it was as night itself; and from this time until three in the afternoon the darkness was truly extraordinary and frightful. Some reported that the sun's disk could be seen dimly through the murky gloom at the period of the deepest darkness, but this seems hardly probable. At sea the air was thick and had an unusual smell and a most unnatural appearance. Generally there was a sooty smell prevalent, and in a few places some drops of rain fell. Dr. Tenney, with a philosophic eye to turn the sable curtain into gold, wrote that all nature wore a resplendent and beautiful tint, the earth and trees appearing as if adorned with an enchanting glow! Mr. Temple of Boston saw things in somber color, and in a letter to friends in England, described the scene as if a veil was drawn over all things, which he seemed to look through and see the heaven beyond it; while at Newburyport a pious woman wrote: All nature seemed hushed, as though Jehovah was about to make himself known by some mighty act. Every eye was turned upward, every one inquiring: What is going to take place? At three o'clock the light came on from the west, and the heavens at its coming looked more brassy than at any previous time, while there were seen in some places quick flashes or corruscations, not unlike the Aurora Borealis. Gradually, and to the immense relief of more than half a million of people, the darkness passed off. Such was the general appearance of the earth and atmosphere.

The extent of the darkness was greater than is related of any other similar phenomenon on record, not excepting the celebrated dark days over Egypt and Judea. It reached south to the northern half of Pennsylvania, and from thence along the coast north-east to the wilds of Maine, eastward to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and out at sea one hundred and twenty miles south-east of Boston, and undoubtedly much farther; west to the valleys of Lake Champlain and the Hudson River, and north into undefined regions in Canada. Portland, Boston, Hartford, New York, West Point, and Albany, were affected by it. But the degrees of darkness differed in different places, the deepest night settling over New England. A tract of land and sea eight hundred miles in length and four hundred miles in breadth, embracing an area of three hundred and twenty thousand square miles, was known to be covered by the cloud, and so far as can be ascertained, a population of seven hundred thousand souls sat for a portion of the day and night in a gloom more or less profound and inexplicable.

Just how dark the day was is attested by indisputable evidence. The hour and minute could not be discovered on the face of a clock or watch by persons of unimpaired eyesight. Candles became an absolute necessity both out of doors and in, as it was impossible to transact ordinary business without them. Fires on the hearth-stones shone as brightly as on a moonless November evening, and all dinner tables were set with lighted candles upon them as if it were the evening repast. The keenest eyes in-doors could not see to read common print. So far beyond any ordinary fog was the effect that stages on the road either put up at the nearest hotel during the mid-day hours, or carried candles or lanterns to enable the perplexed driver to well see his way. This in many instances was performed as it invariably is at night. At Haverhill, N. H., at twelve at noon a man could not be seen in the road at a distance of only twenty rods, while an hour or two later the captain of a ship forty leagues at sea south-east of Boston was compelled to light a large candle to enable him to perceive his instruments and thereby to steer his vessel. "It was so dark at noon," writes Dr. Adams, "that we could not tell one person from another in a room with three large windows in it." A writer in the Massachusetts Spy informs us that at the time of the greatest obscurity the light was less than the volume of light from the moon, while many other eye-witnesses assert unequivocally that the greatest darkness was fully equal to what is the season of "candle lighting" in the evening. No London fog ever equaled this. The astronomer of Paxton, Samuel Stearns, calculated that the ratio of light borne by the moon at its full, as compared with the full light of the sun, is as one to one hundred thousand. Later French savans make the difference as one to three hundred thousand and even one to eight hundred thousand. But if Stearns was right, the sunlight of that remarkable day was immeasurably less than that of a common clear, sunny day, the ordinary sunlight being reduced below the light of the full moon. Connecticut went totally under the cloud. The journal of her House of Representatives puts on record the fact that "none could see to read or write in the House, or even at a window, or distinguish persons at a small distance, or perceive any distinction of dress, &c., in the circle of attendants. Therefore at eleven o'clock adjourned the House till two o'clock afternoon." At Ipswich, Massachusetts, at half-past eleven, several educated gentlemen tested the depth of the darkness by attempting to read large print in a room with three windows of twenty-four panes each, facing the south and east; but, although their eyesight was good, they could not at all distinguish the words. At twelve, with the three windows still uncovered and open, substances, by the light of a candle, cast well-defined shadows on the wall, and shadow profiles and images were as distinct and sharp in their outlines as in the evening. At one o'clock a single gleam of light, coming hitherto from the east, was wholly withdrawn or shut out, and it became darker than at any previous time. The amazement of the party was very great. At two o'clock the gleam which had disappeared in the east shone faintly in the west, as if the obscuring cloud had lifted or passed over; but the gentlemen, with the three windows still open, found it necessary to have two candles on the table to enable them to appropriate the dinner now set before them. At four the company said they had passed a very unexpected night together, and then parted, each musing on the strange adventure. With all these facts before us, we can discover no extravagance in the language of the Boston Gazette, when its editor exclaimed, "In short, there was the appearance of midnight at noon-day." Men were awestruck; all busy sounds of labor ceased; and a calamity of some kind, none knew what, was confidently imagined to be approaching. It seemed, says one, like a great roof closing down upon the earth, and shutting out the glorious sunlight forever.

The general results of the darkness afford an interesting study both for the scientist and the divine. The natural world was singularly affected. All the brute and feathered creation seemed puzzled and agitated. The birds ceased to fly, and hid themselves in the branches of the trees. As the darkness increased, they sang their evening songs as they do at twilight, and then became silent. Pigeons on the wing took to the shelter of the forest as they do at night. The whip-poor-will, as if it were truly night, cheerfully sang his song through the gloomy hours. Woodcocks, which are night birds, whistled as they only do in the night time. Bats came out of their hiding places and flew about. The fowls marched solemnly to their roosts as they do only at nightfall, and after cackling for a while over the mystery of so short a day, became still. Cocks crowed, as is their custom, at nightly intervals and the early breaking of day. Frogs peeped their evening concert, and dogs whined or howled and ran away as on the approach of an earthquake. The herds of cattle on New England's thousand hills sought the shelter of the shed or barnyard, lowing as they came to the gate, and sheep huddled around in a circle with their heads inward—the invariable token of apprehended danger.

On the human family the effect was still more curious and terrifying. The mechanic left his tools in the shop, the farmer his plow in the furrow, and each moved in silent and marveling mood toward the barn or dwelling. On the home threshold they were met by pale and anxious women, who tremblingly inquired, "What is coming?" The alarmed traveler, seeking the sympathy of his fellow-man as one impressed with a sense of impending peril, put up at the nearest house, and mingled his anxious questionings and forebodings with those of the family. Strong men met and spoke with surprise on their countenances, and little children peered timidly into the deepening gloom, and then sought the sheltering parental arms. Schools broke up in affright, and the wondering pupils scampered homeward with many expressions of childish fear. The inevitable candle shone out at the windows of all dwellings—every countenance gathered blackness—all hearts were filled with fear of an approaching, unparalleled storm, or the occurrence of a terrestrial convulsion; but it was not the blackness of the storm cloud, such as sometimes with frightful agitation breaks over a single city; it was the silent spreading of the pall-cloth over the earth by strong, invisible hands. Many anecdotes of terror are related. Men well remembered the earthquake of a quarter of a century before, but this darkening of the earth at noonday—what could it portend? In Boston, from the hours of eleven or one till three o'clock, business was generally suspended, and shops were closed. Those who had the courage to continue them open, illuminated them artificially. At Groton, a court was in session in a meeting-house full of large windows, as was the old style of houses of worship, but at half-past eleven all faces began to wear a sombre hue, whereupon magistrates and people followed suit with all New England, and called for lighted candles—gas and kerosene being then unknown in the land.

Very little of jesting or humor concerning the day was indulged in. Indifferent persons who were enthusiastic and anxious during the darkness gave way to some railery as soon as the shadow disappeared before the welcome shining of the sun. When the news was carried to England, gentlemen who were prone to laugh at the expected discomfiture of the then revolutionary colonies, interpreted the darkness allegorically of the gloom thrown over the minds of the "Boston rebels" by reason of the reduction of Charleston, the defeat of Clinton, etc.; but when subsequent letters confirmed the tidings and asserted the event to have been a sober literal fact, astonishment knew no bounds. Meanwhile the jeering Tories sent home word that "it was the devil spreading his wings over the northern rebellious colonies, and if they do not repent, the next time he will certainly fly off with them all." But the answer from England was: "I do not believe all the wise men of Boston will be able to explain it."

But it cannot be denied that the predominating feeling on that day was awe and fear. At many a dinner table no food was eaten; the family sat pale and often silent. Amazement hushed all boisterous sounds. If any spoke, it was in a low, subdued tone. Pious fathers took down the family Bible, read it reverently, and then knelt and prayed. Prof. Samuel Williams of Harvard College testified years after that the terror "surpassed description." The bells were rung in the large towns, and the people in masses forsook their toils and crowded into the churches. Thousands sought the minister for an explanation of the darkness, who, in response, took Matt. 24: 29, 30, or Rev. 6: 12, or Isa. 13: 10, or Ezek. 32: 7, or Joel 2: 31, or some other sacred prediction of the darkening of the sun, and improved upon them in sermons on the last day. The neighbors flocked around holy men, who calmly pointed them to the Lamb of God as their only refuge at all times. Some, with lanterns, went from house to house with warnings on their lips. The darkness was compared to that which overspread Judea at the crucifixion of our Saviour, and it was asserted to be not a whit less divinely caused. Sober men, unaccustomed to such a freak of nature, deemed the day of doom at the door. We cannot sneer at these alarms; they were legitimately born. President Dwight, an adult eye-witness, asserts this to have been "the general opinion." Even the gathered wisdom of the Council of Connecticut waited and listened, writes Whittier,

"To hear the thunder of the wrath of God
Break from the hollow trumpet of the cloud."

The darkness of the day having been succeeded for an hour or two before evening by a partially clear sky and the shining of the sun, still obscured by the black and vapor mist, this interval was followed by a return of the obscuration with greater density, that rendered the first half of the night hideously dark beyond all former experience of the, probably a, million of people who saw it. From soon after sunset until midnight no ray of light from moon or star penetrated the vault above. It was pronounced "the blackness of darkness." Horses in numerous instances, when wanted for service, could not be compelled to quit the stable. Others on the highway, unable to see for the darkness, seemed to be seized with fear, and moved their feet cautiously and with bewildering hesitation, as if apprehensive of plunging into an abyss. Travelers on foot, who supposed themselves acquainted with every foot of the road, lost their way in familiar localities. Some, totally bewildered, shouted for aid but a few rods from their own door. Lost persons in some instances felt their way home, being guided by the fence. Dr. Adams says almost everybody who was out that night got lost. Sharp eyes could not distinguish between the heavens and the earth, the line of the horizon was totally invisible, and white, large substances placed before the eyes could not be discovered either in their color or outline. At nine o'clock the moon rose at her full, but it had not the least effect to dispel the death-like shadow. At between nine and ten, a sea captain more than a hundred miles from the New England coast, ordered his men to take in some sails, but they could not find their way from one mast to another without light of candles. Like a chain this blackness bound the whole coast line for more than 200 leagues. It was compared to a solid wall, impenetrable and forbidding, and had an oppressive, choking, overpowering effect on all who tried to brave it. At Salem an intelligent writer said: "Perhaps it was never darker since the children of Israel left the house of bondage." Dr. Samuel Adams and Hon. Wheeler Martin, as also others, testify that "it could be felt" on waving the hand in the air; language used by Moses concerning the supernaturally and miraculously produced cloud that shut down over Egypt, causing a "thick darkness" of three days' duration. But lest this description may be considered exaggerated by the excitement engendered by the immediate occurrence of this phenomenon, we here reproduce the strong language of Dr. Samuel Tenney, written in calm mood to the Historical Society five years subsequent to the scene he is describing; the language of a philosophic mind deeply impressed. He says: "The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as ever has been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. It wanted only palpability to render it as extraordinary as that which overspread the land of Egypt in the days of Moses. And, as the darkness is not substantial, but a mere privation, the palpability ascribed to that by the sacred historian must have arisen from some peculiar affection of the atmosphere, perhaps an exceeding thick vapor that accompanied it. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable shades, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."

What was the cause of this darkness? Here the wisdom of New England was baffled. Newspaper men who are generally regarded as competent to explain all passing events, gave up in despair, and said: "It is to be desired that curious and philosophical gentlemen would favor the public with a solution of this phenomenon." They said "there was nothing terrible in it," but nevertheless nearly everybody was terrified. It was pronounced a lusus nature, past the vulgar comprehension, and which it was requested that the Royal Society of England should be consulted to frame a solution. But this learned body never explained it. Dr. Tenney, in 1785, wrote the Historical Society that the ability of the land had endeavored to present a cause, but, said he, "You will agree with me that no satisfactory solution has yet appeared." In similar language wrote Noah Webster in 1843. The theory of some, that it was smoke and ashes from forest fires, extensively raging, is overturned by Dr. Webster, who argued that "no fires in our forests could have been sufficient to spread a dense cloud over the whole of New England and even some parts of the Middle States." He might have added: "And this in so short a time, when the swiftest clouds move but ten miles an hour." The theory of Webster himself, that it was the "smoke of some volcano in the northern regions of this continent, wafted in a vast volume by the wind," is equally untenable. No great density of smoke was observable, and in Boston, as elsewhere, "there was," says a Bostonian, "not the least appearance of fog, smoke, or haziness."

The old poems declare that smoke from the burning of every town and forest in the land could not create so dismal a gloom. And all analogies teach they were right. The notion of some, that Venus or Mercury intercepted the sun's rays, is refuted by the fact that there was no transit of either of these planets during that year. Some said it was a solar eclipse—a conclusion rendered impossible by the moon having full the day before. And very aptly does the astronomer of Paxton ask: "If the darkness of the day was caused by a solar eclipse, what then darkened the night, as the moon was more than forty hours' motion past her opposition?" Others said a comet interposed the baleful shadow of its nucleus between men and the sun, or flung its tail upon the earth. Dr. Tenney attributed the darkness to a substratum cloud of vapor of great thickness and density, the sun's rays getting lost in the struggle to penetrate the dusky shield. And Stearns regarded it as caused by exhaled particles of various qualities of matter highly condensed and impervious to sunlight. It is possible these views were borrowed from Dr. Thomas Burnet, the English geologist who, more than a century earlier (in 1667), had written that in the "latter days," in accordance with our Lord's prediction, "the sun and moon will be darkened, or of a bloody hue or pale countenance, produced by an infectious and corrupt air, filled with thick vapors and fumes or turbid exhalations, atmospheric obscurities to a great extent intercepting the sun's rays, causing it thus to appear, and proportionably diminishing the light of the moon." (Vide, Theory of the Earth.) To say the least, many of the views of the New Englanders coincided with those of Burnet respecting the modus operandi by which an unusual solar obscuration could take place. Far more likely is the view already hinted at, that the secondary cause was not at all in the body of the solar orb or in the earth, but of cosmical origin, and traceable to cometic or meteoric material consuming in the upper regions and falling in a great cloud into the atmosphere in the form of cosmic dust. The sooty and sulphurous smell in the air, the faint electrical flashes, and the black dust seen on the surface of water in many localities, favor this view. The cause was evidently cosmic, cometic, and celestial.

But while New England admitted a secondary cause, her Christian people, sharing the feeling of the devout and philosophical Stearns, imputed the flinging of this black shadow "like a funeral pall" over the land inhabited by nearly one-third of the people of the United Colonies, to the direct interposition of the God of the universe, who himself, by means unknown to mortals, darkened both the sun and the moon, both the day and the night, as a token of his indignation against every prevailing iniquity, and an omen of a future day of universal destruction and wrath! It made no difference that it was not supernatural, or that secondary causes had produced the result witnessed. The effect only was sought for; the sacred Scriptures had announced a darkening of the sun and moon, and these signs had been fulfilled before their eyes—locally, to be sure—but minds reverently went behind all secondary cause and declared it was the immediate hand of God. The ministry insisted it was occasioned by a divine arrangement of nature, and in the spirit of the sacred Hebrew writers, who ascribed all remarkable and unaccountable acts of the natural world to the working out of the vast designs of the Infinite, said: "This is the Lord's doings, and it is marvelous in our eyes!" In more modern times, men would doubtless have said: "Oh! it is only a temporary obscurity of the light by a cloud of exhaled vapor, or by terrestrial contact with cosmic particles, and nothing more." Few minds would see God in the mysterious cloud; not so with our fathers. They saw in the strange sun-darkening shroud a sure celestial token of the approaching consummation, and so proclaimed it in all ways. The impression was most profound, and was not effaced during the remainder of that century. The view was reiterated seventeen years later by the orthodox Spaulding in the pulpit of the Tabernacle at Salem, and was indorsed by the first religious paper in the world, published at Portsmouth in 1808. Indeed, it was opposed by none. To-day nearly the entire body of believers comprising the sect of Advent Christians in the United States and Canada sustain the views of the New England Christians of the last century concerning the significance of the darkness of Friday, May 19, 1780. We argue nothing here pro or con, but only state facts, and should be unfaithful chroniclers of historical fact did we omit to record this abiding conviction of nearing Judgment on the old New England mind, and transmitted to hundreds of thousands of their posterity by the scenes of the never-to-be-forgotten dark day.

We may learn lessons of good from these recollections of the famous black Friday. Individually the multitudes who live in 1871 may not feel that such old times and far off events, however ominous, at all concern them. Nevertheless there was wisdom in the words, and a certain heroic principle in the conduct of Abraham Davenport, Colonel, and afterward Judge of Stamford, Conn., and State Councilor in the Legislative Chamber at Hartford—a wisdom and a moral worth remembering. The providence of God found him serving his day and generation when the great darkness fell. Amid the deepening gloom that wrapped about the city, darkened the rooms of the State House, and set the law-givers trembling, and many of them to exclaim: "It is the Lord's great day," and move to adjourn, Davenport refused to be frightened from his post; but when all eyes turned to him, boldly said: "I am against the adjournment. Either the day of Judgment is at hand or it is not. If it is not, there is no cause for adjournment. If it is, I wish to be found in the line of my duty. I wish candles to be brought." Men will lose nothing while in the true line of present duty. In the words of the poet Whittier in allusion to the scene we here describe: "Simple duty hath no place for fear." The line of duty is the true path for all to walk in, come what may.—D. T. TAYLOR, in Boston Journal.

Happiness in Death.

THE Rev. William Jay, in a sermon on the requisites for a happy death, says: "It requires that you should obtain and preserve the evidences of pardon; without these you cannot be fearless and tranquil in the near views of eternity, since 'after death is the Judgment.' It requires you to keep a conscience void of offense toward God and toward man. Is he in a condition to die who has lived in the practice of some known sin, and in the omission of some known duty? Is he in condition to die who has worn the mask of hypocrisy, which will now drop off and expose him in his true character? Is he in condition to die who, by artifice, unfair dealing, grinding the faces of the poor, has amassed gain which will dishonor him if restored, and damn him if retained?"

"It requires us to live in the exercise of brotherly kindness and charity. Of all we do for him, nothing pleases him more than this; this we know he will acknowledge in the day of Judgment, and why not in the day of death? 'Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble.' 'The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing; thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness.' Many are praying for him; the widows and the fatherless cry, and their cry entereth 'the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth.'

"It requires an attention to religion in your families. I pity that father who will be surrounded when he dies, with children whose minds he never informed, whose disposition he never curbed, whose manners he never guarded; who sees one an infidel, another a profligate, and all irreligious.

"I know that you are not answerable for the conversion of your offspring, but you are responsible for the use of all proper means. And if these have been neglected, you will plant your dying pillow with thorns; whereas, if you have seriously and perseveringly attended to them, your dying repose shall not be disturbed by want of success; but you shall be able to say, 'Although my house be not so with God, yet hath he made me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure; for this is all my salvation and all my desire, although he make it not to grow.'

"Through the mercy of God, and the grace of his dear Son, may we be enabled to live in the discharge of duty, that our dying beds shall feel soft as downy pillows are."—Sel.

Patience.

AMONG the many Christian graces spoken of by the Saviour and his apostles, that of patience, under all circumstances, stands pre-eminently first, and yet we regret to say it is sadly deficient in many of the professed followers of Christ in these last days. Some little trifling matter comes up to disturb their equanimity, and ere they are aware of it, they are giving way to hasty, impatient words over this, that, or the other thing, making not only themselves wretched, but every one about them. Now, brother, sister, this ought not so to be. What if every body does not do just as you would like to have him, is that any reason you should indulge in impatient and useless complainings over what other people may say and do? Jesus says, "In your patience possess ye your souls." And has he not given us a most touching example of patience and endurance, under circumstances peculiarly trying and afflictive? At one time we see him weary and faint from long fasting in the wilderness, yet no murmur escapes his lips, and with a cheerful voice we hear him replying to the specious words of the subtle enemy, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Again, when forsaken by his loved disciples, reviled and persecuted by his enemies, and about to suffer an ignominious death on the cross, he meekly bears it all, and from the depths of his loving heart exclaims, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." The beloved Paul is another example of long-suffering and patience, and in his epistle to his Hebrew brethren we hear him exhorting them to be patient toward all men, "For," said he, "ye have need of patience, that after having done the will of God, ye might receive the promise."

It is true, the Christian's life is one of continued warfare, fightings without and within, and the apostle James in alluding to this matter uses the following language: "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations, knowing this, that the trial of your faith worketh patience; but let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing." Again, we are exhorted to run with patience the race set before us, ever looking unto Jesus who is the author and finisher of our faith. Dear reader, are you sometimes weary of life's cares and toils, its sin and sorrow, pain and death, and from the fullness of your heart are led to exclaim, almost impatiently, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly, and put an end to all things"? If so, let me entreat you to heed the admonition of the inspired writer, "Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and the latter rain." "Be ye also patient; establish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh."—Woman and her Work.

Pray Short and to the Point.

"My friends," said Eld. Knapp, "pray short and to the point. Ask for what you feel you must have, and then stop. Remember that God knows all, and needs not your long prayers for information.

"All the Bible specimens are short. Our Lord's prayer, one of the longest, can be uttered well in a minute. Most of these are one wish, in a single breath. Blind Bartimeus begging by the wayside near Jericho, cried out, 'Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me.' The poor publican smote on his breast, and said, 'God be merciful to me, a sinner!' Ten lepers all at once lifted up their voices, and said, 'Jesus, Master, have mercy on us.'

"Such are a few of the short prayers in the New Testament.

"Would a long, prosy prayer, think you, have availed Peter, sinking in the sea? Oh! no. Peter was in earnest, and prayed in three words, 'Lord, save me!' Why, I verily believe that if Peter had prayed as long as some of you, he would have been fifty feet under water before he got help. From the days of the ancient Pharisees to their likes in the present, long, cold, formal prayers have been an abomination unto God."—Sel.

Pull at the Oar.

THE servants of Jesus are like rowers in a boat. They sit with their backs to the bow, and cannot see what lies ahead. But the helmsman at the stern is on the look-out, and he steers the boat whithersoever he will. So in our godly undertakings we sit with our backs to the future. It is all unknown, untried, impenetrable. We know not what the morrow may bring forth. But it is our business to pull at the oar of prayer and earnest labor. There is a divine Helmsman who sees the future, and who holds the rudder in his hand. We have only to commit our ways to him, and to pull at the oar of duty. This is trust. This is faith. This is the way that Paul pulled his boat toward Rome, not knowing or caring what stripes and imprisonments, or what triumphs of the gospel, were awaiting him there. What a blessed thing it is that we cannot foresee the future. We might be so paralyzed by the perils, or difficulties, or the sufferings before us, that we would drop our oars in despair. Every true Christian toiler is continually "saved by hope." He pulls at the oar and trusts.—Evangelist.

FOR TATTLERS.—Some folks are prodigiously penitent over other people's sins, and seem to think they have a special call to confess them before the whole world. They would gouge their brother's eyes out rather than leave a single mote in them. At the same time they are singularly blind to their own failings.

THE HARDEST TIME OF ALL.

THERE are days of deepest sorrow
In the season of our life;
There are wild, despairing moments,
There are hours of mortal strife,
There are hours of stony anguish,
When the tears refuse to fall;
But the waiting time, my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

Youth and love are oft impatient,
Seeking things beyond their reach;
And the heart grows sick with hoping,
Ere it learns what life can teach,
For, before the fruit be gathered,
We must see the blossoms fall;
But the waiting time, my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

Loving once, and loving ever,
It is sad to watch for years
For the light whose fitful shining
Makes a rainbow of our tears.
It is sad to count at morning
All the hours to evenfall;
Oh! the waiting time, my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

We can bear the heat of conflict,
Though the sudden crushing blow,
Beating back our gathered forces,
For a moment lay us low.
We may rise again beneath it,
None the weaker for our fall;
But the waiting time, my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

For it wears the eager spirit,
As the salt waves wear the stone,
And Hope's gorgeous garb grows threadbare,
Till its brightest tints are gone.
Then, amid youth's radiant tresses,
Silent snows begin to fall;
Oh! the waiting time, my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

Yet at last we learn the lesson,
That God knoweth what is best,
And a silent resignation
Makes the spirit calm and blest;
For, perchance, a day is coming,
For the changes of our fate,
When our hearts will thank him meekly
That he taught us how to wait.

The Darkly Lowering Heavens.

As I seat myself before the window, I see a bank of black clouds slowly rising above the rim of the western horizon. As they come up higher, they assume a greenish hue. At short intervals, scuds of fog will dash over them and then disappear. Lightning is continually playing through the dark mass, making appropriate the words of the poet:—

"There, like a trumpet, loud and strong,
Thy thunders shake our coast,
While the red lightnings wave along—
The banners of the host."

The air is oppressive and sultry, and the wind that a few minutes ago was quite fresh has died away save now and then a fitful puff. By all these tokens, I know that the storm will soon burst upon us.

By the inspired word of God, by the signs in the political heavens, by the throes in the earth that portend approaching dissolution, I know that there is another storm, more dreadful and bringing destruction and ruin in its train, that will soon illumine with its lurid lightnings and sweep with its fiery breath the frail and trembling planet on which we live. The earthquakes that cause the crust of the earth to tremble, the tidal waves that sweep thousands into eternity, are but the heralds of that last desolating storm that shall be ushered in with burning and fuel of fire.

As I open my Bible, I read concerning that storm: "For, behold the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble." Mal. 4:1. Isaiah, as his prophetic vision is directed to this scene, exclaims, "The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day. For the day of the Lord of hosts shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up; and he shall be brought low. . . . And they shall go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth."

Daniel testifies, "There shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time." Chap. 12:1. The language of the prophet Joel is pertinent and full of meaning: "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain; let all the inhabitants of the land tremble; for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand; a day of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness, as the morning spread upon the mountains." Chap. 2:1, 2.

Is there a possibility that these prophecies will fail? None. "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." 2 Pet. 1:21. In the same chapter, the apostle tells us how sure it is. He first declares that they were eye-witnesses of the majesty of our Lord Jesus Christ, and he adds in verse 19: "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed." There is an old adage that "seeing is believing;" but this word of prophecy is more sure, more infallible, than eyesight.

In chapter 3:10, he has given a graphic description of the last tempest, the final consummation: "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up."

As I turn away from these evidences of the coming storm, my soul repeats the words of the prophet Joel: "The day of the Lord is great and very terrible, and who can abide it?" In seeming answer to this question, my eyes fall on the 31st verse of Acts 16, where the condition of salvation and refuge is to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. But how can we follow his example? He was without sin; while our sins are like scarlet. Without divine assistance, we must perish. Like a strain of rich, sweet music come these words of inspiration to us, floating down through the ages, yet losing none of their life-giving tenderness: "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Heb. 13:5. And the apostle, to confirm the wavering and strengthen the weak, adds, "Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." Heb. 7:25. Daniel, speaking of the time of trouble, adds, "At that time thy people shall be delivered." Blessed Jesus, Saviour of thy people! "Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." And, although unbelief lift her head in defiance of Heaven and to ridicule the God-fearing, still in him, and in him only, will we trust. Then when the desolating tempest of the wrath of God makes a speedy riddance of them that dwell in the land, we shall be hidden in that shelter where no fire, tempest, or flood, can reach us.

It is a matter of certainty that the world that now is, is reserved unto fire. The next question is, When shall these things be? Are we to look for them? or will some age far in the future witness these terrible scenes? This question we propose to answer, first from prophecy, secondly from nature, and lastly from the testimony of learned men on this subject.

The first prophecy that throws light on this subject is found in Dan. 2, where four kingdoms are represented as arising, bearing rule for a season, and then passing away or being merged into the succeeding kingdom.

These kingdoms are respectively, Babylon, Medo-Persia, Grecia, and Rome. At the close of the fourth kingdom, the Lord will come, and all earthly kingdoms will be broken, destroyed, and swept away as chaff. The first three kingdoms are matters of history, and Rome, the fourth and last, has crumbled until her civil power is gone; and in the ecumenical council even her ecclesiastical power is questioned. What next? Manifestly the destroying of the earth and burning of the works that are therein when our Lord shall inaugurate a kingdom of peace and righteousness that shall endure forever.

In Dan. 7, the same powers are brought to view under different figures, and the Judgment is introduced in close connection with the downfall of the divisions of the fourth power. Verse 11, speaking of the duration of the Roman power, adds, "I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." In the light of these prophecies, where are we? Just before the burning day of God, and where we may expect the scenes of eternity soon to become a thrilling reality.

We might refer to Nahum's chariots running like the lightning over our iron roads as evidence that we are living in the day of God's preparation. Daniel prophesies that in the last days knowledge shall be increased. Would that we could notice some of the results obtained from scientific research; but space forbids. Wind and water, fire, steam, and electricity, are all made subservient to the will of man, and to increase his pleasure and profit. In scriptural knowledge our progress is no less marked. The prophecies, which to our fathers were a sealed book, are opened to us as it was foretold they should be in the time of the end. In all these prophecies, there is perfect agreement, and they say to us that the end of all things is at hand.

Paul says that "in the last days perilous times shall come." In 2 Tim. 3:1-5, he enumerates a long catalogue of sins that should be found in the church. As we look over the religious world, we are forced to confess that he has described our times. We might bring more proof on this point; but brevity is our motto, and we pass to another division of our subject, remarking as we leave this that the warning, "Prepare to meet thy God," is peculiarly applicable to us, standing, as we are, almost within the sound of the coming storm, and seeing around us the gloom of the lowering heavens.

Next in order we shall present evidence drawn from nature.

"In the sun, the moon, the stars,
Signs and wonders there shall be;
Earth shall quake with inward wars,
Nations, with perplexity."

On this division of our subject, we are at a loss where to begin, not from the absence of testimony, but from the great amount which the narrowness of our limits forces us to exclude. Every one who carefully examines the earth must be struck with the increasing number and violence of earthquakes. All confess that the interior of the earth is in a state of fusion, a molten sea of fire. Earthquakes are caused by some internal commotion whereby the crust, or surface, of the earth is shaken. Noted geologists compute the crust, or surface, to vary from twenty to thirty miles in thickness. How can we expect things to remain as they are while this crust is shaking and trembling from internal fires.

We are humbled as we think of the destroying agencies held in check by the power of Omnipotence, and our hearts exclaim, "What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou visitest him?" With gratitude and love we acknowledge the mercy and long-suffering of that almighty Power at whose word our earth goes plunging through space at the fearful speed of nearly nineteen miles a second.

We referred to the increasing number of earthquakes. It is estimated by historians that 7000 earthquakes occurred up to the year 1850. But within the last fifty years, 3240 have occurred. What are these but omens of approaching dissolution, heralds of the storm that is to be ushered in with burning and fuel of fire? We might refer to the earthquakes that within the last five years have rocked the greater part of Africa, nearly all of South America, and to many shocks which have been felt in our own country, and later still, the earthquake in China hurrying multitudes into eternity. They have become so common that it is conjectured that some portion of the earth's surface is continually oscillating.

In view of these convulsions of mother earth, bespeaking approaching dissolution, we cannot better express the language of our hearts than by quoting an extract from the pen of Bro. D. T. Taylor: "We insist that with such utterances and facts blazoned forth at noonday, we, who have made the prophetic word our careful study for a period of a quarter of a century and see the light that is now shining, shall not stay for the dreamy indifference of a sleeping church, nor be hindered by a mocking world, but send out with affectionate solemnity a world-wide voice of entreaty and warning, and cry, 'The Judge is at the door, prepare to meet him.'"

The increase of storms is no less startling. For the last ten years, the reports of our secular journals have been one continual record of storm, shipwreck, and disaster. Shall we refer to the terrible storm in India that ten years ago destroyed sixty thousand inhabitants? In the same country six years later, thirty thousand more were destroyed by the same agency. In Laynan the same year, ten thousand were destroyed by inundation. The South American coast has suffered terribly as the thousands of the slain testify. We will not sadden the minds of our readers by mentioning further the multitudes that storm and tempest have swept away from among the living. Sufficient it is that these things are so.

To the observing, the question will arise, Whither are we tending? Shall we in the light of this testimony swell the ranks of those who cry, against reason and revelation, All things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation? The Lord forbid. Let us watch and be sober.

We might also speak of volcanoes and tidal waves. They help to swell the great number of victims that earth and sea shall give up when is heard the voice of the archangel and the trump of God.

On May 19, 1780, there was a dark day, terrific and supernatural. On the night succeeding, the moon was totally obscured. Eclipse was impossible, as the moon had full the day before. On the night of Nov. 13, 1833, there was a dense shower of falling stars, or meteors. These phenomena in the heavens were a source of fear to some and of wonderment to all. Astronomers frankly confess their inability to account for it. By consulting the word of God, we may obtain a solution of these mysteries; Matt. 24:29: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days [the papal tribulation ending about the year 1700] shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven." These are enumerated by our Saviour as signs of his coming, and of the end of the world. Verse 3. He continues in verse 33: "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it [margin, he] is near, even at the door." Here we have the explanation. These wonders in the heavens are outriders telling that the day of the Lord is at hand.

What shall we say of the aurora borealis that "nightly waves its flaming banners in our northern sky"? Two centuries ago, it was unknown. We are told that it is not in our atmosphere, but that the ether just outside is heated to a white heat. This does not set our minds at rest; for, if this be true, why does it heat more now than formerly? Is it not because the element of hydrogen is becoming exhausted in the air, that its friction should heat more than formerly?

But enough of conjecture. We are satisfied to consider all the signs we have mentioned as a fulfillment of the prophecy of Joel 2:30, 31: "And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come."

We might dwell at great length upon this subject without exhausting it; but it would go beyond the design of this article to say more. We leave it with a feeling of regret at the thought of leaving so much unsaid. Do you ask more evidence? Read it on the scroll above your head, read it on the earth beneath your feet, hear the thousand voices of nature that tell of an approaching crisis, read it in the inspired volume; and then, if you have ever doubted, ask pardon of God for your unbelief.

In closing, we shall introduce the testimony of some learned men:—

Sir Charles Lyell says: "The wonder is, not that the earth will be dissolved, but that it exists for a single moment."

Dr. Hitchcock, of Amherst, says: "In a very short time, far shorter than we imagine, all the scenes of futurity will be to us a thrilling reality."

Dr. Baird, in Rochester, remarked that no well-informed man can look upon the world as it is without coming to the conclusion that some great consummation is about to take place.

Professor George Bush says: "If we take the ground of right reason, we must believe that the present age is one expressly foretold in prophecy, and that it is just opening upon the crowning consummation of all prophetic declarations."

Rev. Hollis Read, author of "God in History," says: "We live in a very remarkable period of the world's history. A very general impression obtains in all reflecting minds that we are on the confines of another of those signal crises which mark the history of our race. The signs of the times are strangely significant. There is a feeling in the human breast that despotism, bloodshed and oppression, and unbridled lust, have, in defiance of Heaven, rioted long enough, and that a righteous God will soon rise in his wrath and make a short work. This prophetic yearning for deliverance—this instinctive prophecy of the human heart—is not peculiar to the Christian. The Hindoo, the Mohammedan, the Papist, feel it. The world waits the coming change."

Dr. Geo. B. Cheever writes: "It is impossible to look upon a more sublime spectacle than that which rises to the mind of the spiritual observer at the present crisis. . . . The trains laid with divine wisdom are fast completing."

We might adduce testimony from hundreds of others, but it is unnecessary. And now, dear reader, let me ask, with affectionate solicitude, Is your name written in the Lamb's book of life? If not, strive for the life that is eternal. Obey God, seek an interest in Christ. So shall you be safe amid the perils of the last days, safe from the coming storm, forever safe in the kingdom of God. L. D. SANTEE.

The Sea of Galilee.

It was with no common thrill of feeling that I first saw the blue waters of the Sea of Galilee (or of Tiberias, as now called), having a short time before had Mt. Tabor pointed out on the southern horizon. We had followed the Jordan from Lake Huleh a few miles, down to the bridge Jisz Benat Yakub, and had then struck into the hills on its west, to an old khan called Jubb Yusef, in approaching which we had our first view of that beautiful sheet of water around which the ministry of our Lord was principally exercised. It lay at a distance of six miles, in a deep basin, surrounded on all sides by mountains, which rise from 1,500 to 2,000 feet above it. It is about 600 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, and the same below Lake Huleh, being in that vast gorge extending from Hermon to a point south of the Dead Sea, which has been rent in the earth by volcanic forces, by the reason of which the Jordan alone of all earth's rivers has its course below the sea-level. From the clearness of the atmosphere it appeared quite small and is actually only thirteen miles long and six wide. But the interest of the Saviour's life centers here. Upon its waters and along its shores were his wondrous discourses spoken and his mighty deeds wrought.

In order to strike the Sea at Tell Hum, we quit the road at Khan Jubb Yusef, and rode across the pathless hills in a southeasterly direction, over the rocks and through thistles, for nearly two hours, picking our way with much difficulty, until we reached a rise of ground upon the border of the lake. A warm dispute has existed for some years among geographers of the Holy Land whether Tell Hum is the site of Chorazin or of Capernaum. I shall not enter into it; but the fact of the dispute adds to the evidence of the complete ruin to which Christ doomed these unbelieving cities. There was at Capernaum a splendid marble synagogue, and it is certain that the ruins of precisely such an edifice have been found at Tell Hum. Fragments lay here and there, and were occasionally seen by travelers, who, by the aid of two or three Arabs with clubs, could work through a thicket of thorns and thistles six or eight feet high, in the spring of the year. But last winter, Capt. Wilson, of the English Exploring Committee, excavated quite a place amid the ruins, though by no means as largely or completely as I had supposed from previous report. The building was of white limestone and marble, and the lower portions or foundations have been partly uncovered, while among them lie fragments of columns, the bases being often still in place, and very beautiful Corinthian capitals, with other elaborate sculptures, exceeding in richness and delicacy any other remains in Palestine. On a large cornerstone I observed a carved representation of the front of a temple or synagogue (perhaps a model of that very building) about fifteen inches long by eight high. There were also curious double or twin columns, with capitals and bases all cut from one rock. Explorations are soon to be resumed at this place, and will no doubt bring out interesting results.

Here we took to the shore, and followed it for three hours, till we reached Tiberias, enjoying a most charming and exciting ride through the obscure ruins and now ignoble sites of Bathsaida, Capernaum, at Ain et-Tin (if Tell Hum be not the place), and Magdala, and across the small but fertile plains, three miles in width, near the northwest corner of the lake, which was the ancient "land of Gennesareth," and gave one of its three names to the body of water.

Here we rode over a smooth, hard beach abounding in shells, and free from the stones elsewhere prevailing; just the place for fisher-men to draw their nets to shore, and probably the very spot where the disciples carried on their business, and where the miraculous draught of fishes occurred.

And could it be that along this deserted coast there were once numerous cities, that this lonely sheet of water was once alive with vessels, and that here Jesus called his apostles and taught the thronging thousands? Surely, no contrast could be more striking than of the past and the present. Our tents were on the shore, a few rods outside of the petty and dirty modern city of Tiberias, on the south, where the ruins of the ancient city begin and stretch along a narrow plain, a third of a mile in width, between the mountain and the sea, for the space of a mile or more, to the natural warm baths.

These baths, the water of which issues in springs from the earth as hot as the hand can bear, and with a brackish and sulphurous taste, taken with the black basaltic rock of the coast, like the slag of a furnace, bear testimony to the volcanic character of the locality, as do also the fearful earthquakes which from time to time convulse the region. The ancient ruins betoken a city of size and splendor, as sixteen large columns lie prostrate by the foundations of one edifice.

The Jews' cemetery is contiguous, and the stones with the memorial inscriptions in Hebrew, were almost without exception fragments of marble plucked from the ruins and then inscribed. The steep mountain-side above the ruins exhibited several caves, with traces of ancient paths, which were perhaps used as tombs. The quietness and solitude of the place may be judged of by the fact that the wild ducks swam unconcernedly to and fro in front of our tents, and hardly thought it worth while to dive when I threw stones at them. We enjoyed a luxurious bath in the cool waters of the lake, complaining only of the stony bottom. The lake abounds in crabs, that differ from their salt-water brethren in being amphibious, for they issue from the lake, wander over the land, and hide under the stones. They even march boldly into my tent. At first I took them to be a land species; but, on catching one and putting him into the water, he proved to my astonishment to be perfectly at home there.

On Monday, we crowned our visit by a boat excursion. What could be more interesting than to follow the course of our Lord and his disciples, and to cross the Sea of Galilee in a fisher's boat? for such was the little vessel in which we embarked, with our Arab fishermen to navigate. There are now six or eight similar boats on the lake, rude affairs, with the merest apology for a sail; a few years since, and not a boat moved upon the water. Fish are abundant, yet are not taken in long nets, but with a small hand-net, with which on his arm the fisher walks stealthily along the shore, or in the water, till he spies a fish, and then suddenly throws the net over it.

The coast opposite Tiberias appeared high, owing to its height and the clearness of the air; but, as there was no wind, it required two hours to row our vessel across to it. I had a special object in crossing, beyond the boat-ride and the fine view obtained of the entire sea. The whole eastern side is dangerous to be visited on horseback without an armed escort, as the Bedouin plunderers are in all that region. But a boat may cross, and touch here and there on the shore, with less risk. Directly opposite Tiberias, the coast widens into a plain nearly a mile wide, upon which opens the Wady (or valley) Fik. In the middle of the opening rises a high, steep, hill, access to which is at its east end by a low, narrow neck, which joins it to the mountain on the south. On the summit are the ruins of the city of Gamala, famous in the days of Josephus, who himself commanded there at one time, and which cost the Romans under Vespasian great effort to take. After the capture, they massacred 4,000 of the brave defenders, while 5,000 others cast themselves from the walls upon the rocks, below and thus miserably perished.

Notwithstanding the fears of our dragoon, I was determined to push inland and visit these ruins. So, taking him and one of the Arab fishermen, I crossed the plain and ascended the steep side of the hill in front of us, without much difficulty beyond a little weariness of muscle and expenditure of breath. On the top were extensive ruins, showing the existence of a large plan, with traces of walls and fortifications that must have made it almost impregnable, raised as they were on the precipitous hillsides. I went down into a reservoir, still in tolerable condition, arched over, and about 60 feet long by 30 broad and 30 deep. There was a noble view from the summit, of the sea and the opposite coast. No Bedouins made their appearance, though we took the trip leisurely and descended by the isthmus and the valley on the south to the plain and the boat.

During my absence, a scowling, surly-looking party of Arabs came down to the shore by the boat (from which we had landed by being carried a few yards through the water), and my companion and his wife thought it wise to retreat on board again, where I rejoined them. One of our boatmen, meanwhile, had been off with his net, and returned with several good-sized fishes. The wind rose a little, the waves roughened, the lady became ill, and we knew not but we should have experience of a scriptural storm on this memorable lake. But we reached Tiberias again in safety after another tedious row.

As it was but half past three o'clock, and we were to leave for Nazareth in the morning, I mounted a horse and rode to the south end of the sea, to examine the Jordan at its issue. The road was all the way by the waterside, and, but for the utter silence and desolation, most charming. In a mile and a half were the hot springs before mentioned, over two of which are buildings, to which the people resort for a bath. A mile beyond were nameless ruins, not anywhere described, so far as I am aware; and a mile or more still beyond were the ruins of ancient Tarichaea, now called Kerak, just at the southwest corner of the sea. Ten minutes' further ride brought me to the point where the Jordan issues from the Sea of Galilee, and hurries on its tortuous, downward course to the Dead Sea, in the great chasm 1,300 feet below the Mediterranean; in reaching which it descends 700 feet, and cuts out a winding channel of 150 miles, full of rapids, though the direct distance is not more than sixty miles. The banks at the opening are rather high and rounded, with the remains apparently of an old bridge, or of the approaches to one. The stream, to my surprise, was narrower than where it flows from lake Huleh, and less deep also, being only forty feet wide and four and a half deep just below the remains of the bridge. To make sure of my calculation, I undressed and took a bath, and, wading across, found the water to rise only to my shoulders. A fine valley seemed to accompany it southward, which under any rule but the Turkish would be a garden, but is now given over to be a wilderness.

A smart trot of an hour brought me back to the tents, by the light of the moon silencing the waves of the "Lake of Gennesareth." A fisher's boat passed me, bound down the lake, for a night's fishing, and brought to mind similar expeditions of the apostles, when sometimes "they toiled all night and caught nothing." And thus, with many sad and impressive reflections, as I looked in that still hour over the water and upon the deserted shores, I concluded the last day of my visit to the Sea of Galilee. The next morning, with many a fond and regretful look backward, I ascended the mountain, crossed the summit, and, except a glimpse of the northeast corner from Tabor, lost sight of the precious lake forever.—W. Day of the Lord.

ITS CHARACTER.

"A DAY of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness, as the morning spread upon the mountains." Joel 2:2. See also Eze. 30:3; Isa. 13:9; 2:11-21; Amos 5:18, 20; Zeph. 1:14-18. A "day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men;" 1 Pet. 3:7; Acts 17:31; Mal. 4:1; Ps. 92:7; Jude 14, 15; 2 Thess. 1:7-10; and of reward to the people of God. Rev. 11:18.

ITS APPROACH.

To the world, as a thief in the night. 2 Pet. 3:10; 1 Thess. 5:2, 3; Rev. 3:3; 16:15. To the people of God, it is heralded by certain unmistakable signs: 1 Thess. 5:45; Darkening of the sun and moon, A. D. 1780; falling of the stars, 1833, &c.; Matt. 24:29, 32, 33; Isa. 13:10; Joel 2:31; 3:15; Rev. 6:13; railroad cars. Nah. 2:3-5; riotous living, Matt. 24:37-39; Luke 17:28; Jude 7, 8; decrease in morality and faith, 2 Tim. 3:1-9; Luke 18:8; anger of the nations, Rev. 11:18.

It will be introduced by the setting up of the fifth universal kingdom, at the conclusion of Christ's ministration in the sanctuary, and the pouring out of the seven last plagues. Dan. 7:14, 27; 3:44; Rev. 16.

ITS DURATION.

More than one thousand years. 2 Pet. 3:7, 8; Rev. 20:4. During the thousand years, Christ and the saints sit in judgment upon the wicked. Dan. 7:22; 1 Cor. 6:2, 3; 15:24, 25; Rev. 20:4.

The resurrection of the saints is to take place at the beginning of this period, and that of the wicked at the end. Rev. 20:4, 5. The intermediate state of the earth is one of desolation. Isa. 24:1-6; Jer. 4:23-28. During this time, Satan is to be bound. Rev. 20:2. The day is to close with the burning of the earth, the melting of the elements (air and water), and the destruction of the wicked. 2 Pet. 3:7-10; Mal. 4:1.

That the melting of the elements is possible, science fully attests. Water is composed of eighty parts of hydrogen, and twenty parts of oxygen gas. The first part is exceedingly combustible, and the last is an excellent supporter of combustion. When combined and ignited, they detonate with great violence. If a bladder be filled with hydrogen gas, and, by compression, the gas is made to pass through the stem of an attached tobacco pipe dipped into a basin of suds in the usual way of making soap bubbles, it will form bubbles that will quickly ascend like diminutive balloons. If a lighted match or candle be applied to these bubbles, they will explode with a noise as loud as a pistol, and more stunning. If a pail of water, with a few drops adhering to its outer surface, be set upon a hot stove, hydrogen gas will be evolved, and loud explosions re-great glory and all the attending events mentioned, was an event near, and that it had its fulfillment in those remarkable manifestations of divine Providence which stood connected with the overthrow of Judaism and the establishing of Christianity? For the coming of the Son of man stands connected with events that could only have reference to the end of that dispensation and the introduction of another.

This view is still further confirmed by verse 42 and onward. "Watch, therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. . . . Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." Now what could be the meaning of such solemn warnings to the disciples, if Christ did not intend to impress them with the fact that his coming was near at hand, and that they were to be looking and watching for it, as the good man of the house, verse 43, would watch, expecting the thief might come at any moment?

The coming of the Son of man, then, as taught in this chapter, was an event that was immediately to take place; an event even then at their doors; one that would transpire before many that were standing there should taste of death, before the apostles had finished the circuit through the cities of Israel; and we believe that no other interpretation of this chapter respecting the coming of the Son of man can exonerate its teachings from deception. Nor am I aware that any commentator differs from the above view, although some of them suppose that that may underlie a remote reference to the day of Judgment. Yet all agree that the coming of the Son of man was an event immediately about to transpire, and the end of the world was the end of the Jewish dispensation.

Nor was the subject of the end of the world, that is, of this earth, referred to either in the questions asked by the disciples in verse 3, nor in the explanatory answers given by Christ; and to make the 24th chapter of Matthew teach the personal return of Christ to this world as an event now in the future, near or remote, is an exegetical torture which only a pet theory would inflict. For it is neither in the letter nor in the spirit of anything there recorded.

I wish to remark here that the course I have marked out in these series of articles, will not allow me to any lengthy notice of my reviewer's remarks appended to my articles; therefore I trust no one will infer that I do not appreciate and ponder them. To review my reviewer would be to occupy more of the columns of his paper than I am entitled to. Yet perhaps I may occasionally refer to some few things. In No. 4, July 30, my reviewer asks, "And when did the apostles shine forth in the kingdom of their Father?" and says, "All but one of them are said to have suffered a violent death." "What! shining forth in the kingdom of their Father, and sitting on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, and yet all of them most miserable?"

I apprehend that my reviewer misapprehends the true import of "shining forth" in the kingdom of God. To shine forth in the kingdoms of this world may require one to be rich, to be held in high repute among men, to occupy positions of worldly ambition, to be called of men, Rabbi, to inherit large earthly possessions, to enjoy worldly prosperity, to be well spoken of by all men.

That is the way the men of the world shine forth. But Christ's kingdom is not so. In the kingdom of their Father, the apostles were to shine forth, and thus outshine the world in meekness, patience, humility, suffering, rejoicing in tribulation, in death. Thus did the apostles "shine forth in the kingdom of their Father," and their light has encircled the earth, and has come down to us, and they are now elevated to thrones in the estimation and in the hearts of the true Israel of God.

In the same paragraph, my reviewer thinks me mistaken respecting the parable of the wheat and tares, "by my making the aión, age, refer to the Jewish age instead of the Christian, because" he says, "at the end of the Jewish age, we find no gathering of the tares, the wicked, into bundles to burn, no furnace of fire into which they were cast, and no weeping and wailing, except by the disciples of Christ, who were subjects of persecution and cruelty on every hand. The destruction of Jerusalem cannot be taken as a fulfillment; for that did not take place till some forty years after that age had ended." (The italics are mine—the quotation from my reviewer).

I remark, my reviewer says, the destruction of Jerusalem did not take place till some forty years after that age—the Jewish, had ended. My reviewer says he is happy to agree with me as respects the meaning of the words, hosmos and aión, and that aión means age instead of world; but he thinks the age referred to is the end of the Christian rather than the Jewish age or dispensation.

The end of the world, then, is the end of an age or dispensation. This my reviewer admits. The end of the world then, as mentioned in Matt. 13: 40, and 24: 3, is not the end of this mundane system as the Advents have mentioned. This is just as I have all along maintained. Having thus by agreement settled the meaning of the word aión to be age, and not this physical earth, let us see if we can ascertain to which of the ages, the Jewish or Christian, the word refers to in the parable of the wheat and tares. See Matt. 13: 40, 49.

The main thought running through the whole of the 13th chapter of Matthew to verse 53, relates to the kingdom of God which Christ was then founding. This is evident from expressions like the following. Verse 11: "Because it is given unto you [the disciples] to know the mysteries of the kingdom of Heaven." Verse 24: "The kingdom of Heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field." Verse 31: "The kingdom of Heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed." Verse 33: "The kingdom of Heaven is like unto leaven." Verse 45: "The kingdom of Heaven is like unto a treasure hid in the field." Verse 45: "The kingdom of Heaven is like unto a merchantman." Verse 47: "The kingdom of Heaven is like unto a net."

In a former article, I have shown that this kingdom was founded by Christ during his earth life. The various parables in this chapter all refer to those principles by which this kingdom was to be governed. In Matt. 21: 33-45, is given the parable of the householder who planted a vineyard and let it out, and came to receive his rents; but was maltreated and finally slain. In applying this parable, Jesus asks what should be done with those husbandmen. They, the chief priests, said in reply, that those wicked men should be destroyed, and the vineyard given to those who would render unto the owner the fruits in their season. Jesus asked them if they had read concerning the stone which the builders rejected, but which had become the head of the corner; and then added: "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you [the Jewish nation] and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

Here we are explicitly told that the kingdom of God, once given to the Jews, was now to be transferred to the Gentiles. It was from this kingdom thus transferred that the angels, the apostles, and others, were to gather out the tares, the hypocrites, and other wicked ones, and to cast them into furnaces of fire, not literal, smelting furnaces of literal fire, but into such a condition of shame, disgrace, and painful sensibility of the displeasure of God, as might be aptly represented by such a figure. And it was during this ejection of the Jewish nation, that the righteous were to shine forth in the kingdom of their Father.

Fire is frequently used by Christ and his apostles as a symbol of truth, of love, of the Holy Spirit, of a moral purifying element, of suffering, of error, of the divine presence of God himself. But I think it is never used by Christ in a literal sense, as referring to the punishment of the wicked, or the burning of this earth. The end of the world, or age referred to in the 13th of Matthew, was the end of the Jewish dispensation, when the kingdom of God was taken from the nation and given to the Gentiles, at which time, or during the succeeding age, or Christian dispensation, the tares were to be gathered out of the church, the true church composed only of righteous ones, who, by their holy lives and patient sufferings, were to shine forth in this kingdom of their Father.

In another paragraph, my reviewer says, "In one instance, Heb. 9: 20, the expression, 'End of the world' [aión, age], undoubtedly refers to the end of the Jewish age; and in another, 1 Cor. 10: 11, ages are spoken of in the plural, referring to ages which preceded the gospel dispensation."

Such, I apprehend, is the import of aión, age, when used by Christ in perhaps every instance where the word occurs. It never refers to the end of this earth, but always to an age, generation, or dispensation.

In the last paragraph of the article referred to, my reviewer calls my attention to the verb that denotes a progressive coming of Christ. I shall notice that verb when I come to the consideration of the coming of the Lord in the epistles, and in my next, shall continue the examination of chapter 24 and 25 and other chapters of Matthew, and also the other gospels, before entering on the epistles.

REMARKS.

If any one really supposes that by the end of the world, Adventists understand the end of this mundane system, or the annihilation of this globe, we are happy, with the issue plainly stated, to have the privilege of correcting that misapprehension. The material of which this earth is composed, is never to be destroyed, if we read the record aright; but, purified and renewed, it is to be re-adorned with more than its Eden beauty, and made the everlasting inheritance of the redeemed. But before this end is reached, the plan of redemption goes through several stages of development; successive dispensations, ages (aiónes) are employed in carrying it forward. And what is called the gospel or Christian age, is no less clearly defined than the Mosaic or Jewish; and the canon of inspiration, to be complete, must inform us respecting the commencement, course, and termination, of the former, as well as the latter.

In view of Bro. G.'s position, we raise the question, Is the gospel dispensation or age ever to end? If so, where is the record of it, and under what circumstances is it to take place? The argument of Bro. G. leaves us to infer that we, in this dispensation, are upon a shoreless ocean, to pass on henceforth, forever, without change, the kingdom of God established, the righteous shining forth therein, the bad gathered out, and burned, and all the promises fulfilled; and that the prophetic declarations uttered by Christ and his apostles, pertained exclusively to the generation in which they lived, and were all accomplished in their history.

We are decidedly averse to the idea that our times are thus left out of consideration. We want to know what pertains to our age, what prophetic fulfillments concern us personally, what is the present truth for our day, and our corresponding duty. And if we thought that the Scripture record all pertained to the past, we would, with the spiritualists, entomb it with the long-buried nations of antiquity to which it pertained, as an obsolete and useless book.

"Lo, I am with you always," said Christ to his disciples, "even unto the end of the world." Must this grand promise, which has comforted and sustained so many laborers for their Lord, from that day to this, be whittled down to the insignificant fraction of time that remained to the close of the Jewish age? "Lo, I am with you always, even to the close of the Jewish age!" And the same violence that is rendered to this text by the view in question is rendered to hundreds of others which we have not time, and it is not necessary, here to mention.

If the principle we have stated in previous articles respecting the use of the present tense for the future in prophetic writing, is correct (and it cannot be overthrown), then all those passages which speak of the end of all things, the coming of the Lord, &c., as near at hand, when the apostles wrote, are fully explained, and we need say no more respecting them here.

And for equally obvious reasons we pass by such an exposition as makes the shining forth of the righteous as the sun in the kingdom of their father, their shining forth among men in the Christian graces, and the tribulations of the Christian life; for a person who has brought his mind into such a condition that it can deliberately adopt and be satisfied with such a view, and believe that the gathering out of God's kingdom, of all things that offend and them which do iniquity, and casting them into a furnace, or lake, of fire, where they are consumed with wailing and gnashing of teeth, is the gathering out, or rather not admitting into, the invisible church, unworthy members, and the overthrow of a nation by the common calamities of war—any person, we say, who has become grounded in such views as these, would not probably be materially influenced by anything that might be written on the subject. What is this more than has been experienced in almost every age by almost every nation under heaven? And if such terrific denunciations of wrath can be thus explained away, what other threatenings cannot be disposed of in the same way? Why cannot the damnation of hell, and the fire of the great day, which shall constitute the perdition of ungodly men, 2 Pet. 3: 7, be made to mean something in the natural order of events, and not anything so terrible after all? Is it any wonder that in the hands of such a theology the denunciations of the Scriptures fall dead upon unregenerate ears, and the invitations of the gospel are met with ridicule and scorn?

The Lord was to come in the same manner that the disciples had seen him go into heaven; Acts 1: 11; he was to come to take his disciples to himself, that they might be where he was; John 14: 3; John, in A. D. 96, twenty-six years after the destruction of Jerusalem, saw the event as one still future; and Paul to the Thessalonians (2 Thess. 2: 1-4) stated that the great papal apostasy would run its long career, before the coming of the Lord, and the gathering of the saints unto him. Perhaps these sacred writers in referring to the same event, and placing it far in the future beyond the destruction of Jerusalem, tortured the teaching of their Lord, but on present evidence, we must decline to believe it.

CHRIST'S INVITATION.

COME unto me, ye who are tired and sad;
Come unto me, that I may give you rest:
Come unto me, and I will make you glad;
Come and be blest.

Come, ye who struggle in a life of shame;
Come, ye whose sin God only will forgive;
Come! for I have for you a new, white name;
Arise and live.

Come, ye who see not, through the misty night,
The stars that out of God's own windows shine
Come unto me, and I will give you light,
Human, divine.

My heart is yearning with a strong desire
To fold the world in tender, close embrace:
Come to me through the sanctifying fire,
That hides my face.

How the World Judges Christians.

THERE are persons who judge of Christians as a man would judge of apples who should enter an orchard and go stooping along upon the ground in search of them. He picks up one, a hard, green thing, no bigger than a walnut. He bites it; it is sour and bitter; it puckers up his mouth, and sets his teeth on edge. "Ha?" he says, throwing the untimely fruit away, "I hear them speak of apples as being so delicious—I'm sure I don't think much of this one." He picks up another, which looks yellow. There's a hole in it, but he don't know what that means; so he bites into it, and finds a worm. "Bah! apples delicious, indeed!" he cries in disgust; and then he picks up a third, which is crushed by his touch, for it is rotten. So he condemns apples, because he has looked for them upon the ground instead of on the trees above his head, where they hang ripe and juicy. Just so, men judge of Christians by the rotten ones on the ground.—H. W. Beecher.

Singing Down Anger.

I REMEMBER a remarkable instance which occurred in my father's lecture-room during one of those sweet scenes which preceded the separation of the Presbyterian church into the Old and New Schools. At that time controversy ran high, and there were fire and zeal and wrath mingled with discussion; and whoever sat in the chair, the devil presided. On the occasion to which I refer, an old Scotchman, six feet high, much bent with age, with blue eyes, large features, very pale and white all over his face, and bald-headed, walked up and down the back part of the room; and as the dispute grew furious, he (and only he could have done it) would stop and call out, "Mr. Maudera-a-tor, let us sing 'Salva-a-tion!'" and the men who were in angry debate were cut short; but one by one they joined in, and before they had sung the hymn through they were all calm and quiet. When they resumed the controversy, it was on a much lower key. So this good old man walked up and down, and threw a hymn into the quarrel every few moments, and kept the religious antagonists from absolute explosion and fighting. It is the nature of hymns to quell irascible feeling. I do not think that a man who was mad could sing six verses through without regaining his temper before he got to the end.—Beecher.

I SHALL rise and converse with you again. All must be restored. God will create new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. There all will be pure rapture and joy. Those heavens and that earth will be no dry, barren sand. When a man is happy, a tree, a flower can give him gladness. Heaven and earth will be renewed, and we who believe shall be everywhere at home. Here it is not so; we are driven hither and thither, that we may have to sigh for that heavenly fatherland.

When Christ causes the trumpet to peal at the last day, all will come forth like the insects which in winter lie as dead, but when the sun comes, awake to life again; or as the birds who lie all the winter, hidden in the clefts of the rocks, or in hollow banks by the riverside, yet live again in the spring.—Luther.

Advice to Students.

THE following letter from a father to his son in college contains good instruction for all:—

MY DEAR SON: Your letters breathe a true spirit of frankness; they have given myself and your mother great pleasure. You must study to be frank with the world. Frankness is the child of honesty and courage. Say just what you mean to do on every occasion, and take it for granted you mean to do right. If a friend asks a favor, you should grant it if it is reasonable; if not, tell him plainly why you cannot; you will wrong him and wrong yourself by equivocation of any kind. Never do a wrong thing to make a friend or keep one; the man who requires you to do so is dearly purchased at a sacrifice. Deal kindly, but firmly, with all your class mates, you will find it the policy which wears best. Above all, do not appear to others what you are not.

If you have any fault to find with any one, tell him, not others, of what you complain; there is no more dangerous experiment than that of undertaking to be one thing before a man's face and another behind his back. We should live, act, and say nothing to the injury of any one. It is not only best as a matter of principle, but it is the path to peace and honor. In regard to duty, let me, in conclusion of this hasty letter, inform you that nearly a hundred years ago there was a day of remarkable gloom and darkness—still known as the dark day—a day when the light of the sun was slowly extinguished, as if by an eclipse. The Legislature of Connecticut was in session, and as its members saw the unexpected and unaccountable darkness coming on, they shared in the general awe and terror. It was supposed by many that the last day—the day of Judgment—had come. Some one, in the consternation of the hour, moved an adjournment. Then there arose an old Puritan legislator, Davenport, of Stamford, and said, that if the last day had come, he desired to be found at his place, doing his duty; and, therefore, moved that candles be brought in so that the house could proceed with its duty. There was quietness in that man's mind, the quietness of heavenly wisdom and inflexible willingness to obey present duty.

Duty, then, is the sublimest word in our language. Do your duty in all things like the old Puritan. You cannot do more, you should never wish to do less. Never let me and your mother wear one gray hair for any lack of duty on your part.

Your affectionate father.

Home Reading.

ONE of the noblest and most pleasant duties of the head of the family is to furnish its members with good reading. In times which are past, it was considered enough to clothe and feed and shelter a family. This was the sum of parental duty. But lately it has been discovered that wives and children have minds, so that it becomes necessary to educate the children and furnish reading for the whole household. It has been found out that the mind wants food as well as the body, and that it wants to be sheltered from the pitiless storms of error and vice by the guarding and friendly roof of intelligence and virtue.

An ignorant family in our day is an antiquated institution. It smells of the musty past. It is a dark spot which the light of the modern sun of intelligence has not reached.

Let good reading go into a home, and the very atmosphere of that home gradually, but surely, changes. The boys begin to grow ambitious, to talk about men, places, books, the past and the future. The girls begin to feel a new life opening before them in knowledge, duty, and love. They see new fields of usefulness and pleasure. And so the family changes, and out from its number will grow intelligent men and women, to fill honorable places, and be useful members of society. Let the torch of intelligence be lit in every household. Let the old and young vie with each other in introducing new and useful topics of investigation, and in cherishing a love of reading, study, and improvement.

Tormented Forever and Ever.

THE only remaining texts to be urged in favor of the eternal torment of the wicked, are two passages which are found in the book of Revelation. The first is Rev. 14:11: "And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever; and they have no rest day nor night who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name."

It is proper first to inquire of whom this is spoken. The question before us relates to the destiny of all the wicked. No text is therefore conclusive on this question, which speaks of only a certain class, or a limited number, of the wicked; for a particular class might for good reasons be set apart to a certain punishment, and that punishment be exceptional in their cases, and not such as awaits the whole race of the guilty. The passage just quoted speaks not of all the wicked, but only of a limited class—the worshipers of the beast and his image. The beast, according to testimony which no Protestant will be disposed to question, means the papal power; Rev. 13:1-10; and the image is to be formed, near the close of the career of that power. Rev. 13:14-18; 14:1-5. The text, therefore embraces only comparatively a small portion of the wicked of the human race. The ancient world, with its teeming millions, and the present heathen world, knowing nothing of this power, are alike exempted from the punishment here brought to view. This text might therefore be set aside as inconclusive, since, even if it should be admitted to prove eternal torture for some, it does not for all.

But we claim that no text affirms eternal torment for a single conscious intelligence all in the universe, and hence undertake to show that this passage does not prove it in reference to even the limited class brought to view. The expression, "The smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever," is the one upon which the doctrine of eternity of suffering is in this case suspended. But the same may be said of this expression that was said last week in reference to the undying worm and the quenchless fire. It was not new in John's day, but was borrowed from the Old Testament, and was one which was well understood at that time.

In Isa. 34:9, 10, the prophet speaking of the land of Idumea says: "And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch. It shall not be quenched night nor day: the smoke thereof shall go up forever: from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it forever and ever." But two applications can be made of this language. Either it refers to the literal land of Edom east and south of Judea, or it is a figure to represent the whole world in the day of final conflagration. In either case it is equally to the point. If the literal land of Idumea is meant, and the language has reference to the desolations which have fallen upon it, then certainly no eternity of duration is implied in the declaration that the smoke thereof shall go up forever. For all the predictions against the land of Idumea have long since been fulfilled, and the judgments have ceased. If it refers to the fires of the last day, when the elements melt with fervent heat, no eternity of duration is even then implied in the expression; for the earth is not to be forever destroyed by the purifying fire of the last day. It is to rise from its ashes, and a new earth come forth purified from all the stains of sin, and free from all the deformity of the curse, to be the everlasting abode of the righteous.

Here is an instance in which the word, forever, apply it in either of the only two ways possible, must denote a limited period. And here the Septuagint uses aion (aion) the same as is used in Rev. 14:11; and from this passage in Isaiah, the language in Revelation was probably borrowed. That the words aion (aion) and aionios (aionios) sometimes denote a limited period and not invariably one of eternal duration, will appear in the examination of the only remaining text that calls for consideration, namely, Rev. 20:10:

"And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night forever and ever."

The same limitation is apparent in this text that was observed in the preceding. It does not refer to all the wicked, but speaks only of the devil, the beast, and the false prophet. The lake of fire, the place and means of their torment, is again mentioned in verse 14; but there it is the symbol of complete and utter destruction. Death and Hades, it says, were cast into the lake of fire, and after this it is said, "There shall be no more death." Rev. 21:4. What, then, is cast into the lake of fire, after it has wrought its work of destruction upon them, no longer exists. This is the plain inference from what is here asserted respecting death. Then follows the testimony of verse 15 that "whosoever was not found written in the book of life, was cast into the lake of fire." And this makes a final disposition of all who are not saved in the kingdom of Heaven.

There is nothing in the way of this application, unless the words "forever and ever" denote absolutely an eternity of duration. These words are translated in the New Testament from aion and aionios, respecting which the following facts may be stated.

Aion is defined by different lexicographers as follows:—

Greenfield: "Duration, finite or infinite, unlimited duration, eternity; a period of duration past or future, time, age, lifetime; the world, universe."

Schrevelius: "An age, a long period of time; indefinite duration; time, whether longer or shorter."

Liddell and Scott: "A space or period of time, especially a lifetime, life, ævum; an age, a generation; long space of time, eternity; in plural, eis tous aionas ton aionon, unto ages of ages, forever and ever, N. T., Gal. 1:5.—3. later, a space of time clearly defined and marked out, an era, age, period of a dispensation: ho aion houtos, this present life, this world."

Parkhurst: "Always being. It denotes duration or continuance of time, but with great variety. I. Both in the singular and the plural it signifies eternity whether past or to come. II. The duration of this world. III. The ages of the world. IV. This present life. V. The world to come. VI. An age, period, or periodical dispensation of divine providences. VII. Aiones seems, in Heb. 11:3, to denote the various revolutions and grand occurrences which have happened to this created system, including also the world itself. Comp. Heb. 1:2, and Macknight on both texts. Aion in the LXX generally answers to the Hebrew holam, which denotes time hidden from man whether indefinite or definite, whether past or future."

Robinson: "Duration, the course or flow of time in various relations as determined by the context, viz. (A) For human life, existence. (B) For time indefinite, a period of the world, the world, in Gr. writers, and also in Sept. and N. Testament. (C) For endless duration, perpetuity, eternity. . . . Sept. mostly for Heb. holam, 'hidden time,' duration, eternity.—Hence in N. T. of long-continued time, indefinite duration, in accordance with Greek usage but modified as to construction and extent by the example of the LXX, and the Rabbinic views."

Schleusner gives as the first meaning of aion, "a definite and long-continued time," i. e., a long-continued but still a definite period of time.

Wahl has arranged the definitions of aion thus: "(1) Time, unlimited duration, ævum. (2) The universe, mundus. (3) An age, period of the world," as the Jewish age, Christian age, &c. This reference to Schleusner and Wahl we find in Stuart on Future Punishment, pp. 91, 93.

Holam, the Hebrew word which corresponds to the Greek aion, is applied according to Gesenius to things which endure for a long time, for an indefinite period. It is applied to the Jewish priesthood, to the Mosaic ordinances, to the possession of the land of Canaan, to the hills and mountains, to the earth, to the time of service to be rendered by a slave, and to some other things of a like nature. Stuart, p. 72.

Cruden in his Unabridged Concordance, under the word eternal, says:—

"The words eternal, everlasting, and forever, are sometimes taken for a long time, and are not always to be understood strictly. Thus, 'Thou shalt be our guide from this time forth even forever,' that is, during our whole life. And in many other places of Scripture, and in particular when the word forever is applied to the Jewish rites and privileges, it commonly signifies no more than during the standing of that commonwealth, until the coming of the Messiah."

Dr. Clarke places in our hands a key to the interpretation of the words "forever" and "forever and ever," which is adapted to every instance of their use. According to his rule they are to be taken to mean as long as a thing, considering the surrounding circumstances, can exist. And he illustrates this in his closing remarks on 2 Kings 5, where, speaking of the curse of the leprosy pronounced upon Gehazi forever, he says:—

"Some have thought, because of the prophet's curse, 'The leprosy of Naaman shall cleave unto thee and to thy seed forever,' that there are persons still alive who are this man's descendants, and afflicted with this horrible disease. Mr. Maundrell, when he was in Judea, made diligent inquiry concerning this, but could not ascertain the truth of the supposition. To me it appears absurd; the denunciation took place in the posterity of Gehazi till it should become extinct; and under the influence of this disorder, this must soon have taken place. The forever implies as long as any of his posterity should remain. This is the import of the word, leolam. It takes in the whole extent or duration of the thing to which it is applied. The forever of Gehazi was till his posterity became extinct."

The word aionios is derived from aion, and its general meaning may be determined from the definitions given above to the latter word.

That these words are frequently applied to the existence of divine beings, and the future happiness of the saints, is true; and that in these cases they denote eternal duration is equally evident; yet, according to the definition of the words and the rule laid down by Dr. Clarke, that eternal duration could not be made out by the use of these words alone. They denote duration or continuance of time, the length of that duration being determined by the nature of the objects to which they are applied. When applied to things which we know from other declarations of the Scriptures, are to have no end, they signify an eternity of being; but when applied to things which are to end, they are correspondingly limited in their meaning. That the existence of God and the future happiness of the righteous are to be absolutely eternal, we are abundantly assured by scriptures which make no use of the words in question. When applied to these they therefore signify a period of duration which is never to end. Just as plainly are we assured that the existence of the wicked is at last to cease in the second death; and when applied to this, the words aion and aionios must be limited accordingly in their signification. Overlooking this plain principle of interpretation, Prof. Stuart, p. 89, comes to this erroneous conclusion respecting these words, because they are applied alike to the sufferings of the lost and the happiness of the saved, that "we must either admit the endless misery of hell, or give up the endless happiness of Heaven." We are under no such necessity. The words aion and aionios, according to Dr. Clarke, cover the whole of the existence of the two classes in their respective spheres, and that only. The one is, after a season of suffering and anguish, to come to an end; the other is to go on in bliss to all eternity.

So when it is said that the beast and the false prophet, and they who worship the beast and his image, are to be tormented day and night forever and ever, we must understand this expression to cover only the duration of their future existence beyond the grave. If we are anywhere given to understand by other scriptures and by other terms which are more rigid in their meaning, that this is to be eternal, the terms must here be so understood; if not, we have no warrant for so defining them here.

That the forever and ever, eis tous aionas ton aionon, of the suffering of the wicked, denotes a period of long duration, there is no question; and it may be much longer than any have been disposed to conceive who deny its eternity; yet it is to come to an end, not by their restoration to God's favor, but by the extinction of that life which has in it no immortality, and because they have refused to accept of the life freely offered to them which is to continue through ages without end.

We have now examined all the more prominent passages which are urged in favor of the eternal suffering of the lost. Though others may by some be brought forward to prove this doctrine, we may safely take the position that if it is not proved by these which we have examined, it cannot be proved by any in all the Bible; for these use the strongest terms and are most explicit in their nature. And of these, how many are there? Five in all. Those who have never before examined this subject, will perhaps be surprised to learn how small is the number of such texts. And should they take into the account every text which has even the slightest semblance of proving the immortality of the lost, it would not be calculated to abate that surprise in any great degree.

It now remains that we examine those texts, more in number, and more explicit in statement, which prove that the wicked shall be at last as though they had not been.

The Most Remarkable Event of the Eighteenth Century.

THE Youth's Companion of Nov. 7, 1872, has the following article concerning the memorable "dark day." In the judgment of the editor of that paper, it was "the most remarkable event of the eighteenth century." He estimates it only from a secular standpoint. Of how much deeper interest is it to us who believe it to be in fulfillment of the Saviour's words: "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light?"

J. N. ANDREWS.

"THE DARK DAY."

"The most remarkable event of the eighteenth century, at least in the line of the mysterious and unaccountable, was the 'dark day' in 1780, May 19. The Boston Journal, in an article respecting it, says:—

"The phenomenon has never been explained. Dr. Tenney, in 1785, wrote to the Historical Society that the ability of the land had endeavored to present a cause; but, said he, you will agree with me that no satisfactory solution has yet appeared. In similar language, wrote Dr. Noah Webster in 1843. The theory of some that it was smoke and ashes from forest fires then raging, was disproved. No fires in the forest could have been sufficient to spread a dense cloud over the whole of New England, and even some parts of the Middle States. It came too suddenly, with no wind to carry it from one point to another. It was a darkness that settled down over an area of more than 300,000 square miles at the same time."

The following extracts from the account in the Journal represent the effect of the awful occurrence on man and beast:—

"And the brute and feathered creation seemed puzzled and agitated. The birds ceased to fly, and hid themselves in the branches of the trees. As the darkness increased, they sang their evening songs as they do at twilight, and then became silent. Pigeons on the wing took to the shelter of the forest as they do at night. The whippoorwill, as if it were truly night, cheerfully sang his song through the gloomy hours. Woodstocks, which are night birds, whistled as they only do in the night time. Bats came out of their hiding places, and flew about. The fowls marched solemnly to their roosts, as they do only at nightfall, and after cackling for awhile over the mystery of so short a day, became still. Cocks crowed, as is their custom at nightly intervals, and the early breaking of day. Frogs peeped their evening concert, and dogs whined or howled, and ran away as on the approach of an earthquake. The herds of cattle on New England's thousand hills sought the shelter of the shed or barn-yard, lowing as they came to the gate, and sheep huddled around the circle with their heads inward—the invariable token of apprehended danger."

"The Connecticut Legislature, then in session at Hartford, found themselves deprived of daylight at about 11 o'clock A. M., and were obliged to adjourn, only one man dissenting. This strange darkness covered all the tract of country from Northern Canada to Pennsylvania, and from Nova Scotia to Lake Champlain (besides hundreds of miles out to sea), and lasted from 9 A. M. to 3 P. M., coming on again in the evening and totally blotting out the stars."

The Health Institute.

FOR some length of time I have felt desirous of saying a word through the REVIEW, concerning this institution, its present management, and its wants. It has been my lot the past season to be in Battle Creek considerably, and to be quite conversant with the working of things at the Institute; and I am happy to say that my mind has been very favorably impressed in regard to its present management and the work it is doing. I confess there have been times in the past when I could not say as much as this, being rather slow, and, withal, a little suspicious of certain influences which have been connected with at least some of the health institutions of our land.

There has evidently been a great improvement in this institution within a very few years. This has been more and more manifest, as it has come Western Camp-Meeting.

Medford, Minn., June 26-30, 1873.
GEN. CONF. COM.

This Week's Review.

We hoped that a report from the Iowa Camp-meeting might be given in this paper, but it has not arrived.

Bro. Littlejohn's articles on the Amendment question are concluded this week; also Bro. Canright's articles on Present Truth.

A number of questions have been gathering for some time; these have been mostly disposed of; some are answered, and a goodly number have gone into the waste box. Practical questions, or those relating to our times and our duty, will receive attention. But, "Where did Cain get his wife?" and "How did Judas die?" might as well have a resting spell. All that can be learned on such questions may be found in Commentaries, and books of Notes. Let us be careful that we do not get our minds so fixed on Cain and Judas as to lose sight of worthier subjects of consideration.

Several interesting reports have arrived since this paper was made up. A good variety may be expected next week.

BRO. HASKELL wishes to have his letters sent to Battle Creek, as he frequently holds meetings where there is no post-office, as Joe Daviss, Minn., and letters sent to such places of appointment are lost.

Minnesota Camp-Meeting.

We expect this will be the most important meeting we have ever held in the State. Many things of deep interest to the cause must come up to be acted upon. We specially request that every S. B. treasurer and church clerk come, and bring their books and records with them. Do not fail to do this. If you cannot possibly come, send your books by some one else. We are determined to have a general straightening up of these matters in Minnesota. We ask and expect these officers to help us. Now is the time to do this.

The Tract and Missionary Society has just been organized in this State. Only a few have been able to attend these meetings. Something further must be done at the camp-meeting. There we shall have books to be distributed to the members so that the work can immediately begin.

Then we hope to have stirring, spiritual meetings, just such as we all need, and the labors of the leaders in the cause. Scattered ones should make special efforts to attend. The trouble is, those who need these meetings most, generally feel the least interest in them, and the greatest interest in home affairs. They can't think of leaving their work. The cares of this world are choking them. Come, friends, let us see you at the annual feast. Provisions for men and teams can be had on the grounds at cost.

Answers to Correspondents.

A BROTHER writes:—

"I have recently had an opponent who denies that the word day is found in the original Hebrew in the first chapter of Genesis. If you think it worth while, I would be glad to have you give a true statement of the matter in REVIEW; especially the two words day, in Gen 1:5."

It is surprising that people will so misrepresent the word of God in order to maintain their own unscripural views. Our common translation of Gen. 1:5, is as accurate as can be. The word day is as plainly there as it is in the English.

QUESTION. Do you, as a people, deem it proper and right for an individual who is a professed Sabbath-keeper to wish an individual who does not keep the seventh day to plow upon his premises, and he still remain in the house as a Sabbath-keeper?

Ans. No.

The person sending queries on Acts 7:59, and Col. 3:3, is referred to the book published at this Office entitled, "The Nature of Man."

QUESTION. Did Jephthah carry out his vow, and sacrifice his daughter? Judges 11:39. W. S. E.

Ans. We do not think that Jephthah vowed to sacrifice his daughter. The vow, as given in verse 31, includes two things, to wit, "It shall be the Lord's," and "I will offer it up as a burnt offering." In our version, these are connected by the conjunction, and, but the Hebrew letter thus translated is also used as a disjunctive, and translated, or, as in the margin. By reference to the law concerning sacrifices, it will be seen that certain "clean beasts" only were accepted for sacrifice; the first-born of mankind and the first-born of unclean beasts were to be redeemed because they could not be sacrificed. If a "singular vow" were made by a man, and it concerned one of his household, it was to be redeemed according to the estimation of the priest. Lev. 27. As Jephthah did not redeem his daughter according to this law, it appears that his vow did not devote her any further than that she should "be the Lord's," which doomed her to perpetual virginity. See verses 37, 38. And his vow was this: "It shall be the Lord's [devoted to his service], or I will offer it a burnt offering," that is, provided it is something which the law permits to be so offered. Further reasons may be given for this view, but this seems sufficient.

QUESTION. Is it right to be baptized by a Sunday-keeper? D. P.

Ans. Doubtful: we could not be at all satisfied with baptism administered by one who did not keep all of God's commandments.

J. H. W.

QUESTION. Why is Christ represented as a reaper in Rev. 14:14, 15, when it is said in Matt. 13:39, that the reapers are the angels? L. M. A.

Ans. Jesus Christ is the commander of the angels. They perform the work spoken of under the figure of reaping the harvest of the earth, under his direction, and by his command. Therefore, it is proper, that in the symbol of the Son of man on the white cloud, coming to gather his saints—the wheat of the earth—he should be represented as a reaper.

We speak of Solomon building the temple. It was built by his command, and under his direction.

IN addition to her political troubles, unhappy Spain is bothered by strikes among her workmen, some of them accompanied by riotous demonstrations.

Geological Riddles.

A CORRESPONDENT of the United Presbyterian, writing from Colorado, gives some curious accounts of the geological structure of the mountains near Denver, in the following extract:—

The South Park is about from twelve to twenty-five miles wide, and forty or fifty feet long. It is probably the bed of some ancient lake. But you can't tell anything about this country. It has evidently been once all torn to pieces by volcanic action. Coal beds are vertical or perpendicular, in veins like silver or gold lodes. Some of them have been sunk to a depth of one or two hundred feet, and I don't know how much deeper they go. Where a geologist would expect to find the first limestone, he will as likely as not find granite, and where his science or books tell him to look for granite, he is just as likely to find the old red sandstone, porphyry, or slate, or flint, or something else.

I know an English geologist here who has sunk several holes from two hundred to two thousand feet deep, and he says, as the result of his experiments, that in this country there is no reliance to be placed in the commonly received doctrines of geology. Well, if geology will not tell the truth here, must Moses be put down as untruthful, merely because "scientists," falsely so called, affirm that geology and the Bible are at variance? I know a place not ten miles from here where there is malachite now in a formation state. Two years ago it was softer than putty. At present it is quite hard. If it hardens as fast for two years more, it will be as hard as agate or jasper. Then let one of the self-conceited "scientists" of the present day look at it. He will put on his glasses and look wise and say: "Well, that's malachite (from the Greek malachae). It is a native carbonate of copper; it occurs in mammillary masses, consisting of concentric layers having a fibrous structure," etc., etc. Then he tells its age, perhaps five or ten thousand years, with as much confidence or positiveness and pretence of philosophy as if he really knew much about it, and with the same positiveness he will turn around and say, These things being so, the Bible must necessarily be a humbug. I could then tell him that I wrote my name in that malachite only four years ago, when it was as soft as mud and as pliable as his science.

The Dark Day.

NINETY-THREE years ago the 19th day of last May, there occurred a phenomenon in New England which has never yet been accounted for; and it was, at the time, the general opinion that it was supernatural. There were no real clouds, or storm, and yet it was the darkest day ever known since the crucifixion of Christ. It seems, by all the accounts, that the impression upon nearly all minds at the time, was, that it was a sign of the end of the world. And by reference to the Scriptures, we find the time had fully come for such a sign to be given. There can, therefore, be no doubt that it was the fulfillment of the prediction of our Lord, "The sun shall be darkened." Matt. 13: 24. The Spirit of God witnessed to the sign, and impressed the conviction upon all minds with great solemnity. And thus it was recorded by many able pens at the time. So unusual, so solemn, so clearly supernatural, was the event that it is even now frequently reverted to in the public prints, candidly described, and admitted to be supernatural.

The following is from the Concord [N. H.] People:—

"Last Monday was the ninety-third anniversary of the memorable 'dark day.' Throughout New England and some adjacent portions of New York and Canada, such was the darkness that people could not read or dine at mid-day without lighting candles. The phenomenon commenced about ten in the morning. At eleven, the darkness was so great that the fowls went to roost, the birds ceased to fly, and hid themselves in the branches of the trees, the whippoorwills sang their evening songs, frogs piped their accustomed concert, and the cattle collected about the barns as at night.

"On the human family the effect was still more curious and terrifying. The mechanic left his tools in the shop, the farmer, his plough in the furrow, and each moved in silent and marveling mood toward the barn or dwelling. On the home threshold they were met by pale and anxious women, who tremblingly inquired, "What is coming?" The alarmed traveler, seeking the sympathy of his fellow-man as one impressed with a sense of impending peril, put up at the nearest house, and mingled his anxious questionings and forebodings with those of the family. Strong men met and spoke with surprise on their countenances, and little children peered timidly into the deepening gloom, and then sought the sheltering parental arms.

"Schools broke up in affright, and the wondering pupils scampered homeward with many expressions of childish fear. The inevitable candle shone out of the windows of all dwellings; every countenance gathered blackness; all hearts were filled with fear of an approaching, unparalleled storm, or the occurrence of a terrestrial convulsion; but it was not the blackness of the storm-cloud, such as sometimes, with a frightful agitation, breaks over a single city; it was the silent spreading of the pall-cloth over the earth by strong, invisible hands.

"Before twelve, candles became necessary, and many omitted their dinners, fearing the day of Judgment had come. The darkness of the day having been succeeded an hour or two before evening by a partially clear sky, and the shining of the sun, still obscured by the black and vapory mist, rendered the first half of the night hideously dark beyond all former experience, probably, of a million of people who saw it."

The following verses I take from a hymn, "composed by Elder Peleg Burroughs, the 20th of the fifth month, 1780; according to the ability which God gave him, to commemorate the darkness of the preceding day."

"'Twas on the nineteenth day of May,
The sixth day of the week,
One thousand sev'n hundred eighty,
The Lord to us did speak:

By spreading his thick clouds all round,
And darkening the light;
So that we heard the dreadful sound,
Our day is turn'd to night!

'Twas like that awful gloomy day,
When Christ was crucify'd;
Who hung upon the cross at noon,
And for poor sinners died!

The oldest man cannot declare
He ever saw the like;
When no eclipse did happen rare,
To take away the light!

In short, the terrors of the day
Can scarcely be conceiv'd!
Yet in the last extremity,
I was from fear reliev'd.

Oh! how my soul doth long and pray,
That sinners may believe
The awful truths of God's pure word,
And grace from Christ receive."

Shall We Inherit?

How fearful the thought, that we may reject the counsel of God against ourselves, and, though innumerable opportunities have been afforded us for securing an inheritance with the saints, we may, by our neglect, come short of the grace of life, and have to say, "The summer [of opportunities] is past; the harvest is ended, and we are not saved." How much of regret, and how long it may continue, before we are swept with the besom of destruction, we do not know. But "he that knoweth his Master's will, and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes." So much has God given us to know from his own record.

It may be well, then, for us to impress on our hearts the fact, that grace may be received in vain. Even the grace of God as revealed in, and through, Christ, may be rendered all powerless to save, if we neglect so great salvation. It is not necessary for us to become noted for sin and wickedness that we may suffer loss, yea, utter destruction. Simply disregard God's mercies, slight his proffered grace, and move on as we list, giving no attention to the requirements of our merciful God, and we as effectually treasure for ourselves wrath, and lay up in store for ourselves indignation, tribulation, and anguish, as we should if we were violent in our transgressions, and determined to follow a course of sin and wrong.

Let our all, then, be laid on God's altar, and let us approach the throne of his grace, and earnestly cry unto him who is able to save, unto the uttermost, all who come to him in humility, confessing all wrongs, all sin, and looking by faith to the Strong for strength, to the Merciful for mercy and salvation; yea, for every grace that is needed in order to a life of devotion to God here, and a successful journey to the rest that remaineth for the people of God. Let our souls be lifted up in the prayer of faith, that he that succoreth the tried and tempted may lay underneath us his strong arm, so that victory over every foe may be ours, until we come to the perfect stature of a man in Christ Jesus. Then let us continue in well doing, seeking for glory, honor, and immortality, and thus secure eternal life. What a treasure! Shall we have it? or shall we have indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, which is the inheritance which every evil-doer shall ultimately secure? Which shall be our inheritance? Let our lives answer this question, and not our tongues only. "If ye keep my commandments," says Christ, "ye shall abide in my love, even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love." Then shall we be overcomers, and shall sit down with Christ in his kingdom. Amen.

Compromise.

MUCH is couched in the term compromise. It has decided the destiny of many individuals and nations. When righteously used, it has resulted in untold peace, happiness, and prosperity. It is a mighty lever in adjusting differences that no legislation could affect. "Yielding pacifies great offenses." We should find a pleasure in yielding to others when it can be done without compromising principle or justice; but my friend asks too much when he would have me compromise the word of God.

We may be called bigoted, conservative, and fanatical; be it so. These epithets we can bear, but we cannot endure the frowns of Him, one jot or tittle of whose word will not fall to the ground till all be fulfilled. Take it as we would another book, just as it reads, and all is plain.

Men have changed the law, broken the everlasting covenant, and their children and children's children have done what Ezekiel said they would do. "One built up a wall, and lo, others daubed it with untempered mortar." Read Ezekiel, 13th chapter, and learn what became of the wall and those who daubed it. Many boast of their large charity and Christian tolerance, while they abate not a jot of their sectarian prejudices. Excuse me if my cloak of charity will not cover so much. A permanent, solid structure cannot be expected from such incohesive particles. While one says, "I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; I of Cephas; and I of Christ," are we not carnal, and walk as men? We are exhorted to be of one mind and of one judgment, and all to speak the same thing. When we heed this counsel, the building will go up without the sound of a hammer; and all the parts, fitly joined together, will grow up into a perfect building in Christ.

Jesus said he came not to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfill. He kept his Father's commandments, and said that he said and did what his Father told him.

But, says my friend, do you suppose none will be saved only those who keep the seventh day? Paul says, "I was alive once without the law, but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died." Where there is no law, there is no transgression; but when its claims are brought home, we have no excuse; we know our duty. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city."

It is a good thing to be established, but always in the truth. There should always be room to pray,

"If I am right, thy grace impart,
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, O, teach my heart
To find that better way."

God will bless the honest seeker after truth.

A Weed in the Sermon.

"MOTHER, how much tobacco does it take to make a sermon?"

"What do you mean, my son?"

"Why, I mean how much tobacco does father chew, and how many cigars does he smoke, while he is making a sermon?"

"Well, the tobacco and the smoke do not make the sermon, do they?"

"I do n't know but they do—they help along, at any rate; for I heard father tell Mr. Morris, the minister who preached for him last Sunday, that he could never write a sermon without a cigar. So I thought may be the tobacco makes the sermon, or the best part of it."

"My son, I am shocked to hear you talk so!"

"Well, mother, I was only telling what father said; and what it made me think. He said a prime cigar was a great solace (whatever that is); and he said, besides, it drove away the blues—put him in a happy frame of mind, and stimulated his brain, so he could work better. I suppose stimulated means to make one think easier. Now, mother, I have been thinking I could study better if I had something to stimulate my brain; and the next time I have one of those knotty questions in arithmetic to work out, I will get a cigar, and see if it won't help me along. You know you often tell me if I follow my father's example I will not go astray; and now I would like a few cigars to make my brain work well, so I can stand at the head of my class."

"I hope I shall never see my son with a cigar in his mouth; it would be the first step to ruin."

"You don't think father is ruined, do you? He has taken a good many steps since he took the first cigar."

"I think, my son, your father would be better without cigars or tobacco in any shape; but he formed the habit when a young man."

"But father says we are to blame for forming bad habits, and it is a sin to continue in them. I heard him say that in the pulpit, not long ago. There is old Tom Jenkins, who gets tight every day. I suppose he would find it rather hard to break off drinking whisky. But father says it's no excuse for a man, when he gets drunk, to say he is in the habit of getting drunk. He says it only needs resolution and moral courage to break off bad habits."

"But, my son, smoking tobacco is not quite like drinking whisky and getting drunk."

"No, I know that, mother; but I was going on to say that, if smoking was a bad habit, father would have given it up long ago. But I don't believe smoking is any harm; and it does some folks a great deal of good. You know how nervous and fidgety father gets when he has to go without any cigars; and, besides, he could not write his sermons without them. I am sure if he could write as well and do as much good without using tobacco, he would not spend so much money for it. When I want to buy a little candy, or a bit of spruce gum, father tells me I had better practice the grace of self-denial, and save my money for the missionary box. Besides, he says such stuff is not good for me; it will spoil my teeth and ruin my health. Now I am quite certain that father would not spend money—more than I have ever spent in my whole life for candy, gum, clothes, and everything—if he did not believe tobacco was a real benefit to himself and others. Why, mother, do you know anything about the price of cigars in these times? Cousin Ned Wilkins, who smokes a great many, says 'you can't get a decent cigar for less than fifteen cents; and the best cost forty and fifty cents apiece!' And I heard Deacon Tompkins say his cigars cost him six hundred dollars a year; for he uses nothing but the very best, and they are all imported. He told father so the other day, when they were smoking together in the study after dinner, and I was trying to get my arithmetic lesson. Now, mother, do you think my father, and Deacon Tompkins, and a whole host of ministers, and elders, and temperance lecturers, and lots and lots of good Christian people, would spend so much money to keep themselves in bad habits? Why, just the sum that Deacon Tompkins alone spends upon cigars, would support a missionary in the West for a whole year, and would be a better salary than many western ministers now get! Really, mother, I cannot believe that using tobacco is wrong as long as so many good Christians do use it. I don't care so much about chewing—would rather have some nice, clean spruce gum, such as they have got down to Dickinson's store; but I would like to smoke as my father does; and please, mother, give me a little money to get a few cigars."

"My son, you may talk to your father about this matter. Ask him if he thinks it would improve your habits and manners to learn to smoke; and if he approves, you may ask him for a cigar.—Advent Herald.

HE who truly loves God delights to meditate of him, and to discourse of him, and to hear the mention of his name, and is weary of the conversations where God is irreverently mentioned, or seldom or slightly remembered.

NOTHING BUT LEAVES.

God pity the one who, looking back,
Sees no fruit on life's beaten track.

Nothing but leaves in the path of life,
No fruit to tell of an ended strife.

Nothing but leaves in the morning fair;
Nothing but leaves in the noon-day glare.

Nothing but leaves at the setting sun;
Nothing but leaves when the day is done.

Where are your harvests of golden thought?
While sunlight lasted, you should have wrought.

You sowed no seed with careful hand,
But thoughtlessly scattered it over the land,

And lo! as you sowed you must also reap;
Too late, ah, too late! to stand and weep!

You have not obeyed the Master's call:
"Work in my vineyard" ere darkness fall!

To none you spoke of a Saviour's love,
Of the beautiful Zion so far above;

Of the golden streets that no eye hath seen,
Or the river of life with its silver sheen.

Of the tree of knowledge no fruit you bear;
Oh! why have you wasted a life so fair?

Oh! why have you fought so vain a strife,
And looked not to the end of the battle of life?

You have given no thought to the other land,
To the day when you'll cross the river's strand—

The river of death, with its solemn flow,
Where the mystic life-boats come and go.

And as you stand on that river's shore
And look o'er the path you may tread no more,

You will bow your head with shame and fear
And the Master's call you will dread to hear;

For the Master's work is not yet done,
And lo! he calls at the setting sun.

But alas! in place of golden sheaves,
You carry nothing but withered leaves;

And thus you must pass to the other side
Of the river of death, with its rushing tide.

AN UNEXPLAINED PHENOMENON; Or, the Darkness over New England in 1780.

"'Twas on a May day of the far old year
Seventeen hundred eighty that there fell
Over the bloom and sweet life of the spring,
Over the fresh earth and the heaven of noon,
A horror of great darkness like the night
In day of which the Norland sages tell—
The Twilight of the Gods. The low-hung sky
Was black with ominous clouds, save where its rim
Was fringed with a dull glow, like that which climbs
The crater's sides from the red hell below.
Birds ceased to sing, and all the barn-yard fowls
Roosted; the cattle at the pasture bars
Low'd, and look'd homeward; bats on leathern wings
Flitted abroad; the sounds of labor died;
Men prayed, and women wept; all ears grew sharp
To hear the doom-blast of the trumpet shatter
The black sky, that the dreadful face of Christ
Might look from the rent clouds, not as he looked
A loving guest at Bethany, but stern
As Justice and inexorable law." —Whittier.

On the 19th day of May, 1780, the inhabitants of New England and the adjacent parts were the trembling witnesses of an event in nature which has never been fully described nor analyzed. We refer to the wide-spread and mysterious withdrawal of the natural sunlight, which so startled our ancestors and covered the land with gloom on that memorable occasion; a phenomenon in its kind never experienced before nor since in the country, and which, while religion attempted to account for it as a fulfilled prophecy, yet science has not unfolded its quality nor discovered its cause. Ninety-one years have passed away since the extraordinary darkness transpired; the living witnesses are getting to be few, but still our sources of information concerning all the features of the day and night are ample, and before us as we write are over forty different testimonies relating to the scene we seek exhaustively to depict. They are mainly from persons who saw what they describe, and embrace evidence from historical collections, histories of States and towns, histories of the Revolution, journals of Legislatures, newspapers of the day, sermons of the ministry, personal memoirs, memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Professors in colleges, poets, philosophers, physicians, scientists and savans; among them Noah Webster, LL. D., who wrote, "I stood and viewed the phenomenon, for which no satisfactory cause has been assigned."

The year we have named was celebrated for its numerous auroral exhibitions in this latitude. They covered the midnight heavens with corruscations of red and silver, and streamed out like lightning, seeming, says one writer, fairly to flash warmth in the face. A single sun spot over 50,000 miles in diameter was seen with the naked eye by Wm. Herschel the previous year, and in 1780 others were visible and recorded by Lelande. The winter preceding May was marked by extraordinary severity. Snow lay on the ground from the middle of November to the middle of April four feet deep everywhere. In December and January, a snow storm continued seven successive days, and the snow fell to the depth of four feet on a level in this single storm, with drifts eight and ten feet high. Sheep were buried in the drifts for many days, and even men and animals perished with cold. Long Island Sound was crossed by heavy artillery on the ice.

Narragansett Bay froze over so hard that men traversed the ice from Providence to Newport in skating parties, and from Fall River to Newport, loads of wood were conveyed on the ice through Bristol Ferry. The journal of the House of Representatives of Connecticut records it as "the severest hard winter within the memory of man," followed by "the most backward spring recollected by aged and observing citizens." War, too, added its rigors to the dreary aspect of nature.

The month of May was dry and cold. Previous to the 19th, a vapor filled the air for several days. There was a smell of sulphur in the air, and on the day of the great darkness, Etna discharged lava from a new mouth, and the eruption was accompanied with violent earthquakes in Southern Italy. The morning of the 19th was overcast with some clouds, and rain fell over the country, with lightning and thunder. The sun on rising shone not with its accustomed clearness. Its face seemed veiled, and the aspect somewhat lurid. Scarcely any motion was in the air; what there was of wind came from the south-west; vanes were not stirred, and sails and flags hung idle. By nine o'clock in the forenoon, without previous warning, the darkness stole gradually on, with a luminous appearance near the horizon, as if the obscuring cloud had dropped down from overhead. There was yellowness of the atmosphere that made clear silver assume a grass green hue. Then a dense, undefinable vapor settled rapidly and without aerial movement over all the land and ocean from Pennsylvania to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the darkness it caused increasing by degrees until the sunlight was effectually shut out. Ordinary cloud it was not. The rapidity with which so large an extent of country was enveloped, precludes the possibility of supposing this to have been a natural cloud moving laterally. Besides this, the day was too calm to imagine such a thing. Down came the darkness, thicker and thicker. By ten o'clock, the air was loaded with a heavy gloom. The heavens were tinged with a yellowish or faint red; the lurid look increased; few, if any, ordinary clouds were visible. The sun, in disappearing, took on a brassy hue. The lurid, brassy color spread everywhere, above and below. The grass assumed the color of the sky, and all outdoors wore a sickly, weird and melancholy aspect, a dusky appearance as if seen through a smoked glass. Nature donned a frightful look. No one had seen the like before, and the hearts of thousands grew faint with fear. So low was the overhanging vapor that it appeared to rest upon the very earth, and the hills in some places could not be seen at the distance of only half a mile. Especially was this true at Pepperell and Groton in Massachusetts. By eleven o'clock it was as night itself, and from this time until three in the afternoon, the darkness was truly extraordinary and frightful. Some reported that the sun's disk could be seen dimly through the murky gloom at the period of the deepest darkness, but this seems hardly probable. At sea, the air was thick and had an unusual smell and a most unnatural appearance. Generally there was a sooty smell prevalent, and in a few places some drops of rain fell. Dr. Tenney, with a philosophic eye to turn the sable curtain into gold, wrote that all nature wore a resplendent and beautiful tint, the earth and trees appearing as if adorned with an enchanting glow! Mr. Temple of Boston saw things in somber color, and in a letter to friends in England, described the scene as if a veil was drawn over all things, which he seemed to look through and see the heaven beyond it; while at Newburyport, a pious woman wrote: All nature seemed hushed, as though Jehovah was about to make himself known by some mighty act. Every eye was turned upward, every one inquiring: What is going to take place? At three o'clock, the light came on from the west, and the heavens, at its coming, looked more brassy than at any previous time, while there were seen in some places quick flashes or corruscations, not unlike the Aurora Borealis. Gradually, and to the immense relief of more than half a million of people, the darkness passed off. Such was the general appearance of the earth and atmosphere.

The extent of the darkness was greater than is related of any other similar phenomenon on record, not excepting the celebrated dark days over Egypt and Judea. It reached south to the northern half of Pennsylvania, and from thence along the coast north-east to the wilds of Maine, eastward to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and out at sea, 120 miles south-east of Boston, and undoubtedly much farther; west to the valleys of Lake Champlain and the Hudson river, and north into undefined regions in Canada. Portland, Boston, Hartford, New York, West Point, and Albany were affected by it. But the degrees of darkness differed in different places—the deepest night settling over New England. A tract of land and sea 800 miles in length and 400 miles in breadth, embracing an area of 320,000 square miles, was known to be covered by the cloud, and so far as can be ascertained, a population of 700,000 souls sat for a portion of the day and night in a gloom more or less profound and inexplicable.

Just how dark the day was is attested by indisputable evidence. The hour and minute could not be discovered on the face of a clock or watch by persons of unimpaired eyesight. Candles became an absolute necessity both out of doors and in, as it was impossible to transact ordinary business without them. Fires on the hearthstones shone as brightly as on a moonless November evening, and all dinner tables were set with lighted candles upon them as if it were the evening repast. The keenest eyes indoors could not see to read common print. So far beyond any ordinary fog was the effect that stages on the road either put up at the nearest hotel during the mid-day hours, or carried candles or lanterns to enable the perplexed driver to well see his way. This in many instances was performed as it invariably is at night. At Haverhill, N. H., at twelve at noon a man could not be seen in the road at a distance of only twenty rods, while an hour or two later the captain of a ship forty leagues at sea south-east of Boston was compelled to light a large candle to enable him to perceive his instruments and thereby steer his vessel. "It was so dark at noon," writes Dr. Adams, "that we could not tell one person from another in a room with three large windows in it." A writer in the Massachusetts Spy informs us that at the time of the greatest obscurity the light was less than the volume of light from the moon, while many other eye-witnesses assert unequivocally that the greatest darkness was fully equal to what is the season of "candle-lighting" in the evening. No London fog ever equaled this. The astronomer of Paxton, Samuel Stearns, calculated that the ratio of light borne by the moon at its full, as compared with the full light of the sun, is as 1 to 100,000. Later French savans make the difference as 1 to 300,000 and even 1 to 800,000. But if Stearns was right, the sunlight of that remarkable day was immeasurably less than that of a common, clear, sunny day, the ordinary sunlight being reduced below the light of the full moon. Connecticut went totally under the cloud. The journal of her House of Representatives puts on record the fact that "none could see to read or write in the House, or even at a window, or distinguish persons at a small distance, or perceive any distinction of dress, &c., in the circle of attendants; therefore, at eleven o'clock, adjourned the house till two o'clock afternoon." At Ipswich, Mass., at half-past eleven, several educated gentlemen tested the depth of the darkness by attempting to read large print in a room with three windows of twenty-four panes, each, facing the south and east; but, although their eyesight was good, they could not at all distinguish the words. At twelve, with the three windows still uncovered and open, substances, by the light of a candle, cast well-defined shadows on the wall, and shadow profiles and images were as distinct and sharp in their outlines as in the evening. At one o'clock, a single gleam of light, coming hitherto from the east, was wholly withdrawn or shut out, and it became darker than at any previous time. The amazement of the party was very great. At two o'clock, the gleam which had disappeared in the east shone faintly in the west, as if the obscuring cloud had uplifted or passed over; but the gentlemen, with the three windows still open, found it necessary to have two candles on the table to enable them to appropriate the dinner now set before them. At four, the company said they had passed a very unexpected night together, and then parted, each musing on the strange adventure. With all these facts before us, we can discover no extravagance in the language of the Boston Gazette, when its editor exclaimed, "In short, there was the appearance of midnight at noon-day." Men were awe-struck; all busy sounds of labor ceased; and a calamity of some kind, none knew what, was confidently imagined to be approaching. It seemed, says one, like a great roof closing down upon the earth, and shutting out the glorious sunlight forever.

The general results of the darkness afford an interesting study both for the scientist and the divine. The natural world was singularly affected. All the brute and feathered creation seemed puzzled and agitated. The birds ceased to fly, and hid themselves in the branches of the trees. As the darkness increased, they sang their evening songs as they do at twilight, and then became silent. Pigeons on the wing took to the shelter of the forest as they do at night. The whip-poor-will, as if it were truly night, cheerfully sang his song through the gloomy hours. Woodcocks, which are night birds, whistled as they only do in the night time. Bats came out of their hiding places and flew about. The fowls marched solemnly to their roosts as they do only at nightfall, and after cackling for a while over the mystery of so short a day, became still. Cocks crowed as is their custom at nightly intervals and the early breaking of day. Frogs peeped their evening concert, and dogs whined or howled and ran away as on the approach of an earthquake. The herds of cattle on New England's thousand hills sought the shelter of the shed or barnyard, lowing as they came to the gate, and sheep huddled around in a circle with their heads inward—the invariable token of apprehended danger.

On the human family, the effect was still more curious and terrifying. The mechanic left his tools in the shop, the farmer, his plow in the furrow, and each moved in silent and marveling mood toward the barn or dwelling. On the home threshold, they were met by pale and anxious women, who tremblingly inquired, "What is coming?" The alarmed traveler, seeking the sympathy of his fellow-man as one impressed with a sense of impending peril, put up at the nearest house, and mingled his anxious questionings and forebodings with those of the family. Strong men met and spoke with surprise on their countenances, and little children peered timidly into the deepening gloom, and then sought the sheltering parental arms. Schools broke up in affright, and the wondering pupils scampered homeward with many expressions of childish fear. The inevitable candle shone out at the windows of all dwellings—every countenance gathered blackness—all hearts were filled with fear of an approaching, unparalleled storm, or the occurrence of a terrestrial convulsion; but it was not the blackness of the storm cloud, such as sometimes with frightful agitation breaks over a single city; it was the silent spreading of the pall-cloth over the earth by strong, invisible hands. Many anecdotes of terror are related. Men well remembered the earthquake of a quarter of a century before, but this darkening of the earth at noonday—what could it portend? In Boston, from the hours of 11 or 1 till 3 o'clock, business was generally suspended and shops were closed. Those who had the courage to continue them open, illuminated them artificially. At Groton, a court was in session in a meeting-house full of large windows, as was the old style of houses of worship; but at half-past eleven all faces began to wear a somber hue, whereupon magistrate and people followed suit with all New England, and called for lighted candles—gas and kerosene being then unknown in the land.

Very little of jesting or humor concerning the day was indulged in. Indifferent persons who were enthusiastic and anxious during the darkness gave way to some railery as soon as the shadow disappeared before the welcome shining of the sun. When the news was carried to England, gentlemen who were prone to laugh at the expected discomfiture of the then revolutionary colonies interpreted the darkness allegorically of the gloom thrown over the minds of the "Boston rebels" by reason of the reduction of Charleston, the defeat of Clinton, etc.; but when subsequent letters confirmed the tidings and asserted the event to have been a sober, literal fact, astonishment knew no bounds. Meanwhile the jeering stories sent home word that "it was the devil spreading his wings over the northern rebellious colonies, and if they do not repent, the next time he will certainly fly off with them all." But the answer from England was: "I do not believe all the wise men of Boston will be able to explain it."

But it cannot be denied that the predominating feeling on that day was awe and fear. At many a dinner table no food was eaten; the family sat pale and often silent. Amazement hushed all boisterous sounds. If any spoke, it was in a low, subdued tone. Pious fathers took down the family Bible, read it reverently, and then kneeled and prayed. Prof. Samuel Williams of Harvard College testified years after that the terror "surpassed description." The bells were rung in the large towns, and the people in masses forsook their toils and crowded into the churches. Thousands sought the minister for an explanation of the darkness, who, in response, took Matt. 24: 29, 30, or Rev. 6: 12, or Isa. 13: 10, or Eze. 32: 7, or Joel 2: 31, or some other sacred prediction of the darkening of the sun, and improved upon them in sermons on the Last Day. The neighbors flocked around holy men, who calmly pointed them to the Lamb of God as their only refuge at all times. Some, with lanterns, went from house to house with warnings on their lips. The darkness was compared to that which overspread Judea at the crucifixion of our Saviour, and it was asserted to be not a whit less divinely caused. Sober men, unaccustomed to such a freak of nature, deemed the Day of Doom at the door. We cannot sneer at these alarms; they were legitimately born. President Dwight, an adult eye-witness, asserts this to have been "the general opinion." Even the gathered wisdom of the Council of Connecticut waited and listened, writes Whittier,

"To hear the thunder of the wrath of God
Break from the hollow trumpet of the cloud."

The darkness of the day having been succeeded for an hour or two before evening by a partially clear sky, and the shining of the sun, still obscured by the black and vapory mist, this interval was followed by a return of obscurity with greater density, that rendered the first half of the night hideously dark beyond all former experience of the probably a million of people who saw it. From soon after sunset till midnight, no ray of light from moon or star penetrated the vault above. It was pronounced "the blackness of darkness." Horses in numerous instances, when wanted for service, could not be compelled to quit the stable. Others on the highway, unable to see for the darkness, seemed to be seized with fear, and moved their feet cautiously and with bewildering hesitation, as if apprehensive of plunging into an abyss. Travelers on foot, who supposed themselves acquainted with every foot of the road, lost their way in familiar localities. Some, totally bewildered, shouted for aid but few rods from their own door. Lost persons in some instances felt their way home, being guided by the fence. Dr. Adams says almost everybody who was out that night got lost. Sharp eyes could not distinguish between the heavens and the earth, the line of the horizon was totally invisible, and large, white substances placed before the eyes could not be discovered either in their color or outline. At nine o'clock the moon rose at her full, but had not the least effect to dispel the death-like shadow. At between nine and ten, a sea captain more than a hundred miles from New England coast, ordered his men to take in some sails, but they could not find their way without light of candles from one mast to another. Like a chain, this blackness bound the whole coast line for more than 200 leagues. It was compared to a solid wall, impenetrable and forbidding, and had an oppressive, choking, overpowering effect on all who tried to brave it. At Salem an intelligent writer said: "Perhaps it was never darker since the children of Israel left the house of bondage." Dr. Samuel Adams and Hon. Wheeler Martin, as also others, testify that "it could be felt" on waving the hand in the air; language used by Moses concerning the supernaturally and miraculously produced cloud that shut down over Egypt, causing a "thick darkness" of three days' duration. But lest this description may be considered exaggerated by the excitement engendered by the immediate occurrence of this phenomenon, we here reproduce the strong language of Dr. Samuel Tenney, written in calm mood to the Historical Society five years subsequent to the scene he is describing; the language of a philosophic mind deeply impressed. He says: "The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as ever has been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. It wanted only palpability to render it as extraordinary as that which overspread the land of Egypt in the days of Moses. And, as the darkness is not substantial, but a mere privation, the palpability ascribed to that by the sacred historian must have arisen from some peculiar affections of the atmosphere, perhaps an exceeding thick vapor that accompanied it. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable shades, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."

What was the cause of this darkness? Here the wisdom of New England was baffled. Newspaper men, who are generally regarded as competent to explain all passing events, gave up in despair, and said: "It is to be desired that curious and philosophical gentlemen would favor the public with a solution of this phenomenon." They said, "There was nothing terrible in it," but nevertheless nearly everybody was terrified. It was pronounced a usus nature, past the vulgar comprehension, and which it was requested that the Royal Society of England should be consulted to frame a solution. But this learned body never explained it. Dr. Tenney, in 1785, wrote the Historical Society that the ability of the land had endeavored to present a cause, but, said he, "You will agree with me that no satisfactory solution has yet appeared." In similar language wrote Noah Webster in 1843. The theory of some, that it was smoke and ashes from forest fires, extensively raging, is overturned by Dr. Webster, who argued that "no fires in our forests could have been sufficient to spread a dense cloud over the whole of New England and even some parts of the Middle States." He might have added: "And this in so short a time, when the swiftest clouds move but ten miles an hour." The theory of Webster himself, that it was the "smoke of some volcano in the northern regions of this continent, wafted in a vast volume by the wind," is equally untenable. No great density of smoke was observable, and in Boston, as elsewhere, "there was," says a Bostonian, "not the least appearance of fog, smoke, or haziness."

The old poems declare that smoke from the burning of every town and forest in the land would not create so dismal a gloom. And all analogies teach they were right. The notion of some, that Venus or Mercury intercepted the sun's rays, is refuted by the fact that there was no transit of either of these planets during that year. Some said it was a solar eclipse—a conclusion rendered impossible by the moon's having fulfilled the day before. And very aptly does the astronomer of Paxton ask: "If the darkness of the day was caused by a solar eclipse, what then darkened the night, as the moon was more than forty hours' motion past her opposition?" Others said a comet interposed the baleful shadow of its nucleus between men and the sun, or flung its tail upon the earth. Dr. Tenney attributed the darkness to a substratum cloud of vapor of great thickness and density, the sun's rays getting lost in the struggle to penetrate the dusky shield. And Stearns regarded it as caused by exhaled particles of various qualities of matter highly condensed and impervious to sunlight. It is possible these views were borrowed from Dr. Thomas Burnet, the English geologist, who, more than a century earlier (in 1667), had written that in the "Latter Days," in accordance with our Lord's prediction, "The sun and moon will be darkened, or of a bloody hue or pale countenance, produced by an infectious and corrupt air, filled with thick vapors and fumes or turbid exhalations, atmospheric obscurities to a great extent intercepting the sun's rays, causing it thus to appear, and proportionably diminishing the light of the moon." (Vide Theory of the Earth.) To say the least, many of the views of the New Englanders coincided with those of Burnet respecting the modus operandi by which an unusual solar obscuration could take place. Far more likely is the view already hinted at, that the secondary cause was not at all in the body of the solar orb or in the earth, but of cosmical origin, and traceable to cometic or meteoric material consuming in the upper regions and falling in a great cloud into the atmosphere in the form of cosmic dust. The sooty and sulphurous smell in the air, the faint electrical flashes, and the black dust seen on the surface of water in many localities, favor this view. The cause was evidently cosmic, cometic, and celestial.

But while New England admitted a secondary cause, her Christian people, sharing the feeling of the devout and philosophical Stearns, imputed the flinging of this black shadow "like a funeral pall" over the land inhabited by nearly one-third of the people of the United Colonies, to the direct interposition of the God of the Universe, who himself, by means unknown to mortals, darkened both the sun and the moon, both the day and the night, as a token of his indignation against every prevailing iniquity, and an omen of a future day of universal destruction and wrath! It made no difference that it was not supernatural, or that secondary causes had produced the result witnessed. The effect only was sought for; the sacred Scriptures had announced a darkening of the sun and moon, and these signs had been fulfilled before their eyes—locally, to be sure—but so were all physical and moral signs. The gravest minds reverently went behind all secondary cause and declared it was the immediate hand of God. The ministry insisted it was occasioned by a divine arrangement of nature, and in the spirit of the sacred Hebrew writers, who ascribed all remarkable and accountable acts of the natural world to the working out of the vast designs of the Infinite, said: "This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes!" In more modern times, men would doubtless have said: Oh! it is only a temporary obscurity of the light by a cloud of exhaled vapor, or by terrestrial contact with cosmic particles, and nothing more. Few minds would see God in the mysterious cloud. Not so with our fathers. They saw in the strange sun-darkening shroud a sure celestial token of the approaching consummation, and so proclaimed it in all ways. The impression was most profound, and was not effaced during the remainder of that century. The view was reiterated seventeen years later by the orthodox Spaulding in the pulpit of the Tabernacle at Salem, and was indorsed in the first religious paper in the world, published at Portsmouth in 1808. Indeed, it was opposed by none. To-day, nearly the entire body of believers, comprising the sect of Advent Christians in the United States and Canada, sustain the views of the New England Christians of the last century concerning the significance of the darkness of Friday, May 19, 1780. We argue nothing here pro or con, but only state facts, and should be unfaithful chroniclers of historical fact did we omit to record this abiding conviction of nearing Judgment on the old New England mind, and transmitted to hundreds of thousands of their posterity by the scenes of the never-to-be-forgotten Dark Day.

We may learn lessons of good from these recollections of the famous Black Friday. Individually, the multitudes who live in 1871 may not feel that such old-time and far-off events, however ominous, at all concern them. Nevertheless, there was wisdom in the words, and a certain heroic principle in the conduct of Abraham Davenport, Colonel, and afterward Judge of Stamford, Conn., and State Counsellor in the Legislative Chamber at Hartford—a wisdom and a moral worth remembering. The providence of God found him serving his day and generation when the great darkness fell. Amid the deepening gloom that wrapped about the city, darkened the rooms of the State House, and set the law-givers trembling and many of them to exclaim: "It is the Lord's Great Day," and move to adjourn, Davenport refused to be frightened from his post, but when all eyes turned to him, boldly said: "I am against the adjournment. Either the day of Judgment is at hand, or it is not. If it is not, there is no cause for adjournment. If it is, I wish to be found in the line of my duty. I wish candles to be brought." Men will lose nothing while in the true line of present duty. In the words of the poet Whittier in allusion to the scene we here describe: "Simple duty hath no place for fear." The line of duty is the true path for all to walk in, come what may.—D. T. TAYLOR, in Boston Journal.

What Harm?

It is often asked, What harm is it for a lady to wear a modest flower? The manner in which the question is put implies that it is unanswerable. To oppose the practice now become general among professing Christians, is denounced as narrow-mindedness and bigotry. A secular paper furnishes us with one answer. It states that fifteen millions of dollars are expended in this country annually, for artificial flowers. Is there no harm in spending this enormous sum every year for that which can possibly answer no other purpose except to minister to vanity and pride?

What should a denomination professing the self-denying religion of Jesus think of their piety when the men spend more money for tobacco, and the women for artificial flowers, than they can raise by every possible effort for the conversion of the heathen? Is this a mark of spiritual life? "Where shall the line be drawn?" Where the Bible draws it. There can be no mistake. Pass over this line, and who shall say where to stop? "Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel: but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible; even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." 1 Pet. 3: 3, 4.

PRIDE often leads us to put the false light of our own understandings in the place of truth; we think we love it, when we love only our prejudices and our own thoughts.

SATIRE is a glass in which the beholder sees everybody's face but his own.

THE BELIEVER'S HOPE.

Jer. 23:6; Heb. 6:17-20.

My hope is built on nothing less
Than Jesus' blood and righteousness;
I dare not trust the sweetest frame,
But wholly lean on Jesus' name.
On Christ, the solid rock, I stand;
All other ground is sinking sand.

When darkness seems to veil his face,
I rest on his unchanging grace;
In every high and stormy gale,
My anchor holds within the veil.
On Christ, the solid rock I stand;
All other ground is sinking sand.

His oath, his covenant, and blood,
Support me in the 'whelming flood,
When all around on earth gives way,
He then is all my hope and stay.
On CHRIST, the solid rock, I stand;
All other ground is sinking sand.

The Sermon.

I charge thee therefore, before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom; PREACH THE WORD. 2 Tim. 4:12.

NOAH'S TIME AND OURS.

Christ's Coming Near, Even at the Doors.

BY ELDER JAMES WHITE.

TEXT: "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree. When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things know that it is near, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away. But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of Heaven, but my Father only. But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Matt. 24:32-37.

No truth of inspiration can be more clearly stated than that God reveals his designs to his prophets, that men and nations may be warned before their accomplishment. "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." Amos 3:7. Before visiting men and nations with judgments, God has sent forth warnings sufficient to enable the believing to escape his wrath, and to condemn those who have not heeded the warning. This was the case before the flood. "By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark for the saving of his house, by the which he condemned the world." Heb. 11:7.

At a later period, when the nations had become sunken in idolatry and crime, and the destruction of wicked Sodom was determined, the Lord said, "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do, seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him?" Gen. 18:17, 18. And due notice was given to righteous Lot, who, with his daughters, was preserved; and none, even in that guilty city, perished without due warning. Lot evidently warned the people; and, in thus communing with them, was "vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked." 2 Pet. 2:7, 8. When he warned his sons-in-law, "he seemed as one that mocked." Gen. 19:14. And when "the men of the city, even the men of Sodom, compassed the house round, both old and young, all the people from every quarter," Lot warned them, and entreated them to desist from their wickedness. And they at once did that which all sinners, since the days of righteous Lot, have been disposed to do to those who faithfully warn them of their sins; namely, they charged him with being a judge.

Before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, a forerunner was sent to prepare the way before the Lord. Those who did not receive Christ were rejected, "because," as he said to Jerusalem, when warning the people of the destruction of their city and temple, "thou knewest not the time of thy visitation." Luke 19:44. We have on record the Lord's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem during the time of the generation that rejected him, which was fulfilled in less than forty years from the time of his crucifixion. And, that the Christians in Judea might escape its impending doom, they were told that when they should "see Jerusalem compassed with armies," or, as recorded by Matthew, "the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place," they were to "flee to the mountains." Luke 21:20; Matt. 24:15. They heeded the admonition, and escaped in safety to Pella.

Such is the testimony of inspiration respecting the dealings of God with his people in past ages. And it cannot be supposed that he will change his course relative to the future, when that future is to realize the crowning consummation of all prophetic declarations.

We accept the Bible as a revelation from Heaven. What God has revealed in that book, let no man call a mystery, or a secret of the Almighty. "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us, and to our children forever." Deut. 29:29. If the sacred Scriptures do not designate any period in particular for the second appearing of Christ, then men should at once abandon the search for proofs of his soon coming. But if prophecy, in a most harmonious manner, does point to the period of that great event, and if there is evidence that "it is near, even at the doors," the subject at once assumes vast importance.

Can anything be learned from the Bible relative to the period of the second advent? is a question unsettled in many minds. This is a grave inquiry; and, from the nature of the subject, is worthy of close investigation and a candid answer. It is a matter of painful regret that many, under the influence of popular prejudice, have decided that the period of the second advent is a secret, hidden with the Almighty. While these may scarcely be reached with this subject, as long as they remain under the influence of those religious teachers who denounce all investigation of it as prying into the secrets of the Almighty, there is still a larger class who wait for evidence before deciding. It is with ardent hope of benefiting these that we write.

When the disciples inquire, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Jesus does not reprove them for inquiring into that which was purposely hidden from all men; but he answers that question in the most definite manner. He even states that there should be signs of that event, and adds, "When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." The simple fact that the Lord mentions signs of his second advent is the best proof possible that his people were not to remain ignorant of the relative nearness of the event. Add to this evidence his declaration that when these signs should be seen, his people should know that it was near, even at the doors, and the case becomes an exceedingly strong one.

The prophecies, especially those of Daniel and John, clearly point to the period of the second coming of Christ, but do not give the definite time of that event. Some of the prophetic periods reach to the time of the end. Others extend still further down very near the end itself, to an event of which we shall speak when we consider the subject of the sanctuary of the eighth chapter of Daniel. But none of the periods of Daniel reach to the second appearing of Christ.

The scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were given by inspiration of God for our instruction, faith, and practice. The prophetic numbers of Daniel and John are a part of that inspired word, and were especially designed to guide the people of God in the solemn warning to the people of the last generation to prepare for the coming of the Son of man. And having reached the period to which the prophecies distinctly point, as the time of expectation, preparation, waiting, and watching, we should feel the force of that class of admonitory declarations from Christ, especially applicable to our time, like these words in Mark 13:33: "Take ye heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is."

The definite time of the second advent of Christ is purposely hidden from man. "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of Heaven; but my Father only." Many hastily conclude from this text that nothing whatever may be ascertained relative to the period of the second advent. But, in taking this position, they greatly err, in that they make this class of texts prove too much, even for their unbelief, and which at the same time arrays these declarations against others uttered by the Saviour, the most plain and pointed. We object to this position:

1. Because our Lord, after stating that the sun should be darkened, and that the moon should not give her light, and that the stars should fall from heaven, gives the following forcible parable, and makes the most distinct application of it to this subject. He says: "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." Verses 32, 33. No figure should exceed the fact illustrated in a single particular. This being the case in the parable of the fig-tree, the point becomes an exceedingly clear one. No language can be more direct. No proof can be more complete. With all that certainty with which we know that summer is nigh when we see the buds and the leaves shoot forth from the trees in spring, may we know that Christ is at the doors. The most daring unbelief will hardly venture to deny these words of the Son of God, and assert that nothing can be known of the period of his second coming.

2. Because our Lord declares that as the days of Noah were, so should also the coming of the Son of man be. Said God to Noah, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh; yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years." Gen. 6:3. The period of the flood was given to the patriarch. And under the direct providence of God, he prepared the ark and warned the people. So the fulfilling prophecies and the signs distinctly declare that the second coming of Christ is at the doors, and the solemn message of warning has gone forth.

3. Those who claim that the text proves that nothing may be known of the period of the second advent make it prove too much. As recorded by Mark, the declaration reads: "But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in Heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." If the text proves that men will know nothing of the period of the second advent, it also proves that angels will know nothing of it, and also that the Son will know nothing of it, till the event takes place! This position proves too much, therefore, proves nothing to the point. Christ will know of the period of his second advent to this world. The holy angels, who wait around the throne of Heaven to receive messages relative to the part they act in the salvation of men, will know of the time of this closing event of salvation. And so will the waiting, watching people of God understand. An old English version of the passage reads, "But that day and hour no man maketh known, neither the angels which are in Heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." This is the correct reading, according to several of the ablest critics of the age. The word know is used in the same sense here that it is by Paul, in 1 Cor. 2:2: "For I determined not to know [make known] anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." Men will not make known the day and hour, angels will not make it known, neither will the Son; but the Father will make it known.

Says Campbell, "Macknight argues that the term know is here used as a causative, in the Hebrew sense of the conjugation hiphil, that is, to make known. . . . His [Christ's] answer is just equivalent to saying, The Father will make it known when it pleases him; but he has not authorized man, angel, or the Son, to make it known. Just in this sense Paul uses the term know: 1 Cor. 2:2: 'I came to you making known the testimony of God; for I determined to make known nothing among you but a crucified Christ.'"

Albert Barnes, in his Notes on the Gospels, says, "Others have said that the verb rendered knoweth means sometimes to make known, or to reveal, and that the passage means, 'that day and hour none maketh known, neither the angels, nor the Son, but the Father.' It is true the word has sometimes that meaning, as 1 Cor. 2:2."

The Father will make known the time. He gave the period of the flood to Noah, which well represents the proclamation of the second advent, given in connection with the evidence of the termination of the periods of Daniel, during the great second advent movement. And when the patriarch's work of warning and building was finished, God said to him, "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." "For yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights."

So when the waiting, watching, toiling time shall be finished, and the saints shall all be sealed, and shut in with God, then will the voice of the Father from Heaven make known the definite time.

As we look back to the great movement upon the second advent question and its disappointment, and to the numerous efforts to adjust the prophetic periods by many of the first-day Adventists since that time, and the numerous disappointments which have followed, we can but feel the force of the words of the prophet: "Son of man, what is that proverb that ye have in the land of Israel, saying, The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth? Tell them therefore, Thus saith the Lord God: I will make this proverb to cease, and they shall no more use it as a proverb in Israel; but say unto them, The days are at hand, and the effect of every vision. For there shall be no more any vain vision nor flattering divination within the house of Israel. For I am the Lord; I will speak, and the word that I shall speak shall come to pass; it shall be no more prolonged; for in your days, O rebellious house, will I say the word, and will perform it, saith the Lord God." Eze. 12:22-25.

"I will speak," saith the Lord, "and the word that I shall speak shall come to pass." The voice of God will be heard from on high in the midst of the awful scenes just preceding the second advent. "And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air, and there came a great voice out of the temple of Heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done." Rev. 16:17. See also Joel 3:16; Jer. 25:30.

The burden of the prophecy of Ezekiel, quoted above, evidently is time. "The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth." God will make this proverb to cease, by speaking himself. In this way the Father will make known the time, a work not given into the hands of men, angels, nor even the Son.

The present is emphatically the waiting, watching time. It is the especial period of the patience of the saints. Rev. 14:12. In definite time we would find relief from the state of suspense to which our present position subjects us. The Lord appeals to us thus: "Watch ye therefore; for ye know not when the Master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cockerowing, or in the morning; lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch." Mark 13:35-37.

The time of Christ's coming is near. The signs of his second advent, in the sun, moon, and stars, have been fulfilled.* He is near, even at the doors. "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled." Those who suppose that our Lord here speaks of the generation living who listened to his teachings, should consider the following facts:—

1. It is certainly true that what is embraced in the phrase, "all these things," was not fulfilled in that generation.

2. It could not be the generation living in the days of his flesh, for he said to them (Luke 11:29), "There shall no sign be given it but the sign of Jonas, the prophet."

It is evident that our Lord refers to the generation who were to see the signs fulfilled, and who were to be instructed by the parable of the fig-tree. In this prophetic discourse, he leads the minds of his disciples down over the events of the Christian age, mentions the signs in the sun, moon, and stars, which were to appear in the last generation, and then declares that this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled.

In like manner, Paul carries his brethren forward to the resurrection, when he says, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." 1 Cor. 15:51, 52. Or, "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." 1 Thess. 4:17. The things here mentioned by the apostle did not take place in his day. They have not yet taken place. Notwithstanding, he speaks of them as though they would take place in his day, and he have a part in them.

Also, in like manner is the mind carried backward in Ps. 95:10: "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation." The generation here spoken of provoked the Lord in the wilderness, long before David lived. He goes back and speaks of it as though it were present. In this manner our Lord goes forward, and speaks of the last generation as though it were present.

We do not believe that the phrase, "this generation," marks any definite number of years. Some suppose that our Lord designed to teach that some who were witnesses of the dark day in 1780 would live to witness the second coming of the Saviour. But it is our opinion that the Lord designed to teach that the people who should live at the time of the fulfillment of the last sign (the falling stars of 1833), and should hear the proclamation of the coming of Christ, based partly upon the fulfilled signs, should witness the scenes connected with his coming.

The proclamation of the coming and kingdom of Christ is given to the last generation. God did not send Noah to preach to the next to the last generation before the flood, but to the last. The very generation which was destroyed by the waters of the flood saw Noah build the ark, and heard his warning voice. So God has raised up men to give the solemn warning to the world at the right time to give force to the warning. And the very generation of men that live after the three great signs are fulfilled, and who hear and reject the warning message from Heaven, will drink the cup of the unmingled wrath of God. For such, the seven last plagues are reserved. And those of this very generation who receive the message, suffer disappointments, and endure the trials of the waiting position, will witness the coming of Christ, and exclaim, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us." Isa. 25:9.

With what emphasis our Lord gave utterance to this sentiment. It is a rebuke upon our unbelief. As we read it, God help us to believe it: "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." And as though this were not enough to lead us to unwavering faith, he adds these forcible words: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."

Then follows, in the same chapter, the usual, earnest exhortation of Christ, when speaking of his second coming, to watchfulness, and a readiness for the event. "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. But know this, that if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."

One of the fatal consequences of not watching is distinctly stated in Rev. 3:3: "If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee." The consequence of not watching will be ignorance of the time. And the natural inference is unavoidable that the result of watching will be a knowledge of the time. In answer to the agonizing prayer of the Son of God, "Father, glorify thy name," there came a voice from Heaven, saying, "I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again."

The disciples understood these words from Heaven, while the people that stood by said it thundered. John 12:27-29.

So will the waiting, watching disciples of Christ understand the voice of God when he shall speak from on high. But the unbelieving world will not understand the voice. The prophet Daniel, overwhelmed with what the angel Gabriel had shown him of the closing events of this world's history, inquires, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" Again he earnestly inquires, "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" The angel answers in these emphatic words, "Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly; and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand." Dan. 12:6-10.

In comparing Noah's days and ours, the Lord continues: "For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." A picture of the present condition of the mass of mankind is here drawn. How dark the features! The people of the last generation will be like those before the flood, while the ark was preparing. Noah preached, and warned them of the coming flood, and they mocked. He built the ark, and they scoffed and jeered. He was a preacher of righteousness. His works were calculated to give edge to, and set home to the heart, what he preached. Every righteous sermon, and every blow struck in building the ark, condemned a careless, scoffing world.

As the time drew nearer, the people were more careless, more hardened, more bold and impudent, and their condemnation surer. Noah and his family were alone. And could one family know more than all the world? The ark is a matter of ridicule, and Noah is regarded as a willful bigot. But the Lord calls Noah into the ark. And by the hand of Providence the beasts are led into the ark; and the Lord shuts Noah in. This is regarded at first by the scoffing multitude as something wonderful; but it is soon explained away by the wiser ones so as to calm their fears, and they breathe easier.

The day of expectation finally arrives. The sun rises as usual, and the heavens are clear. "Now where is old Noah's flood?" is heard from a thousand impious lips. The farmer is caring for his herds and lands, and the mechanic is pursuing his work of building. On this very day, some are being joined in marriage. With many, it is a day of unusual feasting and sports. And while all are looking to long years of future prosperity and happiness, suddenly the heavens gather blackness. Fear fills every heart. The windows of heaven open, and the rain in torrents descends. "The fountains of the great deep are broken up," and here and there come gushing up rivers of waters. The valleys are fast filling up, and thousands are swept away in death. Some flee to the highest points of land; but the water fast follows them up. Men bear their wives and children to the mountains, but are obliged to part with them there to drown, while they climb the highest trees. But soon, they, too, are covered with water, so that there is not a resting-place for Noah's dove. All are still in death. Horrid death! made still more horrible by being in consequence of slighted mercy! But where is Noah? Ah! safe in the ark, borne upon the billows. Safe from the flood; for God "shut him in."

By most people, the evidences of the soon coming of Christ are considered insufficient to base faith upon. But the testimony and acts of one man condemned the people destroyed by the flood. The evidences then were sufficient, otherwise the world would not have been condemned. But a hundred times more convincing evidences come pouring in upon us that the day of the Lord is near, and hasteth greatly. We follow down the numerous prophetic chains of Daniel, and of the Revelation, and we find ourselves in every instance standing just before the day of wrath. We see the signs spoken of by prophets, by Christ, and in the epistles fulfilling, or fulfilled. And at the right time, and in the right manner, to fulfill certain prophecies, a solemn message arises in different parts of the world: "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain; let all the inhabitants of the land tremble; for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand." Joel 2:1. Wherever we look, we see prophecy fulfilling. While the knowledge of God and the spirit of holiness are departing, spiritual wickedness, like a flood, covers the land.

But these evidences are considered insufficient to rest faith upon. Well, what kind of evidence would the unbelieving have? "When the signs of the end," says the skeptic, "are fulfilled, they will be so plain that no one can doubt." But if the signs are of such a nature, and are fulfilled in such a manner as to compel all to believe in the coming of Christ, how can it be as it was in the days of Noah? Men were not then compelled to believe. But eight believing souls were saved, while all the world besides sank in their unbelief beneath the waters of the flood. God has never revealed his truth to man in a manner to compel him to believe. Those who have wished to doubt his word have found a wide field in which to doubt, and a broad road to perdition; while those who have wished to believe have ever found everlasting rock upon which to rest their faith.

Just before the end, the world will be hardened in sin, and indifferent to the claims of God. Men will be careless about hearing warning of danger, and blinded by cares, pleasures, and riches. An unbelieving and infidel generation will be eating, drinking, marrying, building, planting, and sowing. It is right to eat and drink to sustain nature; but the sin is in excess and gluttony. The marriage covenant is holy; but God's glory is seldom thought of. Building, planting, and sowing, necessary for convenient shelter, food and clothing, are right; but the world has gone wholly after these things, so that men have no time nor disposition to think of God, Heaven, Christ's coming, and the Judgment. This world is their god, and all their energies of body and mind are devoted to its service. And the evil day is put far away.

The faithful watchman who sounds the alarm as he sees destruction coming, is held up before the people from the pulpits of our land, and by the religious press, as a "fanatic," a "teacher of dangerous heresies;" while in contrast is set forth a long period of peace and prosperity to the church. So the churches are quieted to sleep. The scoffer continues to scoff, and the mocker mocks on. But their day is coming. Thus saith the prophet of God: "Howl ye; for the day of the Lord is at hand; it shall come as a destruction from the Almighty. Therefore shall all hands be faint, and every man's heart shall melt. And they shall be afraid; pangs and sorrows shall take hold of them. . . . Behold the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it." Isa. 13:6-9.

Most dreadful day! And is it near? Yes; it hasteth! It hasteth greatly! What a description given by the prophet! Read it; and as you read, try to feel how dreadful will be that day: "The great day of the Lord is near, it is near, and hasteth greatly, even the voice of the day of the Lord: the mighty man shall cry there bitterly. That day is a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, a day of wasteness and desolation, a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness, a day of the trumpet and alarm against the fenced cities, and against the high towers. And I will bring distress upon men, that they shall walk like blind men, because they have sinned against the Lord: and their blood shall be poured out as dust, and their flesh as the dung. Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath; but the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy; for he shall make even a speedy riddance of all them that dwell in the land." Zeph. 1:14-18.

Now we hear the "peace-and-safety" cry from the pulpit, and all the way along down to the grogshop. "Where is the promise of his coming?" is murmured from the impious lips of a thousand last-day scoffers. But the scene will speedily change. "For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, . . . and they shall not escape." The scoffing of the haughty scoffer will soon be turned to wailing and howling. "The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down; and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day. For the day of the Lord of hosts shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up; and he shall be brought low." Isa. 2:11, 12. "And the slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth: they shall not be lamented, neither gathered, nor buried; they shall be dung upon the ground." Jer. 25:33.

The last plagues, in which is filled up the wrath of God, now bottled up in Heaven, waiting for mercy to finish her last pleadings, will be poured out. Unmingled wrath of Jehovah! And not one drop of mercy? Not one! Jesus will lay off his priestly attire, leave the mercy-seat, and put on the garments of vengeance, never more to offer his blood to wash the sinner from his sins. The angels will wipe the last tear shed over sinners, while the mandate resounds through all Heaven, Let them alone. The groaning, weeping, praying church on earth, who in the last message employs every power to sound everywhere the last note of warning, lest the blood of souls be found in her garments, is now hushed in solemn silence. The Holy Spirit has written within them these prophetic words of their soon-expected Lord: "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Rev. 22:11.

Now the ministers of truth have a message to the people, and gladly speak the words of life. They joyfully toil on, suffer on, and spend their energies in preaching to hearts as hard as steel, hoping that a few may be reached, gathered into the truth, and saved. But then they will have no message. Now their prayers and strong cries go up to Heaven in behalf of sinners. Then they will have no spirit of prayer for them. Now the church says to the sinner, Come; and Jesus stands ready to plead his blood in his behalf, that he may be washed from his sin, and live. But then salvation's hour will be passed, and the sinner will be shut up in darkness and black despair.

It will be a day of mourning, and lamentation, and famine for hearing the words of the Lord. "I will turn your feasts into mourning, and all your songs into lamentation; and I will bring up sackcloth upon all loins, and baldness upon every head; and I will make it as the mourning of an only son, and the end thereof as a bitter day. Behold, the days come, saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord: and they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east; they shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord, and shall not find it." Amos 8:10-12.

Now, the word of the Lord may be heard; but sinners in and out of the churches, with few exceptions, do not prize it. Then, it will not be heard; for the watchmen, set to watch and sound the alarm of danger, will be called down from their high stations. Now, the word of the Lord is carried to the sinner, and offered without money or price; but he treats it carelessly, or, may be, drives the humble servant of Christ from his door. But then will he go in search for it. "They shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east," but they cannot hear it. "They shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord, but shall not find it." From city to city, from State to State, from one country to another, will they go to find a man commissioned of high Heaven to speak the word of the Lord; but such a one is not to be found. All such will then have finished their high commission. The word of the Lord! The word of the Lord! Where can we hear it? is heard in every land. One general wall—the word of the Lord! goes up to Heaven, but the heavens are brass. Then will the people turn and rend the false shepherds, who deceived them with the cry of “peace and safety.” Children will reproach parents for keeping them back from walking in the truth, and parents their children.

The miser now loves his money, and holds it with an iron grasp. But it will be said in that day, “Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days.” James 5:1-3. Now, silver and gold may be used to God’s glory, for the advancement of his cause. But in that day, “they shall cast their silver into the streets, and their gold shall be removed: their silver and their gold shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord.” Eze, 7:19.

The Decay of Conscience.

HERE is a vigorous, searching article from Eld. Chas. G. Finney, president of Oberlin College. It deals unsparingly with the wishy-washy theology of the day which ignores the holy law of God, and has a sort of “love and honey” religion drawn especially from the gospel. The article is from a late issue of the Independent.

G. W. A.

I believe it is a fact generally admitted that there is much less conscience manifested by men and women, in nearly all the walks of life, than there was forty years ago. There is justly much complaint of this, and there seems to be but little prospect of reformation. The rings and frauds and villainies in high and low places, among all ranks of men, are most alarming, and one is almost compelled to ask: “Can nobody be safely trusted?” Now, what is the cause of this degeneracy? Doubtless there are many causes that contribute more or less directly to it; but I am persuaded that the fault is more in the ministry and public press than in any and all things else. It has been fashionable now for many years to ridicule and decry Puritanism. Ministers have ceased, in a great measure, to probe the consciences of men with the spiritual law of God. So far as my knowledge extends, there has been a great letting down and ignoring the searching claims of God’s law, as revealed in his word. This law is the only standard of true morality. “By the law is the knowledge of sin.” The law is the quickener of the human conscience. Just in proportion as the spirituality of the law of God is kept out of view will there be manifest a decay of conscience. This must be the inevitable result. Let ministers ridicule Puritanism, attempt to preach the gospel without thoroughly probing the conscience with the divine law, and this must result in, at least, a partial paralysis of the moral sense.

The error that lies at the foundation of this decay of individual and public conscience originates, no doubt, in the pulpit. The proper guardians of the public conscience have, I fear, very much neglected to expound and insist upon obedience to the moral law. It is plain that some of our most popular preachers are phrenologists. Phrenology has no organ of free will. Hence, it has no moral agency, no moral law and moral obligation in any proper sense of these terms. A consistent phrenologist can have no proper ideas of moral obligation, of moral guilt, blameworthiness, and retribution. Some years since, a brother of one of our most popular preachers heard me preach on the text, “Be ye reconciled to God.” I went on to show, among other things, that being reconciled to God implied being reconciled to the execution of his law. He called on me the next morning, and among other things said that neither himself nor two of his brothers, whom he named, all preachers, had naturally any conscience. “We have,” said he, “no such ideas in our minds of sin, guilt, justice, and retribution, as you and father have.” “We cannot preach as you do upon those subjects.” He continued: “I am striving to cultivate a conscience, and think I begin to understand what it is. But, naturally, neither I nor the two brothers I have named have any conscience.”

Now, these three ministers have repeatedly appeared in their writings before the public. I have read much that they have written, and not unfrequently the sermons of one of them, and have been struck with the manifest want of conscience in his sermons and writings. He is a phrenologist, and, hence, he has in his theological views no free will, no moral agency, and nothing that is really a logical result of free will and moral agency. He can ridicule Puritanism and the great doctrines of the orthodox faith; and, indeed, his whole teaching, so far as it has fallen under my eye, most lamentably shows the want of moral discrimination. I should judge from his writings that the true ideas of moral depravity, guilt, and ill-desert, in the true acceptance of those terms, have no place in his mind. Indeed, as a consistent phrenologist, such ideas have no right to be in his mind. They are necessarily excluded by his philosophy.

I do not know how extensively phrenology has poisoned the minds of ministers of different denominations; but I have observed with pain that many ministers who write for the public press fail to reach the consciences of men. They fail to go to the bottom of the matter and insist upon obedience to the moral law as alone acceptable to God. They seem to me to “make void the law through faith.” They seem to hold up a different standard from that which is inculcated in Christ’s Sermon on the Mount, which was Christ’s exposition of the moral law. Christ expressly taught in that sermon that there was no salvation without conformity to the rule of life laid down in that sermon. True faith in Christ will always and inevitably beget a holy life. But I fear it has become fashionable to preach what amounts to an antinomian gospel. The rule of life promulgated in the gospel is precisely that of the moral law. These four things are expressly affirmed of true faith, of the faith of the gospel:

1. “It establishes the law.”
2. “It works by love.”
3. “It purifies the heart.”
4. “It overcomes the world.”

These are but different forms of affirming that true faith does, as a matter of fact, produce a holy life. If it did not, it would “make void the law.” The true gospel is not preached where obedience to the moral law as the only rule of life is not insisted upon. Wherever there is a failure to do this in the instructions of any pulpit, it will inevitably be seen that the hearers of such mutilated gospel will have very little conscience. We need more Boanergeses or sons of thunder in the pulpit. We need men that will flash forth the law of God like livid lightning and arouse the consciences of men. We need more Puritanism in the pulpit. To be sure, some of the Puritans were extremists. But still, under their teaching, there was a very different state of the individual and public conscience from what exists in these days. Those old, stern, grand vindicators of the government of God would have thundered and lightened until they had almost demolished their pulpits if any such immoralities had shown themselves under their instructions as are common in these days. In a great measure, the periodical press takes its tone from the pulpit. The universal literature of the present day shows conclusively that the moral sense of the people needs toning up, and some of our most fascinating preachers have become the favorites of infidels, skeptics of every grade, Universalists, and the most abandoned characters. And has the offense of the cross ceased, or is the cross kept out of view? Has the holy law of God, with its stringent precept and its awful penalty become popular with unconverted men and women? Or is it ignored in the pulpit, and the preacher praised for that neglect of duty for which he should be despised? I believe the only possible way to arrest this downward tendency in private and public morals is the holding up from the pulpits in this land, with unsparing faithfulness, the whole gospel of God, including as the only rule of life the perfect and holy law of God.

The holding up of this law will reveal the moral depravity of the heart, and the holding forth of the cleansing blood of Christ will cleanse the heart from sin. My beloved brethren in the ministry, is there not a great want in the public inculcations of the pulpit upon this subject? We are set for the defense of the blessed gospel and for the vindication of God’s holy law. I pray you let us probe the consciences of our hearers, let us thunder forth the law and gospel of God until our voices reach the capital of this nation, through our representatives in Congress. It is now very common for the secular papers even to publish extracts of sermons. Let us give the reporters of the press such work to do as will make their ears and the ears of their readers tingle. Let our railroad rings, our stock gamblers, our officials of every grade, hear from its pulpit, if they come within the sound, such wholesome Puritanic preaching as will arouse them to better thoughts and a better life. Away with this milk-and-water preaching of a love of Christ that has no holiness or moral discrimination in it. Away with preaching a love of God that is not angry with sinners every day. Away with preaching a Christ not crucified for sin.

Christ crucified for the sins of the world is the Christ that the people need. Let us rid ourselves of the just imputation of neglecting to preach the law of God until the consciences of men are asleep. Such a collapse of conscience in this land could never have existed if the Puritan element in our preaching had not in a great measure fallen out.

Some years ago, I was preaching in a congregation whose pastor had died some months before. He seemed to have been nearly universally popular with his church and with the community. His church seemed to have almost idolized him. Everybody was speaking his praise and holding him up as an example: and yet, both the church and the community clearly demonstrated that they had had an unfaithful minister, a man who loved and sought the applause of his people. I heard so much of his inculcations and saw so much of the legitimate fruits of his teachings, that I felt constrained to tell the people from the pulpit that they had had an unfaithful minister; that such fruits as were apparent on every side, both within and without the church, could never have resulted from a faithful presentation of the gospel. This assertion would, doubtless, have greatly shocked them had it been made under other circumstances; but, as the way had been prepared, they did not seem disposed to gainsay it. Brethren, our preaching will bear its legitimate fruits. If immorality prevails in the land, the fault is ours in a great degree. If there is a decay of conscience, the pulpit is responsible for it. If the public press lacks moral discrimination, the pulpit is responsible for it. If the church is degenerate and worldly, the pulpit is responsible for it. If the world loses its interest in religion, the pulpit is responsible for it. If Satan rules in our halls of legislation, the pulpit is responsible for it. If our politics become so corrupt that the very foundations of our government are ready to fall away, the pulpit is responsible for it. Let us not ignore this fact, my dear brethren; but let us lay it to heart, and be thoroughly awake to our responsibility in respect to the morals of this nation.

Moral Sleep.

THERE is a state of moral stupor which persons often fall into which resembles sleep, and is sometimes called so in the Bible. Literal sleep is both necessary and useful. But this indifference to our spiritual interests is never a benefit, but always hurtful to those who indulge in it.

When people fall into a state of sound sleep they become insensible. They are not sensible of their own condition. They have no idea of what is passing around them. There may be scenes of the most joyful kind passing around them, but they know nothing of it. So there may be scenes of the deepest sorrow going on within their own dwellings which would excite their sympathies in a wonderful manner if they were awake; but they are not moved in the least, because they are in a state of profound slumber. The robber may be at their bedside ready to take their lives if they should show the least sign of awaking; but they are not at all alarmed, because they are asleep.

So when men are spiritually asleep; they have no just sense of the truths the Bible reveals; no right sense of the “exceeding sinfulness of sin,” or of the awful danger of those who live and die in their sins. They are not sensible of the goodness of God, who “daily loadeth them with benefits.” They are insensible to the amazing love of Christ. They are not really sensible of the fact that their friends and neighbors are on the high road to perdition. They do not realize that their spiritual foes are secretly lying in wait, ready at any moment to shoot them. As men in literal slumber are not aware how fast time flies, and are astonished on awaking to find that it is so far advanced, so moral sleepers have no idea how soon their day of probation will be over, and the great day of God come on.

Sleep is a state of forgetfulness. However active and earnest a man may be in the labors of life during the day, when night comes on and he has fallen into a sound sleep, he forgets all the toils of the day; he forgets his joys and sorrows and anxieties, also the success or want of success that has attended his labors during the day. These interest him no more till he awakes.

So, in a spiritual sense, when persons sleep, they forget many important things that have occurred in their past history. They forget the “wormwood and the gall” they tasted, when they felt their “iniquities going over their heads,” as a heavy burden too heavy for them to bear. They have forgotten, too, the joys they felt when first the Saviour’s pardoning blood was applied to their hearts. It may well be said to them now, “Where is the blessedness ye spoke of?”

The apostle Peter had in his mind the case of such when, writing of the Christian graces, he said, “He that lacketh these things is blind, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins.” And John, writing to one of the seven churches, said, “Thou hast left thy first love. Remember from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works.” Rev. 2:4, 5. They had forgotten the high place to which they had been raised by the grace of God, and so were called upon to remember it. Many are very forgetful now. They have left their first love. They have but a feeble idea of the joys of communion with God. They walk in darkness.

Again, sleep is oftentimes a state of misapprehensiveness. This is when people dream. They seem to themselves to see and hear and act, but really they sleep. Sometimes they think themselves rich and happy, when really they are poor and miserable.

So it is spiritually with people who are dreaming. They suppose themselves to be rich and increased in goods, having need of nothing; when in truth they are “poor and miserable and blind and naked.” They think they are in a good condition, when the True Witness threatens to spue them out of his mouth, so loathsome are they in his sight. They are not aware of their true condition, nor of the condition of their dearest friends, their children, nor of the world at large. They act as if this world was worth more than the world to come; as if the approbation of men was of more value than the approbation of God. They feel more anxious to have their children become respectable in the eyes of their fellows, and fashionable in their attire, than to have them adorned with “the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.” They are ready to invest much money in worldly enterprises, but only a little in the cause of God and humanity. As they are in this dreamy state, they seem to feel that the enjoyment of things seen by the natural eye are of more importance than the “eternal weight of glory,” which God has promised to those who love him.

Finally, persons when asleep are not prepared to engage in the active labors of life. Just so it is in the cause of God. Those who are in a sleeping or sleepy condition are unprepared to labor successfully in the cause of truth. If they talk of these things, it is with so little earnestness that it produces no feeling. If they undertake to warn the world of its coming doom, it is done so easily that no one is alarmed. God’s servants are called upon to “Cry aloud and spare not, to lift up their voice like a trumpet,” to “show the people their sins.”

It is high time now to awake out of sleep. The predicted signs of the Lord’s coming have been seen. The last message of mercy to mankind is being given. The harvest of the earth will soon be reaped. Oh! how applicable to us the words of the Saviour, “What I say unto you I say unto all, watch.” C. A. OSGOOD.

they did not commence in the year named, and that papal supremacy did not there begin.

This is the argument. It has two fatal defects: 1. The 1335 days do not mark the setting up of the papacy. They date from the taking away of the daily abomination (paganism) to set up the abomination that maketh desolate (papacy). Dan. 12:11, margin. But paganism was taken away preparatory to the setting up of the papacy, in 508, thirty years before the papacy was established. 2. The 1335 days do not extend to the coming of Christ. No prophetic period extends to that point. This is the great fallacy on which all time-setters founder. It is impossible to set a time for Christ to appear. We have no data on which to base a calculation. The prophetic periods, all of which can be located without difficulty, bring us to great events to transpire in close connection with the coming of Christ, so that we know that it is near. Daniel stands in his lot (the decisions of the investigative Judgment, not the lot of his inheritance—that is another word in the Hebrew) before Christ comes.

Feeling himself driven from 538, the writer looks for another date, and finds none till he comes to 553. The 1335 days, if commenced in that year, extend to 1888. But the 1260 dating from that point reach to 1813 with nothing whatever to mark their termination. This throws him into perplexity; and there we leave him racking his inventive powers to find a new adjustment for his periods. So long as men will ignore this fundamental fact that no prophetic period reaches to the coming of Christ, so long we suppose they will go on with the work of setting new times for that event—a work futile in itself and a reproach and disgrace to the Advent name. How a Roman Catholic Feels about Us.

THE Western Home Journal, a Roman Catholic paper published in Detroit, Mich., in its issue of March 7, 1874, thus speaks of us:—

"Incomparable! If you want to read the most nonsensical, bigoted, sanguinary, and ridiculously ignorant paper, not only of the United States, but of the round globe, just read the 'Advent Review' of Battle Creek, Mich. In fact, it exhibits the most delicious mental food for lunatics, fanatics, and all kinds of visionary ignoramus. Here are a few specimens of this 'highly enlightened' gospel-paper doctrines, truly and really printed in the edition of Feb. 17: 'The Catholic Church, the great beast of the prophecies, has butchered fifty millions of saints for the faith.' The Roman mother has ordered the adoration of images. The priests of the papacy forgive sins even before they are committed.' People indulging in such sublime stuff, even if they are so styled 'Reverend Pastors of the true Gospel,' surpass in ignorance the cannibals and in wild frenzy the worshipers of the fetich. We would not have believed such nonsense possible in the nineteenth century. There are evidently people whose want of shame is more to be wondered at than their want of knowledge. To this description belong the managers of the incomparable Battle Creek Advent Review."

The reader will perceive the point more clearly when we remind him that the number of the REVIEW referred to above is the one which contains the illustrations of the four beasts of Dan. 7, the last one, in two forms, representing pagan and papal Rome. In preparing that illustration we endeavored to throw into it the spirit of Daniel's description. He calls it a beast diverse from all others, strong exceedingly, terrible and exceeding dreadful, with teeth of iron and nails of brass. This it seems was too much for the amiability of our Catholic friend, and in attempting to disprove the application of that symbol to his church he unwittingly strengthens it by manifesting the same spirit which that beast, judging from an inspection of his countenance, seems to possess.

But the Journal does not regard the REVIEW as such a nonsensical, ridiculous sheet as it pretends. If it does it would pass us by unnoticed. What sensible person would care for the ignorance of a cannibal, or the ravings of a fetich worshiper? And it must have cost no little effort to get up such an amount of venom, unless it deals in that commodity so largely that it has a stock always on hand.

We wonder if the statements above quoted are a specimen of Roman Catholic veracity. Although it puts them in quotation marks, and says they were "truly and really printed in the edition of Feb. 17," not one of the expressions quoted occurs in that paper! It is said, to be sure, that the Catholic church has been a persecuting power; and history abundantly proves it. Happily it is now restrained by the better spirit of its neighbors. It is said also that they worshiped images and granted indulgences; and they must admit these facts or repudiate their own writers and historians. But we suppose we must excuse their false statements on the ground that their beautiful religion allows them to lie without restraint when dealing with a heretic.

The application of the fourth beast of Dan. 7 to Rome, and the second phase of it, to the papacy, is so apparent that it cannot be reasonably disputed. It can be answered only in the way the Journal has attempted in the foregoing quotation. It has done as well, perhaps, as could be expected under the circumstances. U. S.

More Authority for Sunday.

THIS is found, not in the Bible, but in a French letter which a Protestant French lady of Seneca, Illinois, handed me a short time since. This letter claims to have been written by "God, the Almighty, the Lord of Heaven and earth." It purports to have been communicated to man in a wonderful manner. It claims to have been first seen suspended in the air and magnificently written in gold letters, before the city of Magdenburg, Prussia, June 2, 1816. It opens with a curse against those who labor on Sunday, and reads thus:—

"Whosoever worketh on Sunday, or the Lord's day, is cursed. I, Jesus Christ, ordain that you should not work on Sunday, but that you should spend that day in going to church with that devotion which is requisite. . . . Thou shalt labor six days, but shalt sanctify the seventh, which is the Lord's day. Consider that I created heaven and earth in six days, and that it is in my power to destroy them: If thou dost not sanctify the Lord's day, I shall send you war and pestilence, or I shall send you incendiaries, inundations, and famine. I shall poison your fields and chasten you with swellings as I chastened the Egyptians. If you do not repent, but continue to sin before the Lord, the Eternal, I shall punish you in the abyss of hell as I punished Sodom and Gomorrah."

"I, Jesus Christ, command you to not work late Saturday night, but to rest, that you may be able to get to church early Sunday to confess your sins, repent sincerely and reform, that you may be forgiven. Labor not for gold and silver, or for great riches which lead to perdition. Abstain from fornication, which is abhorred by Heaven, and will be punished in time and in eternity. Cease to swear and to speak evil of others. Keep your children under strict discipline. A slack discipline will prove their ruin. And you who fail in your duty shall be punished in body and in soul. Thou rich man, cause the poor to rejoice. Thou virtuous poor shalt be recompensed by my blessings. . . . Children, honor your parents by your piety, and you will receive the crown."

"I, Jesus Christ, Son of God, have written this letter with my own hand. Whosoever shall contradict it shall be excluded from my power and favor, and shall be cut off from the Christian church. He who shall have this letter in his house and shall not communicate it to the children of men, shall be cursed with his house. But if your sins are as numerous as the sand of the sea or as the blades of grass in all the earth, they shall be forgiven you, if you repent sincerely and reform. I shall call you to a strict account in the day of Judgment if you have had this letter in your houses and have not communicated it to others. If you have committed this error, you shall not be protected against inundations, against incendiaries, or against the lightning; but he who shall communicate this letter to his neighbor and shall keep it constantly on his person through love for me, to keep my ordinances, such a one shall be recompensed publicly."

"Communication made by an angel, June 2, 1816."

I was surprised to learn that even some Protestants in France as well as in this country respect this letter and preserve it as a choice relic. But I do not know as this is a greater error than to reject such documents and yet receive Sunday for the Sabbath on the authority of the Roman Catholic church. The curses that are here threatened are calculated to frighten the timid, who are kept in darkness, while the blessings that are promised, being associated with some good instructions, will lead some truly conscientious, but uninformed, souls to render implicit obedience to all that is here enjoined.

But if the Bible is not a sufficient rule of faith and practice, and if the Catholic church is the only authority for the first-day Sabbath, why is not the letter before us as good argument in favor of Sunday-keeping as any that can be produced? Here is a letter claiming to have been written by God, the Father, and by the very hand of Jesus Christ! At the same time, it is a "communication made by an angel!" It also presents curses and blessings which relate to this life and to that which is to come. If you obey it strictly you will have the privilege of going early to a Roman Catholic church every Sunday morning, and of confessing your sins to a Catholic priest. And you may derive as much virtue in carrying this letter on your person as you would in wearing any other relic of the Catholic church. Why should not those Protestants who so scrupulously observe the first day, knowing that they have no other authority than the Church of Rome for their practice, receive this document, and turn Catholic?

The first lesson I ever learned on the authority of the change of the Sabbath was in an interview with a Roman Catholic priest eighteen years ago this winter. I claimed that as a true Protestant I took the Bible and the Bible alone as my rule of faith and practice, and promised that if he could show me that I did not follow the Bible, I would correct my faith and practice. The priest replied: "We, the Catholic church, take the Bible and tradition. We have changed the Sabbath to the first day by our tradition, and not by the Bible, which says not a word in favor of a change of the Sabbath. You Protestants are very glad to adopt this relic of our tradition. Why not come wholly over to the mother church?"

Thank God for this lesson, and that I was disposed to correct myself by the Bible on the Sabbath question.

The Breath of Lives.

NOT long since, I heard a funeral sermon preached by a minister of the M. E. church, who mentioned that in Gen. 2:7, "the breath of lives" (plural) is said to have been given to man, and he affirmed that a two-fold life was given to him, or, rather, two lives, one of the body and one of the soul or spirit. And then he challenged the world to prove that it did not mean that man was possessed of immortality or an immortal soul! But "the world" probably thought it was unbecoming to accept a challenge at a funeral, as it certainly was to give one, and therefore it very properly held its peace.

It may be worth while to look at this point to see if any conclusion can be rightfully drawn from this text in favor of natural immortality.

1. The man who became a living soul, not to whom an immortal soul was imparted, was made of the dust of the ground. It was into this man, made of dust, that the breath of lives was breathed.

2. That nothing can be claimed on the term "living soul" is proved in that the same term is applied to the creeping things of the earth, in the first chapter of Genesis.

3. That the plural—lives—is not decisive of man's immortality is shown in Gen. 6:17, and 7:21, 22, wherein the same form of expression is used in reference to the lower animals. The last cited text is very strong—"the breath of the spirit of lives," applied both to man and to other animals.

4. It must be admitted that man was deprived of access to the tree of life in order to the execution of the sentence that he should die; that is, he was deprived of the means of perpetuating his life. Said the Lord, "Lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever; therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden."

5. It is clearly shown by this that if man had been permitted to eat of the tree of life, he would have lived forever, or have been immortal; and that he could not continue to live because not permitted to eat of that tree.

6. But the word life in the phrase, "tree of life," is always in the Hebrew in the plural; literally, tree of lives; and therefore if the plural in the breath of lives proves that two lives were given to man, the plural in the tree of lives proves that the continuance of these lives was suspended on his partaking of the tree. If he had a plurality of lives, yet when he was shut out from the tree of lives lest he should live forever, evidently both or all his lives were involved in the loss.

7. Therefore it is seen that it is not enough for the advocates of natural immortality to merely show that lives, plural, is found in Gen. 2:7, nor to assert that immortal life was imparted; but it must be proved that one of his lives was immortal or eternal, and that it could not be affected by his being deprived of the tree of lives, which is contrary to the obvious meaning of Gen. 3:22-24.

8. It is neither frank nor honorable to draw a conclusion from an expression or a word in the original which a harmony of the original plainly contradicts. But if they who put forth the claim referred to, do not know what the harmony of the original is, it does not increase our respect for their frankness or ability to hear them "challenge the world" to meet them on a point on which they are so evidently ignorant.

9. The more this subject is examined the more evident it appears that man is a weak, perishing mortal, entirely dependent on Jesus Christ for eternal life, which will be given to the righteous in the first resurrection, over which "the second death hath no power;" and that men, instead of exalting themselves and boasting of their strength and glory, would do well to acknowledge that they are vanity, and of the dust, and pray as one of old, "Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is, that I may know how frail I am." May a sense of our frailty lead us to seek "eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Experience and Character of the Living Christians at the Second Advent.

WE often hear it asserted that it is of no importance to us to know when the advent is near, if we are only prepared for it; as if one could live in the day of God's preparation, amidst the fulfillment of signs in heaven and on earth, and pass the last conflict between truth and error, and the last persecution of the church in the time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation upon the earth, from which all of God's people are to be delivered in connection with the resurrection from the dead, Dan. 12:1, 2, and not be aware that the end is at hand, and yet be a believer in Christ and the Bible! and hence perfectly prepared for what is coming, prepared for the last trial and the final deliverance!

For the benefit of those who entertain such a view, we call their attention to the fact that the experience of the last of the church is clearly foretold in prophecy. In the first place, from the fulfillment of signs in the sun, moon, and stars, they will know that the advent is near, even at the doors. Matt. 24:29-35. Then, the prophetic numbers being unsealed, which were sealed up to the time of the end, a message is heard to the ends of the earth, "Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come," the fall of Babylon is announced, and the final warning is given against the worship of the beast and his image, and the impending day of wrath proclaimed. Rev. 14:6-12. The order of events is foretold, the programme is laid down, the experience of the church is clearly foretold. What believer in God and his word can pass through all this, and still not be aware that the end is at hand? Who, without the benefit of hearing and heeding the last warning, will be all prepared to be delivered in the day of wrath? The living church, at the second advent, will have passed this, their foretold experience. Can they be believers who can pass all this and not know it?

Again, the character of the church at the second advent is foretold. They will be distinguished from merely nominal Christians from the fact that they "keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." The fact that under a terrific warning a people are tested out from nominal Christianity that keep the commandments of God is proof positive that the others are not keeping them. This separation, effected by the last message, will lead to the last persecution. This persecution will come upon them because they "keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." Rev. 12:17; 13:15. From this they will be delivered, and they will stand with the Lamb upon Mount Zion, because they have his Father's name written in their foreheads, and not the mark of the name of the beast. Rev. 14:1. Here are two distinguishing characteristics.

1. They keep the commandments of God. If any desire to know what commandments are here referred to, the answer is, The very ones on which the Christian world is divided—the ones which are now in agitation among the people. Nothing can be plainer than this. Let those who would obey God keep those commandments of God which are in dispute. There is no dispute about the ceremonial or Jewish law. The contention is on the moral law or ten commandments. These, then, are the commandments. The Sabbath of this law is especially the bone of contention. This, then, is of special importance at the present time. And what is the only safe course? Keep the commandments.

2. The remnant of the church are distinguished from the others by having "the testimony of Jesus Christ." This is defined to be "the spirit of prophecy." Rev. 19:10. Compare Rev. 22:9. This is their second characteristic, and the second ground of the final war upon them. Amid the false spirit manifestation of these days, where will the true be found? The answer is, With those who keep the commandments of God. They will certainly be found with the last of the true church.

The Dark Day.

THE testimony of a living witness of the dark day, May 19, 1780.

The venerable centenarian, Miss Hannah Worcester of Berwick was one hundred and one years old on Saturday, and appears to be in the enjoyment of perfect health. She has never been troubled with sickness of any consequence, has never taken snuff or used tobacco in any form, and believes it to be "poor business for any one." She has a remarkably clear voice, articulates every word distinctly, and has sound front teeth. She seems to take pleasure in telling of things that happened five and ninety years ago, and remembers well how she watched at the window for the return of her father from the Revolutionary war. She remembers, though she was only eight years of age at the time, the dark day, May 19, 1780, and said it commenced to grow dark in the middle of the forenoon. Candles were lighted, hens went to roost, and all day long the darkness continued. She has seen the cars, but never rode in them. She has a good appetite. She sits up usually from ten in the morning until after dark, and sometimes does not retire until nine o'clock. —Boston Transcript, 1874.

TRUTH is tough. It will not break, like a bubble, at a touch; nay, you may kick it about all day, like a foot-ball, and it will be round and full at evening. Does not Mr. Bryant say that truth gets well if she is run over by a locomotive, while error dies of lockjaw if she scratches her finger?

"FORWARD."

"Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward."

FORWARD! be our watchword,
Steps and voices joined;
Seek the things before us,
Not a look behind;
Burns the fiery pillar
At our army's head,
Who shall dream of shrinking,
By Jehovah led!
Forward through the desert,
Through the toil and fight;
Jordan flows before us,
Zion beams with light!

Forward, when in childhood
Buds the infant mind;
All through youth and manhood
Not a thought behind,
Speed through realms of nature,
Climb the steps of grace;
Faint not, till around us
Gleams the Father's face.
Forward all the lifetime,
Climb from high to high,
Till the head be hoary,
Till the eve be light.

Forward, flock of Jesus,
Salt of all the earth;
Till each yearning purpose
Spring to glorious birth;
Sick, they ask for healing,
Blind, they grope for day;
Pour upon the nations
Wisdom's loving ray.
Forward out of error,
Leave behind the night;
Forward through the darkness,
Forward into light!

Glories upon glories
Hath our God prepared,
By the souls that love him
One day to be shared;
Eye hath not beheld them,
Ear hath never heard,
Nor of these hath uttered
Thought or speech or word.
Forward, marching eastward
Where the heaven is bright;
Till the veil is lifted,
Till our faith be sight.

Far o'er yon horizon
Rise the city towers,
Where our God abideth,—
That fair home is ours;
Flash the streets with jasper,
Shine the gates with gold,
Flows the gladdening river,
Shedding joys untold.
Thither, onward thither,
In Jehovah's might!
Pilgrims, to your country,
Forward into light.

THOUGHTS ON PROPHECY,

And the Immediate Coming of Christ, and the Inconsistencies of the Opposition Exposed.

BY ELDER D. T. BOURDEAU.

Taken mainly from the summing-up Speech by Eld. Bourdeau in a French Discussion between himself and Eld. Auger, held at St. Anne, Ill., on the evenings of July 5-9, 1874.

I. Possibility and importance of understanding the prophecies.

1. The prophecies are a part of the revelation of God to man, and Moses affirms that "the secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children forever." Deut. 29:29.

2. They form an important part of those Scriptures which St. Paul declares to be "profitable" (2 Tim. 3:16), and which can therefore be understood.

3. As history given in advance, they (especially those fulfilling in our day) furnish a stronger evidence in favor of the divine origin of the Scriptures than miracles performed in Bible times; for, to substantiate miracles performed in past ages, we simply have the written testimony, whereas in favor of prophecy fulfilling in our times, we have besides the written testimony our own senses to seize the events meeting the prophecy; and thus prophecy is made a living miracle, whereby God is made especially near to us, and speaks to us as it were face to face.

4. They are not dark sayings, but are compared to a candle which shines in a dark place. 2 Pet. 1:19. As such, they show us our whereabouts and our dangers; and certainly we would not refuse a light in a dark night; neither should we refuse the light of prophecy.

5. Christ and Peter command and exhort us to pay attention to and be mindful of the prophecies. Matt. 24:15; 2 Pet. 3:2.

6. According to the English translation, the Holy One of Israel, our Maker, commands us to ask and command him concerning things to come, Isa. 45:11, as though it was our privilege to understand them.

7. Accordingly, ancient prophets, as examples of the church, prayed, wept, and fasted, to get an insight into future events. Dan. 9:3; Rev. 5:4, etc.

8. A blessing is pronounced on those who read and on those who hear what is said to be the most difficult portions of prophecy; Rev. 1:3; but none can be blessed in reading the prophecies or in hearing them read, unless they can be understood.

9. Without the prophecies it would be difficult to prove that Christ is the Messiah, and Christ and the apostles frequently appealed to the prophecies to establish this doctrine.

10. Prophecy is the burden of at least twenty books of the Bible, besides being interspersed in nearly every other book of Holy Writ; so that were the prophecies excluded from the Scriptures, we would be left with a sieve-like Bible much smaller than our present Bible. This would be taking away from the words of this blessed book. Rev. 22:19. Yet this is virtually done by saying that the prophecies are forbidden ground, and cannot be understood.

11. They are very firm, 2 Pet. 1:19, and therefore we can depend upon them.

12. They are practical, showing the duties of men in different ages of the world. Rev. 1:3; 22:10, 14, and consequently it is highly necessary to comprehend them.

13. We see the importance that God attaches to them in the scriptural fact that "surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." Amos 3:7.

14. At the time of the end, or at the time determined, knowledge was to increase on the prophecies, Dan. 12, and the seal which had been placed on some of the prophecies was to be removed by the transpiring of events fulfilling them. Rev. 10.

II. On precision or positiveness.

Although we are forbidden to be positive as to the day and hour of Christ's second coming, yet,

1. We may be positive as to the meaning of prophecies relating to Christ's coming when those prophecies are either fulfilled or fulfilling; otherwise such prophecies were written in vain, unless for the purpose of puzzling men's brains.

2. It is necessary to be positive in regard to God's prophetic word at the close of each dispensation and when solemn and important events, involving the ruin or salvation of men, according as they relate themselves to them, are about to transpire; as, for example, before the flood, before the destruction of the cities of the plain, before the first and second destructions of Jerusalem, before Christ's first and second advents. If God now deals with men as he has in past ages, he certainly will give them through his word means of determining when the coming of Christ is impending.

3. The Scriptures teach plainly that a message relative to the proximity of the Judgment and the coming of Christ shall be proclaimed by the church living at the close of this dispensation; Rev. 14:6; 10; Matt. 25; but such a message can never be heralded, and consequently the scriptures foretelling its proclamation are spurious if it be true that the church may never be positive in regard to the near coming of Christ. Then men are at full liberty to reject the closing portions of all those long chains of prophecy that bring us to the end of the gospel age. They may also repudiate all those isolated and short prophecies that are thrown in to indicate the approach of the day of God. Then the unfaithful servant who smites or opposes those who proclaim the coming of Christ near, Matt. 24, needs no censure from his Lord; and the mockers who were to arise in the last days, 2 Pet. 3:3, 4, saying, "Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning," should mock on; for no one can know anything about the nearness of Christ's coming, as there are no changes to indicate it. But,

4. When the great signs of the coming of Christ in the sun, moon, and stars, have appeared, we are commanded to "know that the Son of man [French translation] is near, even at the doors." Matt. 24, and we may also then know that we have reached the last generation, with the same certainty that we know that summer is nigh when the trees put forth their leaves in the spring.

5. It was the precision and positiveness of Noah and his family that proved their salvation, because it was connected with faith in God's prophetic word which led to a reform and to good works; while a lack of precision on the part of those who rejected Noah's preaching, based on God's word, led to unbelief and ruin. It was so at Christ's first coming; and will be the same at the time of his second coming. Luke 18:8. Indefiniteness as to the nearness of Christ's coming, when that coming is impending, excludes the use that is made in the prophecies of the swift approaching day of God as a strong incentive to repentance and holy living, and as a means of testing the genuineness of the love of the church for her returning Lord; for if we love the Lord, we shall long to see him. It is therefore as necessary to preach the immediate coming of Christ in our day, if the special signs of his coming have appeared, as it was to preach the approach of the deluge in the days of Noah, or to proclaim the coming of the Messiah in the time of John the Baptist.

III. Evidences of Christ's soon coming.

1. The gospel has been preached in all the world as a witness to all nations, and the end may be expected. Matt. 24:14. Historical authorities: J. O. Choules, author of the greatest work ever published on missions, and Mr. James, agent of the American Bible Society.

2. The special signs of Christ's coming in the sun, moon, and stars, have appeared. They occurred immediately after the tribulation of the church by her persecutors, and we may know that Christ is near, even at the doors; and it is easier for heaven and earth to pass than for the words of Christ on this point to fail. Matt. 24:35. The sun was supernaturally darkened May 19, 1780, and the night following, the moon refused to give her light; and the night of November 13, 1833, witnessed by far the greatest display of falling stars or meteors that has ever visited our earth. My authorities are President Dwight, in Ct. Hist. Collections, Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society, Noah Webster, Prof. Olmstead, the famous meteorologist, and Mr. Smith, astronomer of New York city, etc.

3. In following the prophecy of the seven seals, we arrive at the same signs under the sixth seal, and reach the same inevitable conclusions. Rev. 6; 7:1.

4. In pursuing the interesting prophecy of the seven trumpets, we see that the sixth trumpet closed by the fall of the Ottoman Empire in passing into the hands of the allied powers of Europe in 1840, and that just at that time a message on time, connected with the finishing up of the work of the gospel, was going by sea and by land agreeably to the prophecy of Rev. 10, thrown in between the sixth and seventh trumpets. Rev. 7-11.

5. We have reached the end of all prophetic periods, the longest of which, the 2300 days, or years, ended in 1844, when Christ entered upon the closing work of his priesthood in the sanctuary in Heaven, preparatory to his coming to earth. Dan. 8:14.

6. The man of sin, papacy, has arisen, has had his prosperous, but cruel and audacious, reign of 1260 years over the nations; he has lost his civil dominion; the end is right upon us; and the caution of Paul to not look for Christ is removed. 2 Thess. 2; Dan. 7:25, 26.

7. In fulfillment of prophecy, the foul and degrading delusion of modern spiritualism is performing its wonders and doing its work of destruction, while the church are looking for Christ, who is about to come as a thief. Isa. 8:17-20; Matt. 24:24; 2 Thess. 2:8-12; 1 Tim. 4:1; 2 Tim. 3:6-9; Rev. 16:13-15.

8. And finally, the three advent messages of Rev. 4 are going forth. The last of these is developing a people keeping all God's commandments, and its proclamation is to be immediately followed by the unmingled wrath of God, and the appearing of the Son of man on the white cloud. This synopsis might be greatly extended.

IV. Literality of the signs in the sun, moon, and stars.

It has been claimed that these signs are figurative, representing the corrupting and darkening influence of error, the fall of the church, or the fall of large and small powers of earth. As the work of corrupting the truth commenced in the apostolic age and continued for ages, and as the church apostatized in departing from the truth, and earthly powers fell in the first century and onward, this application would give the world the signs of the immediate coming of Christ more than seventeen hundred years ago! thus deceiving the world for ages!!

Our reasons for believing these signs to be literal are briefly as follows:—

1. They are given in a literal prophecy in connection with the literal coming of Christ and the literal scenes associated with that event.

2. They have been given literally in the past, and why may they not be given again literally? When the judgments of God were falling on the hardened Egyptians, the sun, moon, and stars, did not shine for three days; and when Christ hung upon the cross, the sun was darkened and the earth was robed in gloom, fitly prefiguring the sorrow and misery awaiting those who receive not Christ as their Saviour. A star led the wise men to the infant Saviour at his first advent. How proper then to have these signs appear literally before the second coming of Christ and the ushering in of the day of wrath!

3. John, in the subject of the seals, which was presented to him in A. D. 96, 26 years after the destruction of Jerusalem, represents the signs as to take place in close connection with the coming of Christ and the day of wrath; and the manner in which he describes the stars as falling "as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind"—answers completely to the manner in which the stars fell in 1833, proving conclusively the literality of the signs. Read also Joel 2:30; Luke 21:25.

The signs have been fulfilled literally at the very time specified by the Saviour, immediately after the tribulation of the elect.

5. They made the very impression that such signs should make; caused those who feared God to seriously consider, and were regarded as forcible evidence of the proximity of the Judgment.

6. They are explained in a manner to lead the reader to believe them to be figurative.

7. As it would be absurd to make a literal application, when a figurative application is intended (as in the case of Joseph's dream, concerning the sun, moon, and eleven stars, that of the fourth trumpet, and that of the symbolic woman of Rev. 12), so it would be absurd to make a figurative application when a literal one is intended.

8. And finally, in the case under consideration, reason unites with Scripture in requiring that the leading signs of so important an event be described literally, that they relate to things which all can appreciate, that they may serve as a key which can be used in opening to other evidences, and a firm basis on which to build a glorious and harmonious system of truth, which the most skeptical minds cannot fail to comprehend, if they will take pains to examine it with that candor that its importance demands.

V. Objections against precision, etc.

OBJ. 1. The apostles wrote as though Christ might come in the apostles' days.

ANS. This objection not only represents the inspired apostles as making wrong impressions in their writings, but it is directly opposed to the teachings of the apostles. Paul strongly cautioned the church of his time not to be deceived by spirit, by word, or by letter, as that the day of Christ was at hand. 2 Thess. 2.

OBJ. 2. No man can tell the day and hour of Christ's coming.

ANS. This does not prove that we may not know when Christ is near, even at the doors, or when we have reached the last generation.

OBJ. 3. Christ will come to all as a thief.

ANS. If this objection is genuine, then all will be lost; for a thief comes to destroy. But it is to those who cry peace and safety that Christ comes as a thief. The watching, believing church are not in darkness, that the day of the Lord should overtake them as a thief. 1 Thess. 5:2; Rev. 3:3.

OBJ. 4. Christ says, "Ye know not when the time is." Mark 13:33.

ANS. The time Christ here speaks of is the "day and hour." See previous verse.

OBJ. 5. The coming of the Lord will be like the lightning. Matt. 24:27.

ANS. As the lightning that cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so Christ is speaking of the publicity and extent of his coming by way of opposing those views which represent that coming to take place in a secret manner. Read previous verse.

OBJ. 6. Peter declares, "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." 2 Pet. 3:8.

ANS. Peter is writing to counteract the influence of the latter-day scoffers who would say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" and to inspire confidence in the certainty of the Lord's promise concerning his coming. It is in regard to God's promises that a thousand years are with the Lord as one day. That is, what God has promised one thousand years ago will be as surely fulfilled as though he had promised it to-day.

OBJ. 7. You were disappointed in 1844, and may fail again.

ANS. The Jews who came out of Egypt were disappointed when, instead of entering into the land of Canaan three weeks after the exode, they remained forty years in the wilderness to be tempted. Was not the Lord leading them? The disciples were also greatly disappointed when their Lord was crucified. Was the message which they had faithfully borne for over three years a false message? There was to be a tarrying time, and progressive advancement in the truth by the church, and many prophecies were to be fulfilled in the disappointment, to give still greater force to the advent doctrine. Matt. 25:5; Heb. 10:35-39; Rev. 10.

OBJ. 8. Why did not the apostles dwell more upon these prophecies and upon the prophetic periods?

ANS. The apostles wrote quite largely upon these prophecies as to be fulfilled in the future from their day. They laid stress on prophecies and times fulfilling in their day. Christ commenced his preaching by saying, "The time is fulfilled." Mark 1:15. He evidently referred to the sixty-nine weeks reaching to Messiah the Prince. Dan. 9. We should also lay special stress upon the prophecies and periods fulfilling in our times. Why was not a Noah raised up to preach the flood in the days of Adam? And why did not a special message go forth on the immediate first advent of the Messiah in the days of David?

OBJ. 9. The important thing is to be ready.

ANS. Yes; but to be ready we must love Christ, and if we love Christ we shall long to see him, and shall respect and cheerfully welcome evidences of his speedy return.

VI. Inconsistencies of the opposition.

Truth is a unit, and those who defend it can present a connected, consistent and harmonious theory, while error is noted for its zigzag course, and those who maintain it will naturally run into various inconsistencies and contradictions.

For instance, those who oppose us on the speedy return of Christ, will commence their opposition by saying, "Christ may come to-day, and he may not come for one or two thousand years;" but before they get through you will perhaps hear them plead that the world must be converted before the coming of Christ. If Christ may come to-day, how can they be positive that the world will be converted? How can they tell that Christ will not come in this generation? and why oppose us?

Again, sometimes our opponents will claim that our points of difference consist in non-essentials, yet they will make these points essential in fiercely opposing our views. But the worst feature of this claim is that it bears directly against the sacred Scriptures, and when made deliberately and in the blazing light of truth, we cannot regard it as being less than sacrilege. One of our points of difference is, that we believe the prophecies may be understood, while many say that some prophecies cannot be understood. Thus they leave the impression that God undertook to give a revelation to man, but failed by putting into the Bible things that are not and can never be a revelation to fallen man. We claim it to be an important duty to proclaim the immediate coming of Christ in response to the many prophecies which show that he is near, and that he should be preached as such. But those who oppose us say we should not engage in such a work, and thereby they lower and oppose the numerous scriptures which enjoin this work on the church.

But in no one thing are the inconsistencies of our opponents more apparent than in their efforts to evade the force of the signs in the sun, moon, and stars. Some will take the position that these signs given by the Saviour were fulfilled, as recorded by Josephus, just before the destruction of Jerusalem, and that the destruction of Jerusalem is the tribulation spoken of in connection with the signs. But the fallacy of such views is clearly exposed by the following facts:—

1. This makes the signs appear before the tribulation, while Christ says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. 24:29.

2. Josephus speaks of no such signs, but speaks of signs very unlike these; as the sword hanging over Jerusalem, the gates of Jerusalem being opened without hand, and the man walking around the doomed city for days, crying, "Woe to this city," and finally saying, "Woe to me," when a stone fell upon him, and he died. But,

3. The tribulation itself cannot refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, for, first, it was to be the greatest that had been "since the beginning of the world." But the destruction of the world by a flood was a far greater tribulation than the destruction of Jerusalem. Secondly, The days of the tribulation were to be shortened for the elect's sake, and except those days should be shortened there should no flesh (of the elect understood) be saved. But hundreds of churches of the elect outside of the land of Judea, in other parts of Asia, in Europe, and Africa, would have been saved if every soul in Judea had perished. How natural and easy the application of the tribulation to the sufferings of the church under heathen and papal persecutions, and to have the literal signs appear immediately after that tribulation, according to facts in history. This tribulation was indeed the greatest that the church had experienced, or that they ever would pass through.

And no less futile are the appeals of so-called learned men to science to counteract the force of the signs. To illustrate: Some with quite a show of learning will affirm that the dark day of May 19, 1780, and the unusual darkness of the night following, were the result of an eclipse. But in tracing eclipses back by astronomy, you have to halt this side of the dark day or beyond that day to find an eclipse. It could not be an eclipse caused by the moon, for an eclipse of the sun as caused by the moon can take place only at new moon; but that darkness occurred at about the time of full moon; so that men of science affirm that "the causes of these phenomena are unknown. They certainly were not the result of eclipses." "For which no satisfactory cause has been assigned."—Robert Sears' Guide to Knowledge. Noah Webster, in New Haven Daily Herald.

Astronomy is also too much for our opponents on the falling stars; for it meets them by saying of the meteoric display of November 13, 1833, "The greatest meteoric display ever known." "We now come to by far the most splendid display on record. . . . In many districts the mass of the population were horror-struck, and the more enlightened were awed at contemplating so vivid a picture of the apocalyptic image—that of the stars of heaven falling to the earth, even as a fig-tree casting her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind."—Asa Smith's Astronomy, p. 23.

The fact that these displays are periodical does not lessen the force of this wonderful exhibition. It is not to be expected that Jehovah shall lay aside the laws he has established, and discard all natural means in accomplishing his wonders to fulfill the prophetic word. Not long since, a preacher in opposing us on this point said: "Our earth in its circuit around the sun passes through two belts of gases at different points, and it passes through these gases with such velocity that it ignites them, and the result is falling stars." But the question still recurs, Why was there such a wonderful display in 1833? Did the earth go faster through one of the belts that year? or did God add more gas for the occasion? The hand of God was in that sign.

Our views on this subject being reasonable and scriptural, what is the nature of the opposition? I do not now speak of man's motives and of the amount of light our opponents have. I leave these points between them and the Judge of all, who tries the reins and the hearts, and will bring every work into Judgment, with every secret thing. Our message being a Bible message, we are shut up to the following conclusions:—

1. The opposition is a war against God and his word.

2. It tends to calm the people in unbelief, so that they will not discern the signs of the times, and that the great day of God shall overtake them as a thief.

3. It encourages those who mock at the idea of Christ's immediate coming to mock on.

4. It encourages men to act as the masses acted in the days of Noah.

5. It destroys in the minds of those who maintain it the strong motive to repentance, that is based on the fact that "the great day of the Lord is near and hasteth greatly." Zeph. 1:14; 2:1-3; Joel 2:1.

6. It grieves those who long to see Christ and faithfully proclaim his coming, and adds to their already arduous task of preaching unpopular truth.

7. And, finally, it unqualifies the masses to be in a state of readiness to exclaim at the revelation of Jesus from Heaven, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us." Isa. 25:9.

Dear reader, I beseech you in the name of Christ to be on the safe side.

WHEN I think of many a poor, hard-working man, toiling from morning to night all the year round for a wretched subsistence, ground down by dire poverty, with neither the opportunity nor the inclination for mental improvement, whose whole sum of knowledge is comprehended in being able to spell out with difficulty the plainest parts of the Bible; when I think of such persons, I thank God that it is only necessary to touch the hem of Christ's garment in order to be saved; that one or two simple gospel truths—such as, "Christ came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance," "Come to me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," are sufficient, by the blessing of the Spirit, to save and comfort the soul.

WE account the Scriptures of God to be the most sublime philosophy.

Let Him Alone.

THERE, before the Saviour's gaze of tears, lay a city, splendid apparently and in peace, and destined to enjoy another half century of existence. And the day was a common day; the hour a common hour; no thunder was throbbing in the blue, unclouded sky: no deep voices of departing deities were rolling through the golden doors: and yet,—soundless to mortal ears in the unrippled air of eternity—the knell of her destiny had begun to toll: and, in the voiceless dialect of heaven, the fiat of her doom had been pronounced: and in the realm which knoweth and needeth not any light save the light of God, the sun of her moral existence had gone down while it was yet day. Were her means of grace over? No, not yet. Was her temple closed? No, not yet. Were her services impossible? No, not yet. The white-robed Levites still thronged her courts; the singers still made the heavens ring with their passionate litanies and silver psalms; the high priest yet sprinkled, year by year, the gold of the holiest altar with the blood of unavailing sacrifice. No change in her was visible to mortal eyes. And yet for her, from this moment even until the end, the accepted time was over, the appointed crisis past—the day of salvation had set into irrevocable night. It was with her as it was with the barren fig-tree, on which, next day, the Lord pronounced his doom. The leaf of her natural life was still glossy green; the sun still shone on her; the rain fell; the dew stole down; but the fruit would grow on her no more, and therefore the fire was kindled for the burning, the ax uplifted, which would crash on the encumbering trunk.

She was not spared for her beauty; she was not forgiven for her fame. And if it were so with the favored city, may it not be so with thee, and thee, and me? What shall the reeds of the desert do, if even the cedar be shattered at a blow? Yes; the lesson of the tears of Jesus over Jerusalem as she gleamed before him in the vernal sunshine, a gem upon her crown of hills, is this: and oh! may we all have grace to learn it now—learn it even in this solemn week: that as for her, so for us, there may be a too-late; the door may be shut without a sound; the doom sealed without a sight; life may be over before death comes. It is not—(oh! mark this) it is not that God loses his mercy, but that we lose our capacity for accepting it: it is not that God turneth away from us, but that we have utterly paralyzed our own power of turning back to him. And then the voice sighs forth with unutterable sadness, "Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone." Let him alone, O preacher, for he hates the words of truth! Let him alone, O Word of God, for he hath set his face as a flint against thee; let him alone, O conscience, for he is bent on murdering thee; his sins have become not willful only but willing; he has chosen them,—let him have them. He has loved death more than life, and lies rather than righteousness, and vice more than virtue, and the world more than Heaven, and the lusts of the flesh rather than the law of God. And the Spirit of God hath striven with him, and striven in vain; all, all hath been in vain: let him alone; let him eat of the fruits of his own works, and be filled with his own devices.—Sel.

A Fine Sermon Spoiled.

THE Christian, of Quincy, Illinois, relates how effectually a fine "effort" of a smart young preacher was spoiled by an unappreciating father in the ministry who endured the discourse with much long-suffering. The incident fairly illustrates the modern practice of spiritualizing texts of Scripture, and giving them a meaning foreign to that intended by the inspired writer. Any judicious hearer is able to apply privately the same method of cure, and no opportunity of doing it should be neglected.

A young preacher—a graduate of one of the theological schools of the country—preached a very nice discourse from the following words: "Then, fearing lest they should fall upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day." Acts 27:20.

Said the young preacher, "The ship represents the church. The four anchors are faith, hope, love, and prayer. Christians are the crew. The sea represents the great ocean of life. The storm that prevailed is the trials to which we are incident here, and the island of Melita, where sidered by humble and teachable souls. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in Heaven." Matt. 5:14, 16.

Blessed is the man who pays attention to the word of life, and learns diligently in the school of God's saving grace, until, like a ripe sheaf, he is gathered home to the heavenly garner.

THIS GENERATION.

This expression, found in Matt. 24:34, has led many to conclude that the entire chapter met its fulfillment at the destruction of Jerusalem.

The chapter, with the one following, contains a discourse given by our Lord in reply to two questions propounded by his disciples: "When shall these things be?" and, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Christ pointedly answers both of these. The predictions given in answer to the first, relating to the destruction of the temple and city of Jerusalem, were accomplished by the Roman armies, without a preceding sign, in A. D. 70. Dan. 9:26; Matt. 24:15; Luke 21:20.

The second question was answered by a recital of events to occur from that time till the second coming of Christ at the end of the world, or the Christian age. Christ carried the minds of his disciples forward from the time of their flight from the city, through the long period of tribulation of 1260 days (years) while the church was to be nourished in the wilderness; verse 22; Rev. 12:6; he noticed the rise of false Christs and prophets who should, if possible, deceive the very elect; and, lastly, he spoke of the signs which were to appear, the darkening of the sun and moon, and falling of the stars, foretelling his coming, and the shaking of the powers of the heavens.

The fulfillment of these events embraced a period of more than seventeen hundred years; and this period must include more than one generation. Now, to which one of these did Christ refer when he says, "This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled?" Why, says the objector, he refers to the generation to whom he is speaking. But wait, let us see. In Mark, 8:11, 12, we read: "And the Pharisees came forth, and began to question with him, seeking of him a sign from Heaven, tempting him. And he sighed deeply in his spirit, and saith, Why doth this generation seek after a sign? verily I say unto you, There shall no sign be given unto this generation." In Matt. 16:4 and Luke 11:29, he makes the single exception of the sign of the prophet Jonas.

Now we would ask: Would Christ, after he had told that wicked and adulterous generation that there should no sign be given to it, at any subsequent time, give them, in the sun, moon and stars, signs by which they might know when Jerusalem was to be destroyed? This would make Christ stultify himself, and show him to be a false prophet, witnessing against himself. Let those think thus who can.

Where are the facts which support this view? Does history furnish us with the evidence that that generation, previous to A. D. 70, saw a supernatural darkening of the sun and moon, or the stars falling from heaven? that they witnessed the shaking of the heavens and the earth? or that all the tribes of the earth mourned when Jerusalem was besieged and made desolate? No such testimonies are recorded. And surely there was one tribe, or nation, the Romans, who were not mourning when their armies were riding triumphantly into the city, and shouting victory over the besieged.

And we ask again, What shall we do with the predictions recorded by the seer of Patmos, Rev 6:12-17, in A. D. 96, twenty-six years after Jerusalem was destroyed, when he speaks of the same events of which Christ has spoken above? Surely here is another false prophet if these things were fulfilled prior to A. D. 70. But here, again, it is Jesus Christ himself who testified these things to his servant John. Chap. 1:1. Therefore, this testimony proves positively that Christ, in Matt. 24, did not give these signs in the sun, moon, and stars, to the generation living previous to the destruction of Jerusalem.

But how natural and reasonable that Christ should carry the minds of his disciples, by these events following in their order, down to the people or generation which should see the last sign fulfilled—the falling of the stars in 1833—and then speak of this generation as the one that should see the consummation and the end. He had passed over the periods lived by other generations, and it would be highly proper for him thus to speak. It is a principle endorsed by all scholars that the adjective "this" refers to the thing nearest or last mentioned.

In the language of another, "We do not believe that the phrase, 'this generation,' marks any definite number of years. Some suppose that our Lord designed to teach that some who were witnesses of the dark day in 1780 would live to witness the second coming of the Saviour. But it is our opinion that the Lord designed to teach that the people who should live at the time of the fulfillment of the last sign (the falling stars of 1833), and should hear the proclamation of the coming of Christ, based partly upon the fulfilled signs, should witness the scenes connected with his coming.

"The proclamation of the coming and kingdom of Christ is given to the last generation. God did not send Noah to preach to the next to the last generation before the flood, but to the last. The very generation which was destroyed by the waters of the flood saw Noah build the ark, and heard his warning voice. So God has raised up men to give the solemn warning to the world at the right time to give force to the warning. And the very generation of men that live after the three great signs are fulfilled, and who hear and reject the warning message from Heaven, will drink the cup of the unmingled wrath of God. For such the seven last plagues are reserved. And those of this very generation who receive the message, suffer the disappointments, and endure the trials of the waiting position, will witness the coming of Christ, and exclaim, 'Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us.' Isa. 25:9.

"With what emphasis our Lord gave utterance to this sentiment. It is a rebuke upon our unbelief. As we read it, God help us to believe it: 'Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled.' And as though this were not enough to lead us to unwavering faith, he adds these forcible words: 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away.'"

THE WORD OF GOD.

"AND his name is called the Word of God." Rev. 19:13.

Jesus Christ, our Advocate and Intercessor, is called in the Holy Scriptures by a variety of names and titles, each one indicating in itself a separate and distinct office, in which he acts by authority from his Father, Jehovah. He is here called the Word of God, to indicate his authority to make known to man the word or will of God.

He is called the Word of God in John 1:1, 14; and in this connection it is stated that the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. He is also called the Faithful and True Witness, Rev. 3:14, showing that the Scriptures given by his authority are not to be doubted or denied; nor are they like the works of man, liable to error and deceit. They are not an idle romance of the day, written for display or for profit, but the very book God has provided for man, to guide him aright, to warn him of danger, to instruct, or to reprove, as may be necessary.

"I and my Father are one" is an assertion made by the Lord (John 10:30) to show the perfect agreement existing between Jehovah and himself; and Paul, in Heb. 1:1, 2, states that "God, who at sundry times and in diverse manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son."

So we must conclude that the Holy Scriptures are the gift of God, through Jesus Christ, who personally interested himself in making known to man those truths which it is most important for him to understand. He did not satisfy himself with merely enlightening the people of a particular age or nation, but he commanded that they should be written and preserved for coming generations.

To this end, the Scriptures of divine truth have ever been committed to the keeping of good men, who have so valued and appreciated them as often to willingly die the most painful death rather than give up the word of God; and many have died in its defense.

It is well known by the best and wisest men that the Sacred Scriptures have ever been the especial care of God; and that while the powers of darkness have often tried to wholly destroy them, their Author has ever found ready means for preserving them from the fury of Satan.

The being here spoken of as the Word made flesh, and dwelling among us (John 1:14), is certainly a very exalted personage; for he is called "Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."

Various needless and absurd theories have been brought out from these titles; but when we consider that they signify the offices conferred upon him by his Father, Jehovah, the mystery is explained, and the darkness vanishes. All the fog of theological controversy is blown away by the power of the word. The expression, "My Father is greater than I" (John 14:28), shows two distinct persons, one greater than the other.

What kindness and condescension it is in so exalted a being to make known to man so much concerning himself as is made known in the Bible; so much, and so interesting, and so profitable; oh, is not the word of God a priceless treasure, a vast mine of wealth?

The Word of God was made flesh; that is, the Lord Jesus, who made known to man the Holy Scriptures, impersonated in himself the word and will of God, just as George Washington was a representative in himself of national freedom, or Nero of tyranny. By the same figure of speech, Jesus, in one of his offices, personifies the word of God. He fulfills also the office of advocate, and priest, and king. Truly, fallen Adam's race found a true friend, and a powerful one, in Jesus Christ.

Now, how shall this subject be made a profitable one to us at this time? let us see, for a moment, what is the conclusion of the above train of reflections.

The word of God, coming to us by inspiration, is in our hands. Forty or fifty cents of American currency will purchase a good, readable copy of this priceless treasure. You and I can read from three to ten chapters per day; we can reflect upon this; we can pray over it; we can speak of it to our associates in the great highway of life. This will preoccupy the mind, and, with proper improvement, may sanctify our hearts, driving out gluttony, lust, and avarice, as darkness flees at the approach of day.

THREATENING SITUATION IN EUROPE.

"DISCOUNT as we please the numerous rumors of warlike preparations in Europe, and explain as we may the circumstances which may precipitate hostilities, there will still remain the hard, solid fact that no one would be greatly surprised—that is, no one who has given any attention to European affairs—if it were announced to-day that a war had broken out in that continent. Russia, since the Crimean war, has been busily constructing railroads with the double purpose of opening up her territory to commerce and of facilitating the transportation of troops. She has steadily endeavored to give a good elementary education to her people; and her soldiers are not only admirably drilled and under perfect discipline, but are vastly superior in general intelligence to those who formerly fought against the troops of other powers. The German army is the admiration of military nations, and the example which they keep in view in contemplating reforms. Austria, since her recent loss of territory, has striven hard to bring up her means of offense and defense. France has brought nearly as much skill to bear upon her army re-organization as she has upon her financial difficulties, and with nearly equal success. Other countries have done what they could do in the same direction.

"Every European nation is jealous of the slightest movement on the part of its neighbors. National existence seems to be considered absolutely dependent upon the readiness to resist attack. All Europe appears to be living during a period of armistice of uncertain duration. The wisest statesmen do not know how soon the thunders of cannon may call the nations to engage in a deadly struggle. In almost every country there is a financial crisis approaching, which impels its rulers to seek some way of reducing the present costly armaments.

"An attempt has been made to place Europe upon a peace footing by mutual agreement, and it has failed. One power hesitated to begin before another, and no beginning was made. But neither Russia nor Germany nor Austria can afford to sustain much longer the enormous drain upon industrial resources by the present huge armaments. Commerce and agriculture in Russia are threatened with stagnation and collapse. Germany is far from a condition of prosperity. Austria is in a precarious financial state. The opinion is not unwarranted that a pretty general war is now looking forward to as the only available means of clearing the political atmosphere, and producing a subsequent peace less costly than the present one.

"One almost trembles to think what will be the effect of an outburst of war in Europe. The storm which is long in gathering is long in dispersing. Besides the ordinary causes serving to produce war, it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that the strife once begun the religious element will enter largely into it. Utterances in unguarded moments by papal dignitaries like Cardinal Manning have shown that the Vatican is plotting for the restoration of the temporal power of the pope; and Bismarck and Gladstone are of the same opinion.

"Great Britain, by the purchase of the Suez Canal, has declared that European complications are to be no longer a matter of indifference to her. Her army is to be mobilized and the war office has matured a plan. With the exception of some modification to meet the possible needs of the colonies, the method is substantially the same as that of Germany. The regular force is about 129,000 men, the total reserve, 340,000 at present. The whole of the regular and auxiliary troops are to be divided into an active and a garrison army. At Colchester the first army corps will have its headquarters, and it will be available for foreign service. The second corps is to be at Aldershot, while the other corps are to have their stations at Croydon, Salisbury, Chester, York, Edinburgh and Dublin. Whether by conscription or increase of pay, the condition of the army is to be vastly improved, both in number and efficiency.

"Our own government, unless through some marked departure from a time-honored policy, need not be drawn into the conflict impending in Europe. To prevent in time any possibility of the struggle the Church of Rome to obtain control of the direction of the State—the most dangerous and subtle of all the war-producing causes in Europe,—having any effect here it will be wise to prevent effectively and speedily as possible all possible establishment, openly or in disguise, of anything like a State church. The hierarchical power of the papacy must be kept in proper subordination to the civil power; and our measures will answer the purpose if they are applied in time."

The foregoing condensed view of the condition of Europe, from the New York Weekly Witness, of Jan. 13, 1876, shows us unmistakably where the nations are drifting.

The idea that "it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that the strife once begun the religious element will enter largely into it," is quite significant. It plainly to be seen from the conclusions of the article that the prediction of some of our statesmen that a religious war is impending is not wholly unfounded. The Witness fears the establishment of a State church. Active measures are already in operation to secure such a church; therefore, the opposers of this movement know there is danger ahead.

REVIEW OF STORR.

Answers to Objections Raised by Him.

(Concluded.)

OBJ. 1. "A person traveling east or west and making the circuit of the earth, will gain or lose a day; and beyond the polar circles the sun does not rise for days, and even months together; therefore, it is impossible to keep the Sabbath with precision anywhere."

Ans. Was not the earth as round on the day that God uttered his law from Sinai and wrote it upon tables of stone as it is now, and was it not therefore as impossible to keep the Sabbath then as now?

Jesus said that the Sabbath was made for man—for all mankind. Mark 2:27. God said to man, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth;" that is, fill it with inhabitants. It is possible, therefore, for all mankind to keep the Sabbath in all parts of the world. If the objection is of any force, will it not apply equally well to the first day of the week?

Obj. 2. "The fourth commandment contemplates the sanctification of one-seventh part of time, and does not refer to any particular day of the week."

Ans. If this be true, those who keep the seventh day are as near right as any people in the world; and since we must begin to reckon at some day as the first in order to

Our business meetings were encouraging. The brethren and sisters subscribed liberally for the tent. Up to this date, $213.00 have been subscribed. Three new ones took their stand upon the present truth at this meeting.

Dec. 11, 12, met with the church at Powder Mills. I had good freedom in speaking the truth. This is the largest church in the State; but has been lessened by the removal of some to Kansas. Oh! if our people could realize the shortness of time, and, as Paul says, having food and raiment be therewith content, there would be much means saved to themselves and the cause. All will have to give account of their stewardship in the Judgment. At our business meeting, organized s. n., amounting to $40.00, though on account of sickness many were not present. One more signed the covenant at this meeting.

Dec. 17, 18, spent with the church at Edgefield Junction, Tenn. Had a good, encouraging meeting. Sunday, the 19th, in company with Bro. Owen, of Edgefield Junction, rode twenty-eight miles to Cheatnam Co., where the brethren had written urgently requesting me to come. This being a very thinly settled part of the State, there was no meeting-house of any note within four miles of us; but a brother having a large room in his house, prepared it with temporary seats, and I lectured there for three weeks, sometimes once and sometimes twice a day. The interest was small in the beginning, but increased until the close. There was never such excitement at that place in reading the Bible as was caused there by these lectures. There were pressing invitations from all directions for lectures. I appeal to the General Conference again to send this people help if it is possible. My field of labor is too large. There were eleven covenanted together to keep all of God's commandments and the faith of Jesus.

The day of the fast was a glorious day for this little company. There were some Sabbath-keepers present from Edgefield Junction. It reminded me of the three fast days in 1865, proclaimed by the General Conference. Baptized five, who gave every evidence of being truly converted to God. May the Lord sustain this little company. There are others interested, and perhaps they will take their stand ere long on the truth.

I went to Edgefield Junction to rest a few days. Commenced meetings there on the eve of the 13th, and continued over Sunday. This little church was much encouraged and strengthened. Notwithstanding the rainy weather, there was some outside attendance. Celebrated the ordinances Sunday evening. There were some present who had been very bitterly opposed to our people. Some came, no doubt, for fun, but left with feelings of solemnity. My heart goes out for that people. God bless them.

ILLINOIS.

SINCE my last report, I have labored among the friends of the cause at Greenup, Oakland, Campbell, Milton Station, Lovington, Dalton City, Princeville, Eugene, Martinsville, and at one or two other points where we have but few brethren. In some of these places, a few are drawing back, I fear, "unto perdition;" however, new ones are coming in to fill their places. Upon the whole, I think the cause is making advancement.

It is sad to think that some of our older brethren are losing their first love; that their zeal and energy are on the decrease. But we remember that "the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them that believed not." Only two of that mighty host who left Egypt, from twenty years old and upward, reached the promised land; and "these things happened unto them for examples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come." Let us read the 3d and 4th chapters of Hebrews, and take warning.

Near Oakland, some new ones have embraced the truth and most of the brethren seem to be growing strong. May the Lord save his remnant people from blacksliding.

NORTH TISBURY, MASS.

THE interest to hear is good still. Many are in the valley of decision. The M. E. minister gave out last Sunday that he would speak on the Sabbath question, and would prove from the Bible and history that the first day should now be kept. We hope his discourse may make the truth shine more clearly.

D. A. ROBINSON.

MONTICELLO, MINN.

WE closed our meetings here Jan. 30. Twelve have taken a firm stand to observe the Sabbath in the different neighborhoods where we have labored. Others are interested, who we hope may yet obey God. We are going from this place to Otsego, about ten miles distant, where there is a desire to hear the truth. If the way opens, we design to commence meetings there immediately; if not, we intend to go to Ellsworth, in Wisconsin, where there has been a call for us for several weeks. We desire to work wherever the Spirit opens the way before us.

STURGEON BAY, WIS.

JAN. 16, I closed a course of lectures at Sturgeon Bay. The interest was not very good. Eight substantial persons decided to fear God and keep his commandments. Among the number is a prominent lawyer. He has held the office of district attorney for twelve years, and has served two terms in the State legislature. There were four Sabbath-keepers in the place when I went there. They now have regular meetings established.

I am now at Fish Creek, Door Co. Have had six meetings. The interest is good. The house is crowded every night. I never saw a people more eager to hear the truth.

ST. ANNE AND KANKAKEE, ILL.

BRO. MORIN writes respecting his meetings among the French in these places:—

My meetings in St. Anne have been very well attended. I have also held a very good Sabbath meeting a few miles from Kankakee. In Kankakee there were present two Frenchmen, a father and his son-in-law, who do not keep the Sabbath, but they avow their belief that it is the right day. Their hearts were touched in that meeting. The father grasped my hand with emotion, and wished me much success in the conversion of sinners. I think we shall count soon two brothers more, and perhaps with them their families. I pray the Lord to enlighten them.

The Protestant ministers whom I meet are treacherous, denying to-day what they have for years preached for the edification of their churches, for the purpose of resisting the truth. I know a first-day Baptist minister who has lost many members of his church by the violent opposition which he has made, and continues to make, against S. D. Adventists. He had formerly preached obedience to the word of God, also obligation to keep Sunday, and obedience to the law of God. Now he preaches to fight against the present truth. He said that in order for a religion to be holy and just it must have for its basis not only the Bible, but also the learned men; that is, the fathers of the church. Secondly, he denied the necessity of keeping a special day, leaving to man's discretion the choice of a day, provided it is one day in seven. Thirdly, he taught that the immutable law of God was abrogated at the cross; also even giving to understand that God had not written with his own finger the ten commandments on the tables of stone. Most of the members of his church, perceiving his hypocrisy, have left him. Several of his flock have become Adventists, and have embraced the truth which their minister rejects. Some of them are held by the ties of the world. May they break them soon and enter the field of the Saviour.

In St. Anne I met a French lady who told me that she remembered, in her childhood, having heard of people who lived at Soligny, at the foot of the Jura mountains in France, who kept the Sabbath. These persons were not Jews, but Christians; this was about sixty years ago. The village is not far from Switzerland.

There is much work to be done here, but I am of good courage. I pray God to help and not forsake me.

BETTER THAN EVER.

A SUBSCRIBER writes from Jefferson Co., N. Y.:—

I think the REVIEW better than ever before. The HEALTH REFORMER is something to be proud of. Our publications are the very life and soul of the third angel's message. May God bless them and speed them on their errand of love and mercy and warning to those sitting in darkness.

On motion, $150.00 were voted for Camp-meeting purposes, to be raised by the several districts according to their financial standing.

Adjourned to call of Chair.

THIRD SESSION.

First-day, Jan. 23, 9 o'clock A. M. Executive Committee on tent and camp-meeting fund reported as follows:—

Tent, rope, & freight,	$342.32
Camp-meeting expenses, groceries, &c.	110.59

Total, 452.91

Rec'd from treasurer, 445.14

Due Committee, 7.77

Treasurer's report read, which was as follows:—

Paid out,	142.00

Balance on hand, 104.93

The meeting was quite well attended, a good spirit manifested throughout, and much good done. Eight districts were represented by directors, or by leading brethren, and all went away resolved to engage anew in the work. Bro. Olsen spoke upon the necessity of united action, and urged that it was indispensably necessary that directors be fully alive to the work. In those districts where the director was fully aroused, a good report was returned; but where the director was faithless and unbelieving, little, or nothing, was done. The people will not rise higher than those that lead. How necessary, then, that those who have the oversight of this work should be men of energy and courage in the Lord.

Adjourned sine die.

THAT BROTHER H.

HE is an eastern man. New England, I conclude, is his field of labor. It appears that there is a Tract and Missionary Society there, of about two hundred members who are well drilled, and have become very efficient. It is gratifying indeed to hear of their progress in the good work. And they are not selfish, either, but by their love and good works are trying to provoke other Tract Societies to the same. Their gentle hints of what others might do, compared with what they do do, and their kind admonitions and words of good cheer, are not lost but are gradually having their effect. We know that we have been not a little provoked in this way.

But we have sometimes thought that our brother overestimated our ability to do—not our real ability; for we are assured that we are not doing one-twentieth part of what we might do; but as a Society we have not learned how, and have not been consecrated to God and the work. If our strength and efficiency were according to our numbers, they would be great indeed; but it must be remembered that most of our Tract Society members are just beginning to drill in the awkward squad, while many others belong to the home guards. We long for the time to come that whenever a call is made there may be a response along the whole line, and that all, or nearly all, may report, "Ready for duty." We long for a well-drilled, enthusiastic Tract and Missionary Society. We have very strong faith that we shall have it. Let our dear brother and any one else whose soul is in the message, still point out duty, and encourage with words of good cheer. Progress is being made, and we hope sometime to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. Courage in the Lord, brethren.

H. A. ST. JOHN.

AN AGED SABBATH-KEEPER.

WHILE lecturing in Crawford Co., Iowa, I was requested to visit an elderly lady, who keeps the seventh-day Sabbath. I called, and found her agreeable and entertaining, although she is eighty-five years of age. From her lips I received some facts in her history which were very interesting to me, and may prove the same to some of the readers of the REVIEW.

She was born in Pennsylvania in the year 1790. Her mother, who was a believer in the Jewish religion, was a witness of the dark day, and considered it an omen of the approach of the Messiah, a fulfillment of Joel 2:30. Her father died when she was but ten years of age, at which time she was separated from her mother and thrown into the hands of strangers. She has no farther recollections of her mother. She saw the stars fall in 1833, and was enabled to recognize in these things signs of the near approach of the second advent of our Lord, without having heard the third angel's message.

Being brought up under the influence of the Christian faith, she embraced the same; but the impressions received from her mother's teaching in her early life resulted in the conviction that the seventh day was the Sabbath, which she has endeavored to keep for thirty years. She expressed her faith and confidence in God with simplicity, and is now patiently waiting the return of the Bridegroom, whom she thinks she may live to see. The words of our Saviour came forcibly to my mind, "Thou art not far from the kingdom."

Obituary Notices.

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth."

DIED, Nov. 10, 1875, near Union City, Branch Co., Mich., sister Ann Webber, wife of Baldwin Webber, in the twenty-eighth year of her age. A post-mortem examination showed the cause of her death to be cancer of the stomach. She endured much pain, and the last hours of her life were marked with intense suffering. She was a member of the Burlington church. We laid her away to rest with a bright prospect of immortality. Two children suffer the loss of a dear mother. An address was given from Rom. 14:8, 9.

M. B. MILLER.

DIED, of consumption, at Pine River, Gratiot Co., Mich., Jan. 21, 1876, Matilda S., wife of Amos Johnson, in the 47th year of her age. She lived an irreproachable Christian life from early youth. About twenty years ago she joined the Methodists. It has been our privilege to enjoy the benefit of her cheering testimonies during the last sixteen years; first, with the Methodists, but more especially with Seventh-day Adventists since the organization of the Alma church nearly eleven years ago. She died in full faith of the third angel's message, rejoicing in the evidence of Christ's soon coming. She was much cheered by a visit from brethren Canright and Fisher about four weeks previous to her death, who prayed with her and ministered words of comfort. She was made glad to see her companion and most of her children commence to serve the Lord, some for the first time and others by overcoming hindrances. Her death was triumphant, and though her family and the church feel their loss, they have the blessed assurance that she sleeps in Jesus, and will have a part in the first resurrection.

F. NELSON.

On the 21st of December, 1875, Etta B. wife of H. W. Cottrell, calmly fell asleep in Jesus, after enduring with great fortitude and patience fourteen months of suffering from that much-dreaded disease, consumption. The last few days of her life were marked with intense suffering. The reading of the word of God, and the prayers of his children were a great comfort to her in her hours of distress. We firmly believe she will have part in the first resurrection. She leaves a husband, parents, brothers and sisters, and many warm friends to mourn their loss; but we mourn not as those who have no hope. Funeral discourse by Eld. Geo. A. H. Peters, Lutheran. Text, Dan. 12:13.

MARIA A. SPARROW.

DIED, of lingering consumption, in Sutton, Vt., Jan. 2, 1876, James M., son of Bro. L. B. Caswell, in the twenty-seventh year of his age. A few months ago James came from the West to the residence of his parents, where he was faithfully cared for to the close of his life. Before he died he gave some evidence of his acceptance with God, which gives consolation to the surviving Christian relatives and friends of the deceased. Discourse by the writer. Text, "And there shall be no more death." Rev. 21:4.

A. C. BOURDEAU.

—was the mouth of the prophet: "For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth; for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts. But ye are departed out of the way; ye have caused many to stumble by the law; ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi, saith the Lord of hosts. Therefore I have made you contemptible and base before all the people, according as ye have not kept my ways, but have been partial in the law." Mal. 2:7-9. It is worse than folly, it is impiety, to assert that the fourth commandment is binding—that the Sabbath of that commandment should be kept—and yet that it does not bind men to the observance of a particular day. God sanctified, and set apart, separated, appointed, the seventh day, because it was his Sabbath, the day on which he rested from the work of creation. He rested only on the seventh day of the seven; therefore his Sabbath is no other day than that of the weekly cycle so definitely and infallibly pointed out. And it will be finally discovered, to the infinite loss of many, that it makes vast difference whether we obey God, or not. It is extremely silly, as well as wicked, to attempt to undermine the fourth commandment, and circumvent Infinite Wisdom, by beginning where you please to number the weekly cycle, and so make any day you choose the one required to be kept holy—the Sabbath of the Lord, that is, the day on which the Lord rested. It is attempting an impossibility; it is a flagrant violation of common sense; a thing that never would have been undertaken, but from the most necessity to excuse self and maintain a tradition that had usurped the place of the Lord's Sabbath and made void the fourth precept of his law.
